TO THE KINGS
Most Excellent and Most Sacred MAJESTY.

SIR,

ALTHOUGH the quality of this work be truly such, that, considering the brightness of Royal Majesty, and the obscurity of its own extraction, it cannot expect a bare acceptance, much less plead any merit in this address; yet doth it find more reason for hope than despair; for as much as the whole World hath taken notice that your Majesty's Grace and Clemency is founded more upon the transcendent goodness of your own Disposition than the qualifications of your Subjects. Allowance hereby being made for what is mine, it were needless to insist upon the Nobility and usefulness of the Subject, the excellency whereof as humane transcendeth not your Orb, and the utmost improvement of which is within the sphere of your activity. It were a piece of pedantry to shew to your Majesty that History is the store-house whence Precedents may be fetched for all sorts of Actions, Publick and Private, Military and Civil; that it is a Mirror of prudence to shew both their beauty and deformity, a Touchstone to discover deceipts, an Incentive to virtue, and a Terror unto vice; that in it are contained the Prudence of times, imbecillity and strength of Nations, Reasons of State, Councils of Peace, and Stratagems of War; that in it Monarchy triumpheth over the Confusions, Alterations, and Seditions of Popular Government. And should I go about to instance in the various helps it affordeth to the management of Civil matters, I might justly incur more than the censure that light upon him, who was so impertinent as to read a Lecture of the Art of a General in the presence of Hannibal. For it may justly be said that that your Majesty hath improved History to the utmost ; that your actions have so far imitated antient Patterns as to exceed them. Others have wasted and destroyed Nations, you have recovered and restored three dying ones. Others have raged with fire and sword, have rooted out, overt urned, and made desolate ; your Majesty by Mercy and Grace hath replanted, settled, and enriched. Alexander conquered the effeminate Persians, and subdued other Nations whom their own unwisdom for Military matters helped him to overcome. Cæsar tamed the naked Galls, and painted Britains, whose fool-hardiness and barbarism had armed against themselves ; or if there be any other Achievements of them, or others, which seem more glorious, yet the valour of their Soldiers, the experience of their times and vicissitude of humane affairs, challenge to themselves the greatest share of reputation. Your Majesty hath subdued those things which are beyond Mankind's reach : You have tamed wild and extravagant passions of men, Conquered stubborn and perverse dispositions, laid low prejudice, and convinced such, whom all these Distempers had rendered affectedly ignorant and disobedient. Your Majesty's Conquests therefore so much more excel the commendations of others, as it is more glorious to cure than kill, to restore than to destroy, to follow the dictates of Compassion and Mercy, than of indignation and revenge, to Conquer the mind than the Body ; and indeed to overcome one's self than subdue others. That this is no flattery History will ascertain future times, and both the mouths and hearts of your People at present testify, which, though in other matters they may disagree, yet all unite in this consent, that you are the True Father of your Country. In our acclamations during those solemnities of your Majesty's Royal Coronation, seeing there is no need of wishing you the Goodness of Trajan, we so much the more pray that the Happiness of Augustus may light upon you, and that those solemnities may in one part imitate the Secular ones amongst the Romans, that though some of us have heretofore seen the like, yet through the length of your happy Reign none of us may do it for the time to come. I for my part, though a well-wisher to History, unfeignedly desire, that not till after very many years so great an accession of glory may come to it, as will accrue from the passages of your Majesty's Government ; and that in the mean time your Majesty may be as happy in the Love and Loyalty of your People, as they are in your Princely clemency and care. To this, both a sense of merit and duty binds me, being

Your Majesties most Loyal Subject

WILLIAM HOWEL.

P R E F A C E.

THE French (who first introduced this Custom into the World of writing Prefaces before the works of others) have used that liberty with so much excess in the commendation of their friends, that they have rendered it not only suspected to the Reader, but prejudicial to their repute whom they intended to honour by it. But as I cannot approve the indiscreet zeal of those persons that would rather abrogate a good Office when abused, than endeavour to reform it, I would neither wave an employment which gave me the occasion of hinting to the Reader some such things as may be of concernment to him in the perusal of this work, and which the modesty of the Author would not permit him to communicate, neither on the other side would I willingly recede from the strictness and severity of truth. So that whatsoever shall fall from me to his advantage shall not need any favourable construction to make it pass, nor shall I take that freedom to mix Fiction and History together : The use of this latter is so obvious to every eye, that it is needless to speak much of it, it shall suffice me in short to say, that by the knowledge of History we are taught wisdom, and led to virtue, there being nothing in the Actions or Fortunes, either of publick or private persons, to which somewhat in former Ages bore not a resemblance, and which by a due consideration of the circumstances we may not with profit apply to our present occasions. How much we are excited to virtue by it, they that know the power of Emulation in noble minds will easily conclude : which is manifest by the famous examples of Themistocles, whom the victories of Miltiades robbed of his repose, of Alexander, who was stirred up to the desire of glory by reading the actions of Achilles, as Cæsar by reflecting upon his ; add to this, that such persons whom these Precedents of virtue will not encourage to it, are aw'd by History from running headlong into vice, when they cannot but look on the writers of the present Age to be set as spies upon their Actions, and must expect when they are dead to be exposed without fear or flattery to the Impartial censure of the living. For who is there that would so much value the pleasure of a glass of Wine, as not to abstain from drinking it, if he knew it had been all night steep'd in Antimony.

These, besides many others, are the benefits which accrue to us by the knowledge of History in general, but that I may inform the World how much it is acknowledging to the worthy Author of this Institution in particular, and wherein those excellencies of his consist, which distinguish him from the ordinary crowd of Historians, Ut post se dignis monstrari & dicere licet, I must take leave to insist upon these ensuing heads, wherein I shall plainly make appear to the equal and candid Reader, that History is reduced by him in this work to such order, and exact Method, as never yet in any Language.

For

For, first you have here all the Empires in distinct Chapters by themselves, with the Contemporaries of them distinguished in the same manner from each other, and from the Empire to which they were contiguous. Whereas both in Systems and in larger Volumes of General History they are mingled together with a strange confusion, like the several ingredients of an Olio in the same Dish, where the variety of the Meats destroy the taste of one another, and he that would read any History by it self, finds it immediately embroy'd and interwoven with the affairs of other Nations, so that he will not easily form a perfect Idea in his mind of that which is given him but in parcels.

In the next place this Author has furnished you with a general Description of Greece, its ancient Kingdoms and Commonwealths, from their first Originals, the successions of Kings, changes of Government, and forms of the several Republicks, with the power and nature of their respective Magistrates and Officers, not omitting the most considerable Customs, Laws, and Antiquities of each of them, deduced from the best Historians, whom you still find quoted in the Margent; this, as it hath never been inirely performed by any Author heretofore, so ought it to set a peculiar mark of Honour upon ours, who hath been careful to give us an exact account of that Countrey, which was the Mother of Arts and Sciences.

After this, if we will turn our eyes upon the Macedonian Empire, and the several parts and branches of it, as the Kingdoms of Syria, of Macedon, and Egypt, we shall still have greater occasion to admire the learn'd diligence of the Author. The Græcian Monarchy after the decease of Alexander not being more dismembred and rent in pieces by his Successors, than by those Writers who have transmitted the memory of it to posterity, particularly, the Asian and Egyptian Kingdoms under the Seleucide and Ptolomies have never been compiled in one History, and I have often wonder'd in my perusal of this Infatuation, by what means the Author of it could arrive at so clear a knowledge of those perplex'd successions. It was certainly a work of great labour to compare Historians, and to weave these several Arguments and loose pieces into one entire Loom, which I the rather mind the Reader of, because it is not easily perceiv'd by every ordinary capacity; for the uniformity of the style, and the unbroken order of the whole is such, that they only who are conversant in Antiquities are able to judge what travel and study were required to it.

The Roman History next invites our observation; wherein the success of this Author hath sufficiently recompensed his worthy pains; I dare confidently affirm, No modern Pen hath yet carried it on with so great light from the Original of the City to the time of Constantine. For from the banishment of Tarquin to the new modelling of the Government by Augustus, you have all the Intermediate Changes, Alterations, and Seditions of it, while yet a State; as, the contests of the Patritians and Commons, with the several motives of them; The displacing and restoring of Annual Magistrates, the Description of their Offices, the Rites and Ceremonies of their Religion; all collected with great diligence from the

the Fathers of Roman History, but never given us in one body by ancient Authors, or by any of later days. I confess I have read a French Historian, who from the Reign of Augustus almost to that of Justinian hath given me the greatest satisfaction of any man; Yet he often amuseth himself (as some of our bad Chroniclers at home have done) with passages of small concernment, and below the Dignity of an Historian to relate: and from the Foundation of the City to Augustus, pays his Readers with a bare translation of Florus. Sr. Walter Rawleigh (never to be mentioned without honour) concludes his History with the end of the Macedonian War; and the conversion of that Kingdom into a Roman Province: much about the same time we are forsaken by our best Guide Livy, whose Decads from the Captivity of Perseus to the time of Octavius Caesar (whose Contemporary he was) are wholly lost: for in the conclusion of his fourth fifth Book (the last which is left us) he introduces King Prusias speaking to the Romans, whom he came to visit, in these words; Deos qui urbem Romanam incolerent Senatūque & Populum Romanum salutatū se venisse, & gratulatū quod Persea Gentiumque Reges vicissent, Macedonibusque & Illyris in Ditionem redactis, auxissent Imperium. But as this Author hath supplied the Defects of Livy, and continued the Roman History five hundred years beyond Sr. Walter Rawleigh, so in the alteration of the Government from a Commonwealth to a Monarchy by Augustus, the reasons which induced the Emperour to make that change, the manner how, and the form of it, are delivered with so great care, and describ'd with so much life, That I could not but take a particular notice of it; and (with the civility of those that carve to others where themselves best like) invite the Reader to a more exact observation of that which hath given me so great contentment.

Neither hath he deserved less of Christian than prophane History: for from the Primitive times till Constantine the Great he hath deduced the Successions of Bishops in the principal Sees, with the practice of the Christians, and a faithful relation of their sufferings in all the persecutions.

For what concerns our own Island, I think he hath perform'd the part of a true Englishman, and a lover of his Country: for he hath vindicated the Antiquity of its first Discovery by the Phœnicians, and that not only by the probable reasons alleged by that great Person Bochartus for the Etymology of the word Britannia, but by other undeniable, and convincing Circumstances, which as it redounds to the honour of our Nation, so reflects a part of that glory to our Author.

One particular of no slight consequence I had almost omitted: That as the Reader may without any intervening matters impertinent to his present purpose read the History of any Empire, or Kingdom Coemporary to it, by it self, so he may likewise observe that the principal passages in all of them are link'd together by Synchronisms, not only placed in the Margent, but in the beginning or end of every notable Occurrence.

Thus I have briefly and with much sincerity couch'd together some of those Excellencies, which amongst many others I have observed served in this Institution of History : of which if I may presume to give my private opinion, (though I am conscious to my self how little it ought to signifie to the World) I think the work taken altogether is for the order of it handsomly and judiciously contrived, for its stile perspicuous, and for the learning in the several parts of History, Antiquity, and Chronology, uncommon. Those who desire a greater politeness in the style may consider, that the florid way of writing, which hath undeservedly acquired so great a name to some of our own Age and Nation, is nothing proper to an Historian, and that our Author busied himself in matters more serious, and of greater use, he chose rather the plain but comely strength of the Doric Pillar, than the Effeminate, though curious shape of the Corinthian. For my own part, I confess that plainness and unaffected simplicity is pleasing to me : and I think no Intelligent Person that goes upon business, will leap Hedges out of the open and direct Road, to Travel over Flowry Fields, or painted Meadows.

CHAP. I.

First EMPIRE.*

Man created.

Falleth.

Expelled Paradise.

Cain killeth Abel.

N<sup>(c)</sup> the beginning God created the Heaven and the Earth. <sup>(c)</sup> Gen. 1. 1. By <sup>(b)</sup> Faith we understand that they were framed by his Word, so that things which are seen, were not made of things which do appear. <sup>(b)</sup> Heb. 1. 3.

2. Mans Habitation being made and conveniently furnished the sixth day ; then (and not till then) was he made of the Dust of the Earth, and, God breathing into his Nostrils the Breath of Life, he became a living Soul. Being placed in the Garden of Eden, and a meet Help wanting to him, Eve was framed of one of his Ribs. Of all the Trees of the Garden, except that of the Knowledge of Good and Evil, they might safely eat ; and at such time as they should eat of it, they were surely to die. But the Serpent beguiled the Woman, who did eat thereof, and giving to her Husband, he did also eat. Hereby they rendered themselves guilty of Temporal and Eternal Death ; they were condemned to Labour and Sorrow ; and those not confined to their own Persons, but extended to their whole Posterity, involved with them in the same Guilt : the demonstrating whereof might seem the Scope of this present Work ; nothing having succeeded but Vanity and vexation of Spirit ; nothing but Labour and Travail under the Sun.

3. Adam, being expelled Paradise, to till the Ground, begat of Eve his Wife Cain and Abel ; though in what Years is not expressed. Abel was a Keeper of Sheep, and Cain a Tiller of the Ground. By Faith, Abel offered to God a more excellent Sacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness that he was righteous, and contracted such Envy, that his Brother slew him in the Field. The voice of his Blood cried to God from the ground, and drew down this punishment upon Cain, (besides that of the Ground formerly laid upon his Father) to be a Fugitive and Vagabond in the Earth. Then departed he from the presence of the Lord, and went into the Land of Nod, where he built a City, and called it Enoch, after the name of his Son. His Family was propagated to Lamech, the fifth in descent from himself, by whom the Jews * have thought him to have been slain, by reason of Lamech's words to his two Wives : that he had slain a man to his wounding, and a young man to his hurt : if Cain shall be avenged seven-fold, then Lamech seventy and seven fold.

Seth's Birth. fold. After the death of Abel, Adam begat Seth, in the hundred and thirtieth year of his Age, as Moses (a) maketh exprets Mention; neglecting the Account of Time (c) Gen. 3. in the Family of Cain, because his wicked Race perished in the Flood: the Church of God being to be continued in the Posterity of Seth, of whom also (as to the Flesh) his Son himself wasto proceed.

And posterity. 4. In the Race of (b) Seth, is laid down the Account of Years from the Creation (2) Gen. 1. to the Deluge. For Seth, being born when Adam was 130 years old, begat (\)* here the Enos, at the age of 105; Enos being 90, begat Cainan; and Cainan when he was 70, begat Mehalelec. From the Birth of Mehalelec, to that of his Son Jared, passed in the fed 65; from Jared's to Henoch's, 162; and thence, to that of Methuselah, 65. Methuselah, when he begat Lamech, was aged 187 years; Lamech, when he begat Noah, was 182; and Noah at the Time of the Flood, had lived 600 years; all Greek γενεαι, which amount to the summe of 1656; each year of the Father's age being supposed complete at the Birth of his Son. All these, by Divine Providence, for the propagation of Mankind, obtained a very long time upon the Earth. Though Enoch had the shortest, yet he never died, being taken up by God, after broken Birth he had walked with him 365 years. Methuselah his Son, of all others, arrived at rather than the greatest age, being 969 when he died. Yet, in a certain sense, Adam lived longer than he; for being Created in his perfect strength, and fit for Generation, word genitus he had the advantage of 60 Years, before which age, we read of none of them to natus signify the have had any Children; Nature then requiring a longer time for maturity. If 60 Tartila Beatus salas's age by 21. Seeing the World required it, it cannot but be presumed, that each of these begat other Children, and some of them before these here mentioned. But such being but collateral to that Line, which was to be brought down to Noah, (who was to continue the Generation of Mankind, and to re-people the Earth) Moses, upon that account, had no occasion to make mention of them.

Man's wicked- 5. In the 480 year of the life of Noah, God seeing all Flesh to have corrupted it self, and as well the Posterity of Seth, as that of Cain, to be given up to all wickedness; it repented him that he had made Man. He resolved not always to strive with him, yet gave him the space of 120 years to repent in. If no amendment appeared in that time, he fully determined by an universal Deluge to destroy Man and his

Noah and his 6. On the 17th day of the 7th Month, the Ark rested upon the Mountains of Ararat, according to the Hebrew; if, in this place the Version of the 70, and S. Hierom in the Fulgur, be not rather to be credited (which have the 27th.) seeing it is not probable that the Ark should rest the same day, or two days before the Waters began to decrease. On the first day of the 10th Month were the tops of the Mountains seen; and forty days after, Noah sent forth a Raven which went and fro, until the Waters were dried up from off the Earth. The Raven returning no more unto him, seven days after he sent forth a Dove, to see if the Waters were abated, which finding no rest for the Sole of her foot, returned unto him. He stay'd yet other seven days, and again sent forth the Dove, which in the Evening brought in her mouth an Olive-leaf; so that he knew the Waters to be abated. Then, seven other days passed, he sent her out the third time, and the returned not

The Ark rest- 6. On the 17th day of the 7th Month, the Ark rested upon the Mountains of Ararat, according to the Hebrew; if, in this place the Version of the 70, and S. Hierom in the Fulgur, be not rather to be credited (which have the 27th.) seeing it is not probable that the Ark should rest the same day, or two days before the Waters began to decrease. On the first day of the 10th Month were the tops of the Mountains seen; and forty days after, Noah sent forth a Raven which went and fro, until the Waters were dried up from off the Earth. The Raven returning no more unto him, seven days after he sent forth a Dove, to see if the Waters were abated, which finding no rest for the Sole of her foot, returned unto him. He stay'd yet other seven days, and again sent forth the Dove, which in the Evening brought in her mouth an Olive-leaf; so that he knew the Waters to be abated. Then, seven other days passed, he sent her out the third time, and the returned not to him any more, the waters being now so much fallen, that the ordinary Hills might be uncovered, wherein the might continue and feed; although the Plains and Vallies were still overwhelmed. On the first day of the first Month of the 601 year of Noah's Life, the Waters were dried from off the face of the Earth; yet so, as it still remained moist and dirty, having been so long a time soaked with such a quantity of moisture. Therefore he stay'd yet 55 days more, till the 27th. day of the second Month, before he went out of the Ark; so much time having been requisite for drying the Ground (especially in low places) and for the growth of Grass, and other things necessary for the sustentance of Living Creatures, which had continued in the Ark 365 days, or a full Solar Year, which exceedeth the Lunar eleven days.

Where Ararat 7. The Ark rested upon the Mountains of Ararat; by which place most understand Armenia, rejecting the pretended Verles of Sibylla, which place it upon a Mountain of Phrygia, near to the City Celene, and out of which the two Rivers Marjyas and Meander do issue. Some will have it to have rested about Araxene, a Plain of Armenia, through which the River Araxes runneth, by the foot of the Mountain Taurus. But the far greater number confining both of Heathens, Jews, and Christians, pitch upon the Mountains of the *Gordyean*s, otherwise called Carduchi, Cardai, Cardai, Cardi, Cardi, Cardi, Cardi, &c. the Hill it self being variously named Kardn, Cardon, Khrud, Kardynus, Cardyean, &c. What Hill soever it was, it must have stood Eastward of the Countrey of Shinar or Babylonia, and the Vine must have naturally grown there; upon which, and other accounts these Gordyean Mountains are rejected by a Learned (*) Writer of modern times, who affirms that Ararat named by Moses, is not any one Hill, or called, no more than any one Hill among those Mountains which part Italy from France, is called the Alpes; and will have the same Ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, to keep the Name all along, and even in India to be called Ararat. For that the best Vine naturally groweth on the South-side of the Mountains Caucasi; and, because of other excellencies of that Soil, he thinketh it most probable that Noah there fed himself, and planted his Vineyard. And he alloweth best of the Opinion of Goropius Becanus, who conceiv'd the Ark to have rested on the highest Mountains of that part of the World.

8. Of this Deluge a Tradition remained amongst the Heathen. (a) Berosus the Caldean, Priest of Belus, and Contemporary with Alexander the Great, wrote of the Ark's resting upon the Gordyean Mountains of Armenia, and how those that came to see the Reliques of it (which yet were to be seen in his time) plucked off some Pitch, which they used to carry about them, as an Antidote against Infection. Herome the Egyptian, who wrote the Antiquities of Poenicia, related the same; besides Mnaseus, and many others: amongst whom Nicolas of Damascus is considerable, who in his 96th Book spake of the Hill Baris, in the Countrey of the Mymians; (a People in Armenia) upon which many saved themselves in a Deluge, and one being carried thither in an Ark, there rested; who might (saith he) be the same man concerning whom Moses the Law-giver of the Jews wrote. Xiphias by one (b) is related, being forewarned of a Deluge by Saturn, to have fled by Boat into Armenia, where, the Waters decreasing, he sent out Birds to discover dry Land; which, finding none, returned to him again. He is said by (c) a few to have escaped a great Deluge which hapned in his dayes (being also forewarned by Saturn thereof) by providing an Ark, wherein, with himself, Birds, Creeping things, and Beasts were preserved. (d) A third brings in an Egyptian Priest, declaring to Solon, out of the Monuments of Antiquity, that before the particular Oegyian and Dencalionian Deluges, there was an universal one, by which the Earth was much defaced. (e) Another yet telleth a Story like in all things to the History of Moses, but that Dencalion is placed in the room of Noah. The particular Deluges which hapned afterwards in Greece, and other places, have by the Ancients been confounded with this; and (f) some think they did not in reality differ from it.

9. Noah, before the Flood, begat three Sons, Sem, Ham, and Japhet; of which the last in order seemeth to have been the first in Nature, although the contrary Differ. (a) Sem is defended; and yet so, as Cham is never accounted the Eldest. (g) Noah is, with great probability, thought to be Saturn, so much talked of by the Heathen; for many things concur to persuade us to it. He was the common Father of all Mankind after the Flood, which thing is by Orpheus attributed to Saturn. Not only a just person, as Saturn (h) was, but a Preacher of Righteousness. From the time of the Flood to the Division of the Earth, he had a Natural Dominion over all Mankind, which space fitly answereth to the Golden Age under Saturn. In Orig. Roma.

that Age there was but one Language, which Mythologists (a) so far extended as to make men and Beasts to have spoken in the same Dialect. Noah is called an Husbandman, (or, in the Hebrew phrase, a man of the Earth;) and Saturn's wife, Rhea, is the same with the Earth: he (b) being also said to have taught Janus (c) Service in the Use of the Vine, and Sickle, in imitation of Noah, who planted a Vineyard. From Noah's once being overtaken with Wine, the liberty of the Saturnalia might proceed; and from his Curbing of Cham with Servitude, the Custom (e) observ'd amongst the Romans during that Solemnity, of exercising servile Offices. The occasion of the Curse was Cham's seeing his Father's Nakedness, and making a jest thereof; and the Poets (d) feign'd a Law made by Saturn, that none should see the gods naked and go unpunished. Saturn and Rhea are said (e) to have been begotten of the Ocean and Thetis, and thence the Ancient Romans would have (f) Titanus, the Badge of Saturn to be a Ship; which things touch with the History of (g) Vitis Aurea: Noah, Saturn devoted all his Children but these three, Jupiter, Neptune and Pluto, of Orig. Gen. who divided the World amongst them, as did Sem, Cham and Japhet. Of these, Roman, ad. instit. Cham, the youngest agreeth with Jupiter, being named Jupiter Hammon. Japhet with Neptune, for that he had his portion in Islands and Peninsulas. And Sem, being for his Goodness hated by Idolaters, might by them be condemned to Hell, and termed Pluto.

Cham is Jupiter, Japhet Neptune, Sem Pluto. The posterity of Sem.

10. Two years after the Flood, Sem being an hundred years old, begat Arphaxad, who is rationally (g) thought his eldest Son; although Elam and Affur (e) Jacobus be named before him; the Scripture in Genealogies not always observing the Order of Birth. Arphaxad at the Age of 35 years, begat a Son call'd Selah, according to the Hebrew; but the Greek Translation of the 72. maketh him at the Age of 135. to have begat Cainan, which is followed by Luke in the Genealogie of Christ. Much is said on both sides for these several Readings; but most likely it is that this Cainan was neither thought of by Moses, the 72. Interpreters, nor S. Luke; but that by a mistake of the Transcribers, he crept into the Copies of Luke, and the 70. Beza had a Copy of Luke very ancient, and now in the Publick Library of the University of Cambridge, wherein he is not found; and, what is more, he was not acknowledged by the Primitive Church, as appeareth by (h) Irenaeus: That the Version of the 72. most anciently had him not, is probably inferred from Josephus (i) Vitis Aurea who, though he wrote in Greek, and usually followeth that Translation, nameth him not; neither doth Epiphanius against Heresies; nor Hierome in his Hebrew Translation, though he there discourseth of the differences betwixt the Hebrew and Greek Copies. Neither is he read in all Copies of the 1. Chron. 1. In Moses he is no different, as to where to be found, either in the Hebrew Text, or the Chaldean, or Samaritan Versions. Selah (or Schelah) at the Age of thirty years begat Heber, from Et Chron. fac. whom many think the Hebrews, and the Hebrew Tongue to be so named. Heber being 34 years old, begat Phaleg, so called, because in his days the Earth was divided.

The building of Babel.

11. The Division of the Earth was occasioned by the confusion of Languages; and this, by building of the Tower of Babel. (i) Josephus telleth us that God had several times admonished men to separate themselves, and inhabit the Earth: which they impiously taking in an ill sense, as though he did it upon design to destroy them; at the instigation of Nimrod, the Son of Cham, and Nephew of Cham, (who now ambitiously affected Dominion over them) agreed to build a stately City, and a Tower which should reach to Heaven, to defend them from danger, in case another Deluge should overwhelm the Earth. They came from the East into the Land of Shinar, and there began their Work. Some put no other distinction betwixt the City and Tower but will have it only a City adorned with Towers. Others place them at a great distance from each other; but it (k) seemeth evident, that some one notable Tower was begun, and that in the City which was situate upon the River Euphrates. To put an end to this Design, God confounded their Language, that they understood not one another's Speech, and hereupon the City was called Babel, signifying Confusion; and the Land of Shinar, afterwards known by the Name of Babylonia, sometimes called Babel it self, and the City Babylon, in several Languages. Of this great Passage a Tradition also remained amongst the Heathen, as appeareth by (l) Abydenus, Hysticus, and Sibylla, who made mention of it; the Land of Sennar, and of Babylon, which they acknowledge was so called from Babel, in the Hebrew Tongue signifying Confusion. Hence also the Fable arose concerning the Giants fighting against the gods, and their making a way to Heaven by heaping Mountains one upon another; which Attempt was blasted by Jupiter's Thunderbolts.

Mentioned by Heathens.

The Fable raised thereupon by the Poets.

4. Mas.

Isaac the second Son of Elzer had thirteen Sons.

12. What the Sons of Ham (in opposition to the People of God so called) laboured to prevent in the Building of Babel, was thereby brought upon them; the Lord scattering them abroad upon the face of the Earth, and yet doing them more good than they intended to do themselves. Some will have the three Sons of Noah to have divided the Earth by Lot, which, as yet could not be sufficiently known; and at such a City (namely Rhinoecolia) as was not built till many Ages after, by (a) Affur, King of Assyria and Ethiopia: Nay, one (b) proceedeth so far, as to brand him with Heresie whoever doth not believe it. Cham, though the youngest, was advanced by the Heathen above the rest, and named Jupiter: Japhet, the Eldest, had the Prerogative of Birth-right; but Sem, for his Piety was preferred by his Father, through God's dispensation, and obtained the choicest Inheritance, which extended to this, and a better World. He hath five (c) Sons mentioned in Scripture, Elam, Affur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram. Of Elam descended the Elamites, or Elymeans, Neighbours to the Medes, and whom Luce placeth betwixt Media and Mejopotamia; from whom also the Neighbouring Regions were named: For Susan, the Metropolis of the Susians, is by Daniel placed in the Province of Elam; and besides that, (d) Gabriana, Carbana, Maffabica, and Sufana, as far as to the River Euleus; near the Mouth of which also upon the Persian Gulf, Pliny and others place the Elymeans.

13. From Affur descended the Affures, called afterwards Assyrians, and from him was named Assyria, properly so called, (which was the Country lying about Ninus, or Nimrod) named also anciently (e) Auria, and (f) Alyria, and in latter times (g) Alabene. In it Strabo placeth the Babylonians, Elymeans, Paracians, Gordians, Mejopotamians, Arabians and Syrians (from Aegypt to Pontus, where the Leuco-Syrians dwell) called also Affyrians. Syria and Affyria were of old time promiscuously used; but at length Custom obtained that Euphrates, or Tigris parted them. From Arphaxad, Josephus would have the Chaldeans issued, which, as he and others say, were anciently called Arphaxadeans; but in Scripture they are constantly read Chasdim, from Chesed, or Chased, Son to Nachor, the Brother of Abraham, and therefore owe their Original rather to him; and from Arphaxad seemeth to have received its Appellation part of Affyria, called Arphaxitis, and named Arrapachitis by Pliny. From Lud came the Lydians, anciently also known by the name of Maones, as we have it from Herodotus, and others; the Carians and Myrians also, who inhabited the South part of Asia, beyond the River Mander, being reckoned of the same Original by him: Of Aram descended the Arameans and the Arims, called Syrians, after the growth of the Affyrian Empire. Four Sons of Aram are mentioned by Moses, which (h) elsewhere are reckoned amongst the Sons of Sem, viz. Huz, Hull, Gether, and Mas, or Mejesh.

14. Huz, or Uz, by general consent of the Ancients, built Damascus. There being two besides of the same Name, this hath made a confusion amongst Writers. One (b) was the son of Nachor, the Brother of Abraham, whose Seat is called Aufitis (i) in the Greek, and his Posterity Aufitis, a People of Arabia the desert, mentioned by Pliny. (k) Another of the Posterity of Ejan, or Edom; who fixeth in Arabia the Stony, on the Borders of Canaan, from whom Idumaea is (l) called the Land of Uz. Hull (by Josephus named Otrus) as they say, inhabited part of Armenia. Gether was the Father of the Bagrians, according to Josephus; according to Hierome, of the Carians, and Acarmanians; and Mercerus strangely joyneth all these Nations, so far distant in place, together in Original. Mas (called also (m) Mejesh) is thought by Josephus to be the Founder of the Mejaneans, a People near the Coast of Palmyra, about the Mouths of Tigris. Hierome maketh him elsewhere from Lud. (n) Others will have him to have given Original to the People inhabiting the North-part of Syria, between Cilicia and Mejopotamia, near the Mountain Mafus; or to the Inhabitants of this Mountain, called Mafeni, and Mafiani. Elzer the Son of Selah, besides Phaleg, had another Son, named Joſan, whose thirteen Sons Moses relateth, as the Founders of so many Nations; Almodad, Sheph, Hazarmogeb, Jerah, Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimael, Sheba, Ophir, Untho, Sephar, and Jobab. Their dwelling was from Mejsha, as thou goest, faith Moses, unto Sephar, a Mount of the East. They inhabit, faith Josephus, from Cophene, a River of India, that Countrie of Syria which lieth upon it; as now the Text is; which cannot but be false Geography. And for Syria, Arta is rather to be read; which, as Pliny faith, according to the Judgment of others, included three other Provinces of the Gedrusi, Arachote, and Paropamisade, being terminated with the River Cophetes.

15. But neither in this place is there any thing to be met withal like Mefsa, or Sephar, or any people thereof of the same name with Joſhan, or his Sons; neither could that Ophir, to which Solomon ſent for Gold by Sea, and which they alſo will have denominatèd from one of the thirteen, be near Aria, which lieth at the foot of the Mountain Parapaniſus, at a vaſt diſtance from the Ocean. Great Bochartus therefore placeth them in the Mediterranean parts of Arabia the Happy, the Inhabitants whereof, if they may be heard, challenge Joſhan for the Founder of both the Arabian Nation and Language, calling him otherwiſe Cabitan. From Almodad then, defended the Anodeani, by the Greeks called Alumaeote, whom Pliny placeth in the middle of Arabia, near the Head of the River Lar, which emptieth it ſelf into the Perſian Sea. From Saloph the Salapeni, who lived more remote upon the Borders of Arabia Deſart, not far from the Spring of the River Beſtine. From Hatſaramaveh (which word is variously written, and by the Arabians called Hadramanth or Chadramanth) were named the Regions Adramyſta, Chatramis, Chatramitis, and the Inhabitants Athramotite, Chatramotite, Chatramote, Atramite, and Adramite, whoſe Metropolis was anciently called Sabota, Sabbata, Sanbata, at this day Sebam. From Jerach came the Alilai, a People inhabiting near the Red Sea: Jerachei in Hebrew, and Alilai in Arabick, being the Sons of Jerach, Hilal, or the Moon.

16. From Hadaram iſſued the Drimanti, placèd by Pliny upon the Perſian Gulf, near the Mace. From Uzal, the Inhabitants of the Kingdom of Aliean (in the Eaſtern part of Arabia) ſeem to be defendèd, Sanaa the Metropolis, being by the Jews ſtill callèd Uzal. Dicla, in the Chaldean and Syrian Tongues ſignifying a Palm; from him muſt that part of Arabia have been callèd, wherein that Tree moſt grows, inhabited by the Miniei, Obal (in the Arabian Tongue Aubal and Abal) ſeemeth to have paſſed over the Gulf into Arabia Troglodytica, and to have given Name to the Mart-Town and Bay of Abalites or Avallites. Abimael was the Father of the Malitie, whom Thophrasti maketh to have inhabited one of the four Regions fruitful in Spices. Of Seba came the Sabeans, properly fo callèd; namèd alſo Sabate, who dwelt by the Red Sea, betwixt the Minieans and Catabanes, which Nations alſo, together with the Chatramotes, are by Writers often includèd amongſt the Sabeans. Beſides this Seba, there were three others of that Name, and Founders of Nations. As (a) one the Son of Chus, another his Nephew by Ragnab, and the (b) third the Son of Jockſhan, and Nephew of Abraham. Seba the Son of Joſhan joynd to the Arabian Sea; the reſt to the Perſian; ſo that the Sabeans, (of whom the Greeks and Romans know no diſtinction) are ſaid by Pliny, to live from Sea to Sea. The Son of Jokan lived on Robbery; but the reſt by Commerce with other Nations. Ophir (in Arabick, Auphar, ſignifying muſt rich) gave Name to that part of Arabia near the Sabeans, which was inhabited by the Ceſſanite, Cafandres, or Gafandres, fo callèd from the Treasures; Gold, for its plenty, being here in little requiſt. Another Ophir there was alſo in India; in the Iſland Taprobane, as moſt probable; the Phenicians being accuſtomed to give old Names to new-found places. From Chaula the Son of Joſhan (for there was another of this Name, Son to Chus) defendèd the Chaulonite, callèd otherwiſe Carbi, and Cerban, the moſt warlike of the Arabians, whoſe Seat is yet callèd Chaulan. Of Jobah, the laſt of the thirteen, came the Jobabite, placèd by Pliny next to the Sachalites. This was the Habitation of the Sons of Joſhan from Mefsa, callèd otherwiſe Mufa and Muxa, a famous Port upon the Red Sea, as one goeth to Saphar a Mountain Eaſtward, where was a City of the ſame Name; both Port and City being well known to the Egyptians and Ethiopians, who uſed to trade into theſe parts. This was the Inheritance of the Sons of Seu, the choiſeſt of all, though containèd only within Aſia.

17. To Japhet fell a very conſiderable part of Aſia, and Europe, the leaſt of the Diviſions of the Earth, but better improvèd than the reſt, and far more populous; of later times the Seat of Learning, &c. of two Empires, which extended their power to the Inwards both of Aſia and Africa; and in an eſpecial manner bleſſed with more than worldly proſperity, ſince Japhet dwelt in the Tents of Sem. The Greeks acknowledgèd him for their Founder, by the name of Japetus, than whom they thought nothing more ancient. Mofes reckoneth ſeven of his Sons, and as many Nephews. The Sons are (c) Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Mefech and Titis. Joſephus maketh Gomer the Father of the Gatians, which if ſo, the ſame Original muſt be extendèd to the Gauls, of whom the other were but a Colony; and to ſome the Names of Cimmerii and Cimbri, whereby the Inhabitants of the Weſtern parts have been known, as alſo thoſe of Kumero, Kumeri and by Cymbro, which which our ancient Britains (of the ſame ſtock with the Gauls) callèd themſelves, ſeem to own no other Original. But another thinketh the Land of Gomer to be that part of Phrygia callèd Cateacene, lying upon the Rivers Cayſter and Meander, and the City Philadelphus; the Plains of which conſiſt of a burnt kind of Earth like Athes, and the Hilly parts are all Stony, the whole Countrey being brittle, adul, and eaſie to be inflamed. This he gathereth from the ſignification of Gomer and Phrygia, both which import Burning: Mofes (according to his Judgment) not always callèd the Founders of Nations by their true and proper Names, but by the Names of the Countreys which they plantèd. Ever when the word is of the Plural Number, as of the Sons of Javan, Chittim, and Rodanim; and all the Sons of Mifraim and Canaan (except Sidon and Ethi) muſt needs be Names of Peoples, not of particular Men. Hatſaramaveh he proveth to be the Name of a Place only; for that it ſignifieth the Region of Death; as Dikla, a place of Palm-trees; Ophir, a rich; Jobah, fo callèd from the Deſert, and ſeveral others.

3. Madai.

4. Javan.

His four Sons.

1. Eliſa.

2. Tarſiſh.

3. Kittim.

18. Gomer hath three Sons mentionèd by Mofes; Aſkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah. From Aſkenaz thoſe defendèd, according to Joſephus, by the Greeks callèd Regines; which who they were, is not to be undertood. Moſt probably, by Aſkenaz is ſignified Bithynia, in which is the Bay Aſcanius, beſides a Lake and River of the ſame name; or Troas and Phrygia the leſs, in which were Aſcania, both Countrey and City, and Iſland Aſcanie. From Riphath, Joſephus deriveth the Paphlagonians, a People of Aſia the leſs, near Pontus, and Neighbours to the Phrygians. Togarmah is variously expounded by Writers. It appeareth out of Ezekiel (a) that Gomer and Togarmah were not far diſtant; both North of Judea; and that from Togarmah came Horites and Mules to be fold at Tyre. Hereto well agreeeth the Opinion of Joſephus, who placeth Togarmah in Phrygia, to which Cappadocia was near adjacent, North to Judea, and excellèd in the Breed of Horites and Mules.

19. From Magog, Japhet's ſecond Son, defendèd the Scythians, according to Joſephus and others; Gog and Magog, being that part of Scythia about Caucasus, which the Colchi and Armenians (whole Language was half Chaldean) callèd Gog-baſan (i.e. the Fort of Gog) and thence the Greeks, Caucasus: to whom alſo Gogere was known, which Stephanus deſcribeth to be between the Colchi and Eaſtern Iberi. Magog ſeemeth to be the ſame with Prometheus. For as Prometheus was the Son of Japetus, ſo Magog of Japhet. Prometheus was feignèd to be fixèd to Caucasus, and Caucasus was the Seat of the Scythians of old time, till they expellèd the Cimmerii, and ſuccedeed them: Prometheus brought down Fire from Heaven, which might take Original from Magog his finding out of Metals in Colchis and Iberia. And the Fable of his Heart or Liver being eaten by an Eagle, may be found in (b) the word Magog, which ſignifieth to be diſſolved, or to decay. Hierapolis, a City in Syria, ſeemeth to have been callèd alſo Magog from him; ſeeing Deucalion the Scythian, and Son of Prometheus, is by Lucian ſaid to have conſecrated the Temple there to the Syrian Goddeſs. From Madai it's generally granted, that the Medes are iſſued; the Medes and Perſians being conſtantly in the Book of Daniel and Eſther, namèd Medai and Parſes. From Javan defendèd the Iones, (or all that inhabited Greece, from Thrace to the Iſthmus of Corinth, the Macedonians being includèd) Homer calling them Iomeres, and Alexander being ſignified by (c) Daniel under the Name of the King of Javan.

20. The Sons of Javan were Eliſa, Tarſiſh, Kittim, and Dodanim; from whom four Provinces took their Names. From Eliſa, Helis, according to Joſephus; but rather Elis (the moſt ancient and ample Region of Peloponneſus, part whereof is by Homer callèd Aſium) to be taken for the whole Peninſula. From Tarſiſh, Joſephus and others derive Tarſus, the great City in Cilicia; ſome Carthage; another Tunis; but Eusebius and Bochartus undertand the Iberians or Spaniards, amongſt whom was a place callèd Tarſiſus. Beſides this, there was another (*) Tarſis in the Indian Sea, whither Ships went from Eſſon-gabers; and indeed, whatever the word originally ſignifieth (whether Cilicia or any other place) it is ſecondarily applyed to the Mediterranean Sea, which reacheth unto Phœnicia, and ſometimes ſeemeth to denote the Ocean it ſelf. Joſephus will have Cittim to have poſſeſſed himſelf of the Iſland Cyprus, where was a City callèd Cittium, the native place of Zeno the Stoick; and hence, he ſaith, the Hebrews callèd all Iſlands and maritime places by the name of Cethim. Others will have the Chians, ſome certain Nations of India; others Cilicia, ſome, Macedonia to be undertood by this word. The Romans are by Daniel ſignified under this name, and in Italy were of old the Cities Cetia, Ecbetia, and the River Cetus; and Cittim imports the ſame thing with the word Latini.

um, betokening to lie hid. The Opinion therefore of Josephus is very probable, that these Islands and Coasts of the Mediterranean might be known to the Hebrews, under the Name of Cethim. Dodanum (omitted in Josephus) by some is interpreted Dardanians, by others Dodonians. But most anciently it was read Rhodanum, which the Greek renderth Rhodian, though the Name of Rhodes is later than Moses his time. Bochartus therefore placeth this People in Gaul, about the River Rhodanus (now Rhene) which he proveth not to have been so named from Rhoda, a Town there Founded by the Rhodian, he saith, signifieth Yellow, or Saffron-coloured, which agreeth well with the colour of the Hair of the ancient Gauls, either Natural, or Admixed; wherein also the Britains shewed themselves descended of the same Stock; as Jornandes judgeth.

5. Tubal.

21. Tubal and Mefech (the fifth and sixth Sons of Japhet) are joyned in Scripture, most commonly, together; as near to each other. Josephus, from them deriveth the Iberians, and Cappadocians, who had a City in his time, known by the Name of Mazacta. Bochartus understandeth by Mefech and Tubal, the Mofchi and Tibareni, which are so joyned together by Herodotus, as Mefech and Tubal in the Scripture. The Mofchi (besides Mofchiae, properly so called) possessed all from Phasis, as far as Pontus of Cappadocia; the Mofchian Mountains reaching so far. Then next succeeded the Tibareni, according to Strabo, who extendeth their Borders to Pharnacia, and Trapezond, the Mofchian and Colchian Mountains; so that they lay betwixt the Trapezuntians, and the Inhabitants of Armenia the less. Tubal and Mefech are noted by Ezechiel, to abound in Slaves, and Brass; which, by the Consent of Authors, fitly agreeth with the Regions of Pontus; especially, Cappadocia. From Thiras, most Authors derive Thrace; a Woman of which Country was called Threissa; and many Names there, both of Places and Persons, persuade the same thing. This was the Portion of Japhet, answerable to the Blessing of his Father; that God should enlarge him. For unto it belonged all Europe, how big soever, besides Asia the less, Media, part of Armenia, Iberia, Albania, and those vast Tracts towards the North, inhabited of old by the Scythians, and now by the Tartars: To say nothing of the New World, into which it's probable the Scythians passed by the Straits of Anian. To his Posterity belong the Northern parts, which by Jornandes, an Historian of the Goths, are deservedly termed, The Work-houses of People, and Seats of Nations.

Cham's portion.

22. Curfed Cham was not excluded from Earthly Blessings. To his Lot fell Ægypt, and all Africk, a great part of Syria, and Arabia, besides Babylonia, Susiana, Assyria, and other Countries, which his Grand-son Nimrod possessed himself of. David very often calleth Ægypt the Land of Cham or Ham: the Ancient Inhabitants themselves, Cham, or Cheania. In Arabia and Africk the Name of Ammon, (the Aspiration being taken away) was universally known, as appeareth by Ammon, a River in Arabia, the Promontory Ammonium, and the People called Ammonii. In Africk, the City Ammon upon the River Cynphus. The Chappell of Ammon in the Island Meroc. In Marmarica, the City Ammonia, vulgarly Paratonium: And the Ammonian Country, where was the famous Oracle of Ammon. Nay, all Africk was called Ammon, or Ammonia. Ham signifieth Hot: in which respect it agreeth well with the Greek word Zeni, the Name of Jupiter. Ham was Noah's youngest Son; so was Jupiter the youngest of Saturn. From Cham's living in Africk, the hottest part of the World, Jupiter may be called the Lord of Heaven. And Saturn's being made an Eunuch by his Son Jupiter (or Calus by his Son Saturn, as Macrobius hath it) seemeth to relate to that Fault, for which Cham received from his Father a Curse instead of a Blessing. Of these things Bochartus giveth abundant satisfaction, to name no more.

His four Sons.

1. Chus.

23. Four Sons of Cham are recorded by Moses; Chus, Misraim, Phut, and Canaan. From Chus, by a general Mistake, the Æthiopians in Africk have been thought to be descended; whereas, by the Land of Chus, in Scripture is meant (a) (2) Yis Bo-part of Arabia, inhabited by the Chusians, called also Cuthians; of whom were the Medianites, and Sephora the Wife of Moses, who did not file into Æthiopia, Italian 1.7. and there marry her. They inhabited above Ægypt upon the Persian Gulf, in part of Arabia the stony and the happy; thought by some to be the same with the Ancient Scenites, and the Modern Saracens, being called Scenites from dwelling in Tents; and Saracens, from their Robberies. Chus hath fix Sons mentioned; viz. Seba, Havilah, Sabitah, Raamah, Sabtecha and Nimrod. Raamah hath two, Sebea, and Deedan. All these inhabited about the Persian Sea; except Nimrod, whom Moses affirmeth to have fixed his Seat at Babel. By the Name of Misraim, is to be understood the Father of those who inhabited Ægypt, thrice in Scripture called

Misraim

Their Seat.

Misraim.

Misraim (the Singular Number of the word Misraim) as it's thought, from the straightness of it, being extended out in length from the Sea towards Syene. From Misraim, Moses deriveth seven People or Nations: Ludim, Ananiam, Lehabim, Pathrusim, Cafubim (out of whom came Philistim) and Caphortim.

Misraim's 8 Sons.

1. Ludin.2. Ananiam.3. Lhabim.4. Naphthim.5. Pathrusim.6. Cafubim.7. Caphortim.

24. Josephus will have the eight Sons of Misraim to have possessed all the Country lying between Gaza and Ægypt, though Philistim only gave Name to it; from whom the Greeks called it Palestina. Lybæ, he saith, led a Colony into Libya, which he named after himself; but as for the rest, he confesseth both their Names and Affairs to be obscure, their Cities being overthrown, as he saith, in the Æthiopian War made by Moses; concerning which he bringeth a meer Fable, taken out of Avi-pans, and the Inventions of the Hellenists. As for Ludin, Bochartus by ten Arguments proveth the Æthiopians to be meant thereby, whom he will have also a Colony of the Ægyptians. By Ananiam the Nemades of Africk, who inhabited about Ammon, and in Nafamoris, and for Ananiam, might easily be called Amorians and Ammonians; they being also a Colony of the Ægyptians and Æthiopians, as appeareth out of Herodotus. Of the same Original he maketh the Nafamones, Amantes, Hannanientes (who * made their Houses of Salt) and the Gavamants, * Solinus. l. c. 2. Lehabim or the Lehabians are thought to be the same with the Libyans bordering upon Ægypt, from whom this Denomination might pass to those that inhabited the greatest part of Africk. Naphthim he placeth in Marmarica upon the Mediterranean Sea; Pathrusim in Thebais, a Province of Ægypt, called Pathros, and by many distinguished from Ægypt, though Peopled from it.

25. Cafubim he maketh to signify the Colchi, though so far distant from Ægypt, out of which they descended; and from Palestine, the Inhabitants whereof descended from them; both their Language and Life in all particulars so absolutely agreed with the Ægyptians, of whom, by the Heathen also, they have been thought a Colony, left there by Sesoftris in his Expedition, though they be of more Antiquity than he. The Caphortim seem to have been Neighbours to him; from whom also, together with them, the Philistines descended, as appeareth from Scripture. They are therefore to be placed in that part of Cappadocia, which lieth next to Colchos about Trapezond. It is probable that, upon the Report of the Richness of these Places, the Ægyptians sent out a Colony (for this drew thither Phrixus, Jafon, Sesoftris, the Medes and Persians, and of later times the Saracens out of Arabia); which finding the Climate too cold, or the Country not to answer expectation, or perhaps molested by the Scythians and others; part thereof resolved to return home, and in their way seated themselves in Palestine, after they had expelled thence the * Amims. The Captain of this Expedition seemeth to have been Typhon, reported by the Greek Poets, to have made War against the Gods, and to have pierced as far as Caucasus; but, after many Battels, being stricken of Jupiter with a Thunderbolt, to have sined into Palestine; where he died at the Lake of Serbonis, and still lieth buried.

3. Phut.4. Canaan.

1. Sidon.2. Thub.

26. The third Son of Cham was Phut, who divided Africk with his Brother Misraim. To Misraim fell Ægypt, and most part of Africk, as far as the Lake of Tribonis, which divideth Africk into two equal parts. To Phut, all from the Lake, as far as the Atlantic Ocean, as may be gathered from (a) Herodotus. As far as the Lake, he saith, all the Africans used the Customs of Ægypt; but those beyond them towards the West, a far different kind of Life. Some Names retained a Memorial of Phut, as the City Pute; a River of Mauritania Tingitana, called Phut; and the Haven Phibia, mentioned by Pliny, and others. Canaan is the fourth Son reckoned in order by Moses. He begat Sidon, his First-born, and Hebæ, the Jebeiste, the Amorrhite, the Girgassite, the Ereite, the Arkie, the Snite, the Arvadite, the Zemarite, and the Hamathite. By Canaan was inhabited the Land, which thereupon bore his Name, and was afterwards conquered by the Hebrews. His Family was propagated as far as the Sea, the Phœnicians being descended of him, as Eupolemus an Heathen Writer, in his Book of the Jews, bare witness, saying, That Saturn begat Belus and Canaan; and the later begat the Father of the Phœnicians; besides, one Cna is said by Sanchoniathon (a most ancient Phœnician Writer) to have been the first Man that was called Phœnician; whence, by Stephanus, Phœnicia is called Cna, and the Phœnicians, Cnai. But, what is more, the Scripture calleth Phœnicia the Land of Canaan.

27. Sidon, the First-born of Canaan, was the Father of the Sidonians, or the Builder of the City Sidon, which was more ancient than Tyre, and the Metropolis to it; the Sidonians having led a Colony thither, and founded Tyre, according to Trogus (b) before the destruction of Troy; 240 years before the building of Solon's Temple, as Josephus counteth. The Children of Hebæ dwell in the Land of Canaan

The Ammonites passed the Mountains of Judea, and passing over Jordan, made War upon the Mobabites and Ammonites; seized upon Basan, Hebron, and all the Country lying between the River Jabbok and Arnon: in memory whereof, one of their Poets wrote a Poem, which Moses (*) hath inserted into his Writings. The Gergasites seem to have continued about Geresa, or Gadera, over against Galilee, beyond Jordan, (b) till Christ's time. The Hivites dwelt in Mount Hermion, towards the East of the Land of Canaan, from whom descended the Gibeonites, living high to Jerusalem, and the Schemites dwelling near to Sanaria, more towards the West. The Arkites inhabited Arca, or Arce, a City in Libanus, mentioned by Josephus and Ptolemy. The Sinites had a City called Sin, not far from Arce, according to Hierome: but Bochartus placeth them at Pelusium; Sin signifying Mud or Clay, as Pelos in Greek. The Aradites, or Aradites, seized upon the Island Aradus, on the Coast of Phœnicia, at the Mouth of the River Eleutherus, and part of the Neighbouring Continent, where was Actaradus, Marathus, and Laodicea. The Zemarites, or Semerites, dwelt (as it's thought) about Finesa, a notable City of Cappadocia, upon the River Orontes, and built Semara-jim in the Tribe of Benjamin. And the Hemathites were seated about the City of Syria, called Epiphania, and not at Antiochia, which is at too great a distance. This was the Inheritance of the Sons of Canaan, whose Border was from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar unto Gaza, as thou goest unto Sodom and Gomorrah, and Admah and Zeboim, even unto Lasha; which some interpret Cesarea Philippi, others Callichoë; but Bochartus thinketh it to be Lysa, a City of the Arabians, in the mid-way between the Dead, and Red Seas.

CHAP. II.

Of the Babylonian Empire, from the first Founding thereof, to its utter Subversion by Cyrus.

The Beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom.

After the Division of the Earth, Nimrod, as we said, the Son of Chus, and Nephew of Cham, fixed his Seat at Babel, and therein first began a Kingdom; having joynt to it (a) Erech, and Accad, and Calneb, in the Land of Shinar. By Erech, the Ancients understood Edeffa; and by Accad, Nisibis: But neither the Names nor Situation of these Cities do agree; they being in that part of Mesopotamia which lieth towards Armenia, and very far from Babylon. Therefore Erech is rather to be taken for Arceca, a City of Susiana upon Tigris, mentioned by Ptolemy, which also seemeth to be the same with America or Andevica (b) in Herodotus; Arb in the Persian Tongue signifying Great. And well Arceca might so be called, which was so long, that failing up the River, its one should meet with it three several days, one after another; as the Historian relateth. Bochartus thinketh Accad called also Archad to have given Name to the River Arad, which ran through Sittacena, a Province near to Babylonia, and since called Apolloniatis. By Calneb (which is also Calno and Cauno) is to be understood that City, by the Parthians re-built, and called Ctesiphon. It stood upon Tigris, three Miles from Seleucia, being the Metropolis of Chalontis, a Province denominated from it, and mentioned by Strabo, and others. Babylon was exalted by the Building of Seleucia, as Pliny (c) telleth us; and the Parthians built (or re-built) Ctesiphon in Chalontis, three Miles off, to drein Seleucia.

2. The Duration of this Babylonian or Assyrian Empire; till Sardanapalus, is variously assigned; the cause of which seemeth to be, for that some derive the Original thereof from the Birth of Chus, as Capellus* thinketh; and so Herodotus† Ad A. M. might assign 1520 years to the continuance of it. Others from the Beginning of 1822. p. 45 the Babylonian Kingdom, as Diodorus, who reckoneth 1400 years to the Death of Sardanapalus. Some from the Building of Nimrod, as Ctesias, who hath 1360.

And lastly, others from the Death of Belus, as *Trogu*s and Eusebius; who give to it 1300 years. That Nimrod should begin his Kingdom within an hundred years after the Flood, is not very probable; as neither, that the Building of the Tower of Babel happened within that time: which would have been too thort a space for the propagation of Mankind to go great Multitudes. An hundred years after the Deluge, Phaleg was born; in whose days it was that the Earth was divided. Some make the Division to have been at the same time of his Birth, and thence his Name imposed, as from a thing already done, or in doing. Others assign it to the latter end of his days, and will have his Name prophetically given by his Father: But there are not wanting, who take a middle way betwixt these two, and think the Division made when he was come to ripeness of Age, or in the middle of his Years; the Number of which amounted to 239. When Alexander the Great had conquered Babylon, which fell out about the 367th year of the World; Callisthenes the Philosopher, who followed him in his Wars, at the desire of Aristotle his Kinsman, enquired into the Antiquities of the Chaldeans, and could find no Observations of any longer date than 1903 years; which being cast back from the forelaid years, fall in their beginning, into 1772 from the Creation, the 116th from the Deluge, and the 16th of Phaleg's Life.

3. Nimrod, the Founder of this Empire, was by his Subjects named Bel, or Belus, which signifieth Lord, or Sovereign. That he was the Ancient Belus, is thence proved; that (*) most of the old Writers accounted Belus the Builder of Babylon, although foms attributed it to Semiramis; s herein relying upon the Credit of Cleſar, which now is deſervely ſuſpected by Learned men, and in no caſe worthy to ſtand in Competition with that of Beroſus, the famous Baſyleyan Prieſt ( who, as Pliny faith, had a Statue erected to his Memory at Athens, with a Gilded Tongue ) nor with that of Abydenus, who alſo collected his Hiſtories out of the Chaldean Archiver. After Moſes hath ſpoken of the four Cities, which were the Beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom; we read that out of 'that Land ( of Shinar ) Alſur went forth and built Niniveh, and the City Rehoboth, and Calah, and Reſen, between Niniveh and Calah. Some, according to this Tranſlation, will have this Aſſur to have been the Son of Sem, who having built Niniveh, and founded the Aſſyrian Kingdom, Nimrod diſpelled him, or his; or ſome manner of way obtained, and joyined it to the Babylonian, as Julius Africanus hath delivered. But others contend, that this Aſſur is the Name of the Countrey, and of a man; and that it is to be read And out of that Land went ( Nimrod ) Alſur ( i. e. Aſſyria ) and he built Niniveh. Otherwiſe they think it would be out of the ſcope of Moſes to mention the Son of Sem in this place, where he is in hand with the Genealogy of Cham; neither could it be peculiar to him to go out of this Land, and build Niniveh; ſeing alſo Mankind almoſt, at the Diviſion of the Earth, went out of it. The laſt Reading only maketh the Senſe entire; for how elſe could the four Cities properly be ſaid to be the Beginning of Nimrod's Kingdom, except he added more unto it? Laſtly, this ſeemeth very urgent, that in Scripture Aſſyria is called the Land of Nimrod.

4. He was a mighty Hunter before the Lord; or, therein none was to be compared with him; things being said to be such before God, as were to be indeed, or in an eminent manner; He judging not according to outward appearance, but as they are in their own Natures. By the means of Hunting it is probable that he made way unto his Monarchy: For under pretence of what was very necessary at this time (when men were few, scattered, and lying abroad, without defence against wild Beasts, which ever especially abounded about Arabia and Babylon) he might gather a Band of men, and by such Exercises (which the Heathens (a) by their Practice, as well as Opinion thowed to be convenient for breeding of Warriors) train them up, till he converted their force from Beasts, to Men. What was performed by him, seemeth to have been attributed to his Successors. Nimus is (b) said to have gathered an Army of Arabians, and therewith to have subdued the Babylonians; which seemeth to have related to his Conquest of that Country. For being a Chafar, and therefore called a Chafar, he might have the Assistance of his own Countrymen; and Kindred effect it, when he was rewarded with that Region above Tygris, which thence, was, by the Hebrews, called Chus; by the Egyptians, Chub; by the Greeks; and Chusazan, (i. e. the Province of Chus) by the Persians. From this usurping the Right of Noah, some think the Fable to have sprung, of Saturn being cast out of his Kingdom by Jupiter; the Word Nimrod signifying a Rebel, and answerable to his Carriage. He is also judged to be the true Baccus; this word being little changed from Bar-Chus, that is, the Son of

Chus. Bacchus was the Son of Jupiter, and he was the Grand-son of Jupiter Hammon. The most ancient Name of Bacchus was Zagrus, which signifieth a strong Hunter, answerable to the Epithete given to Nimrod. He undertook an Expedition into the East, wherein seemed to be contained the Fads of Nimrod, and his Successors. Bacchus was feigned to be born at Nysa in Arabia; and Nimrod was also an Arabian. And not unlikely might Nimrod be called to be over the Vines, who first reigned at Babylon, where was that most excellent kind of Wine, dignified by the Ancients with the Name of Nedar. To the Reign of Belus, or Nimrod, 65 years are given by Julius Africanus.

Ninus. 5. Ninus, his Son, succeeded him, and Canonized him for a God; which gave, as 'tis said, the first occasion to Idolatry. He made a Confederacy with Aricm, King of Arabia (which Country withstood most Conquests;) and then invading Armenia, forced Barzanes the King thereof, to submit to his Vassillage. Next he entred Media, where he took, and crucified Phamus, the King; and then, being pricked on by desire of Glory, and encouraged by his Success, he subdued all the People of Asia in seventeen years, except the Indians and Bactrians; the latter whereof, under Conduct of their King Zoroastres (or rather Osgartes; for Zoroaster, the great Magician, lived many Ages after) stoutly opposed him, and yet at length were brought under, as we have it from Diodorus, who reporteth also that Ninus built Ninive, which he so named after himself. Whether he, his Father, or Ninive. any other built it, a City it was of great Bigness, Strength, and Ornament, being in Compass sixty Miles; of a Quadrangular form, encompassed and fortified with a Wall a hundred foot high, and of such a Breadth as three Chariots might have been driven together a-breast upon it; adorned also with Towers 200 Foot in height. The place of it is not agreed of, and (b) some think there were two Cities of this Name; one upon Euphrates in Comagena, and another in Assyria, beyond Tigris. As for Ninus, many things done both by his Father, and Successors, seem to have been attributed to him. He reigned 52 years; and the manner of his Death is diversely related: (c) One saith, he was shot with a Dart as he lay before a Town. (d) Another writeth that Semiramis his Wife (whom he had chosen for her admirable Beauty, and now doated on) obtained leave to wear his Royal Robe, and reign over Asia five days; and then, when she had got the power into her hands, commanded one of the Guard to kill him: But a (e) third only relateth him to have been secured in Prison.

His Death. 6. He left a Son by Semiramis, named Ninus, who being but young, the put on Mans Apparel, and counterfeiting his Person, as well as Sex, is reported to have done very great things; part of which might rather be challenged by the two foregoing Kings, and by some that followed her. The Resemblance of her Son in all the Lineaments and Proportion of her Body took away Suspicion; for the further prevention whereof, she commanded the same kind of Garment to be worn by the People. At length, when she thought she had got Fame sufficient, she made her self known; which detracted not from her Glory, but added to the Lustre of it. She re-edified and enlarged Babylon, incomparably it with a Wall made up of Brick, Sand, and a certain Clay, or Slime, clammy like Pitch, which there abounded; and *retrained, by new works, the violence of Euphrates, which, formerly was wont to overflow into the Town. Not content with the Empire, as her Husband left it, she enlarged it with the Conquest of Ethiopia, and made War upon India, though without Success; in which Undertaking, the only had Alexander the Great her Emulator, as Justin affirmeth. But, after she had reigned 42 years, either for that she would have had to do unlawfully with her Son (being reported exceeding vicious of her Body,) or, because he was impatient of her so long retaining the Power, he flew her; although some say, the voluntarily resigned the Kingdom. After her Death, she was feigned to be turned into a Dove, and worshipped for a Goddess under that shape: the occasion of which seemeth to have been the Bearing of that Bird pourtrayed in her Ensign.

Ninus. 7. Ninus, or Ninus, (as Justin calleth him) succeeding, imitated neither Grandfather, Father, nor Mother; but giving up himself wholly to an effeminate course of Life, would be seen of none except Concubines and Eunuchs. Yet to him is ascribed that politick ordering of the Militia, which was imitated constantly by his Successors. A yearly Choice was made of Officers and Soldiers out of each Province, to lie in Garrison in the City, and to be ready at all Essays, there to continue for one year; at the end of which, they were succeeded by new Levies. Hereby, the Subject was contained in Obedience; and yet, by suffering the Soldiers no longer to continue together, all Conspiracies and Plots were prevented, which which might else have risen amongst such multitudes; the space of a year not being sufficient for such through and intimate acquaintance, as might produce any considerable Stirs. Those that followed Ninus, for thirty Generations, trode, for the most part, in his paths; nothing either memorable, or certain, remaining of them, except Tentamus the 20th. from Ninus, to whom Priamus King of Troy, when he was besieged by the Greeks, sent for Aid. This Tentamus is said to have sent him a Supply of 10000 Ethiopians, and as many of the Inhabitants of Susiana, with 200 Chariots, under the Command of Memnon, who bearing himself very valiantly against the Besiegers, was at length, by the wiles of the Thebians, circumvented and slain. From the Beginning of the Assyrian Empire, to the Destruction of Troy, Eusebius reckoneth 943 years, Cappelus from the Building of Niniveh, 995.

Sardanapalus. 8. The 23th in order, was Tonos-Concoleros, by the Greeks and Romans called Sardanapalus, ennobled only above the rest, for his excess in Effeminateness, and his ruine caused thereby. He spent all his time among Women; with whom he would sit and spin, imitating them in all things possible, so as scarce ever in his whole time was he seen of the other Sex. This extraordinary corruption in Manners gave occasion to two of his greatest Officers to compass his Destruction. For, Belsis (or Belochus) the Governor of Babylon, a great Magician and Astrologer, out of the Doctrine of the Stars, foretold to Arbaces Governor of Media, (otherwise called (a) Arbachus, (b) Orbachus, and (c) Pharnaces,) that one day he should obtain the whole Principality of Sardanapalus, and excited him to Attempts suitable to such an Attainment. Arbaces herewith puffed up, promised him the possession of Babylon, if his Prediction should take, and laboured to ingratiate himself with the Captains of the several Provinces. Then having a great desire to see what manner of Life the King lived, he hired an Eunuch to bring him into the Palace; where, beholding with his Eyes his dissolute Carriage, he despised him, and much more encouraged himself in the hope given him by Belsis. They now resolved, the one to draw the Medes and Persians, and the other the Babylonians, to revolt; and Arbaces communicated his Design and Purpose to the Governour of Arabia, his great Friend.

9. These things being as diligently put in practice, as readily undertaken, the next year an Army of 400000 men coming up to Niniveh, where the King then lay; under Pretence of relieving the former years Guard, resolved to employ their Force in the Ruine of the Assyrian Kingdom. Sardanapalus, having timely notice of the Revolt, drew out such Forces as were in the City, and falling upon the Rebels in the Plain, put them to the Rout. They flying to the Mountains, and recollecting their Courage, came down again, and engaged; but with the same success: after which they retreated to the same place. Hereupon, Arbaces calling the Officers together, to advise what was to be done, all of them were for disbanding the Army, and departing home, except Belsis, who, urging them with what the Stars portended, prevailed with them to stay; but to no other purpose than that the King might gain the third Victory, which shortly happened. Now they fully resolved to be gone; when Belsis, his Credit being deeply engaged, spent the whole night in viewing the Stars; out of the Mystery of which, he was bold to affirm, that Help would come of its own accord, and great Changes follow, if they would have Patience but five days longer. They being yet prevailed with for this once; before the five days were expired, News came, that great Forces were coming from Bactria to the aid of the King. To them Arbaces sent, and easily persuaded them to joyn with the Conspirators.

10. Sardanapalus knowing nothing of this, and puffed up with his Success, returned to his former Course of Life; which Arbaces understanding from certain Fugitives, and how his Army lay in a secure and careless posture, drew down upon it in the Night, and made a great Slaughter, and drove those that escaped, into Niniveh. Hereupon the King committed the Conduct of the Army to Salemenes, his Wives Brother, and took upon himself the Defence of the City; but the Rebels twice in the Field overthrew his Forces, and killed the General with most of his Souldiers. Then was the City closely besieged, and many Nations revolted to the Conspirators; which the King considering, and sensible of his Condition, sent out his three Sons and two Daughters, with a great Treasure, to Cotta, the Governour of Paphlagonia; and, dispatching Couriers into several Provinces, took what care he possibly could for the making of New Levies.

11. Neither was he behind-hand in providing all things within, that were necessary for Resistance. There being no fear of Storming the Town, by reason of the wonderful strength and height of the Walls. He considered the main danger to lie in the Affections of the Inhabitants; to whom, that they might have no cause to attempt any new thing, he supplied all Necessaries in a plentiful measure. Two years and above he held out, and doubted not but to be able to do it, till Relief should come; and the rather, for that they had an Oracle that Nimrod should never be taken, till the River first proved an Enemy to it; which he never could suspect. But in the third year fell such Rains, that Euphrates (or Lycus, upon which, some conceive that Strabo placeth the City, and not Euphrates, nor Tigris, as others) swelling with abundance of Waters, made a Breach in the Wall twenty Furlongs in length. At this, the King utterly discouraged, as judging the Oracle to be fulfilled, left he should fall alive into the hands of his Enemies, he built a Pile of Wood in his Palace, upon which he heaped his Treasures, and rich Attire; and, making a little Room in the midst, wherein he bestowed himself, his Concubines and Eunuchs, set fire to the Heap, and so perished with this Company and the Palace. Such was the end of him, who placed all his Felicity in his Sensual Appetite, which he would have also recorded in his (a) Epitaph, and advised the Reader to imitate. He is reported to have built (but rather he restored) two Cities of Cilicia in one day, viz. Tarusus and Anchialis; in the latter of which was his (b) Monument to be seen, being a Statue of Stone, with the Finger and Thumb of the right hand joined together, as about to give a Fillip. Upon the Monument was written in Affryan Characters, Sardanapalus the Son of Anacyndaraca built Anchialis and Tarus in one day. As for thee, Friend, Eat, A drink, and play; for all things else are not worth this, viz. that Fillip. In him this Line of the Affryans failed, the Empire being divided into two Principalities, after it had continued about 1400 years, reckoned from the Building of Babylon. Hence, this Fall of Sardanapalus happened about the year of the World 3186, 43 years before the first Olympiad.

verf. Tufc. l. 5. Quid aliud, inquit Aristoteles, in Babilis, non in Hominis Sepulchro incidit? Hec habet se dictis, que necesse quidem dicitur habere, quam finitatem.

12. The (c) Besiegers understanding what was become of Sardanapalus, presently entered into the Breach, and took the City. Then, investing Arbaces with a Royal Robe, they created him King; who rewarded them according to their Deserts, and allotted the Provinces to their several Governors. Belefsis, according to Agreement, having received the Principality of Babylon, and understanding from an Eunuch, how great Treasure Sardanapalus had burnt with himself, begged the Altes of Arbaces, under pretence of having made a Vow, in the Heat of the War, to carry them to Babylon, and therewith to raise a lasting Monument of the Destruction of the Affryan Empire. He being ignorant of his covetous Design, granted his Request; but, when the Matter was discovered, referred his Judgment to a Council of Officers, who condemned him to Death: Yet, being desirous to begin his Reign mildly, he not only remitted this Punishment, but permitted him to enjoy all the Gold and Silver already transported; and, what remained, which amounted to many Talents, he conveyed it to Ecbatane, the chief City of the Medes. (d) Diodorus and (e) Strabo tell us how he levelled Ninus (or Nimrod) with the Ground. Some (f) think it was only the Castle; seeing the City had afterwards Kings, if not comparable to the rest, yet great and powerful, which they might descend from Belefsis.

13. Herodotus (g) writeth, how the Medes, having freed themselves from the Affryan Yoke, lived for many Ages without a King, in a way of Popular Government. But (h) Ctesias of Cnidus, an Author of something a later Date (who served Cyrus the younger, in his Expedition against his Brother Ariaxerxes, and being taken Prisoner in the Battle, was for his excellent Skill in Physick, which he professed, received into Favour by the King, and lived in good Esteem in his Court 16 years, pretending to transcribe his History out of the Records of Persia), reported that Arbaces, after the Overthrow of the Affryans, reigned 18 years: as he left the Dominion of Asia to the Medes, so also the Sovereignty of them to his Son Mandaneus. That Mandaneus, having reigned 50 years, left the Kingdom to Sesarmus, who reigned 30. Him followed Artias, and reigned 50; then Artabianis 22; Arseus 40; in whose time the Cadusians revolted, through the Procurement of Parfodas, the President of his Council, whom he had offended. Artymes 22. Artabanes, 14; (in whose Reign the Partians revolted, and gave up themselves to the Sacæ.) And last of all, Alyages his Son, who being overthrown by Cyrus, the Empire was thereby devolved upon the Persians.

14. That

14. That Ctesias out of Design, wrote things contrary to Herodotus, is probable enough, and that he is Fabulous, cannot be denied; yet have we a Succession of Kings elsewhere (a) recorded, though such an one, as scarce in one Name agreeeth with that of his. Sesarmus is said to have succeeded Arbaces, and continued 30 years; then Medidus, 40; Cardaceus, 13; and then Deioes, whom Herodotus will have first obtained Sovereignty over the Medes. For having, as he (b) writeth, an Ambition that way, he made himself Popular by pretence to the Love of Justice, which then ran at a low Ebb amongst them, for want of Authority. He first took upon him to decide the Controversies of his own Villages, which, performing with much Equity and Confidence, thence became known to other Parts; and at length became so Famous, that few would bring their Causes before any other Judge than him alone. Being aware of this, he withdrew himself, giving out, that no longer could he undergo such a Burden, and thereby neglect his Private Affairs. Hereupon, Robberies, Violence and Oppression returned throughout the Country; inasmuch, that the People, gathering together from all Quarters, after a serious Debate, concluded there was necessity of having a King, under whole Protection every man living might the better mind his Domestic Matters. Deioes was chosen by universal Consent, who, having got the Power into his Hands, caused them to build a City for his Residence, which he called Ecbatane; and having ruled with abundant Severity, 53 years, left the Kingdom to his Son Pthariotes. He, after he had Reigned 22, left, for Successor, his Son Cyaxares, who having long struggled with Various Fortune, (as afterwards will be seen) gave place to his Son Alyages, Father to Mandane, the Mother of Cyrus. 15. Belefsis obtained Babylon, as was said; but how long he held it, or who succeeded him immediately, is not known. About 71 years after, Nabonassar, or Nabonassar, obtained the Kingdom there; from the Beginning of whose Reign, that famous Era, or Epoche, known by the Name of Era Nabonassari, is derived. It is counted from the first Day of that Ægyptian Month Thoth (Feb. 26.) which fell out 746 Julian years, and 310 days before the Era of Christ, as Capellanus, and others reckon; 424 years before the Death of Alexander the Great; according to Ptolemy (c) the Prince of Mathematicians, in the 8th. Olympiad. This Author hath preserved the Names of such as Succeeded Nabonassar, in his Catalogue of Kings. He Reigned 14 years; after him, Nadins, 2; then Chesterus, or Purns, 53; Jugens, or Iulenus, 5; and then Mardocempadus, 26. In his Time happened the three most Ancient Eclipses of the Moon, observed by the Babylonians: The first of them in the first of his Reign, and the 28th. of the Month Thoth, and the 27th year of Nabonassar. The second, in his Second year, on the 18th of Thoth. And 176 days, 20 hours and an half after this, the third Eclipse fell out, on the 17th day of the Month Phamenoth. Scaliger and others, think this Mardocempadus to be the same with him, who, in the (d) Scripture is called Merodach-Baladan, the Son of a King, 2 Kings. 17. But Capellanus conjectureth there were two Merodachs: Sons of Baladan, and Nephews of Nabonassar, whereof the one was called Merodach-Kempad, and the other, Merodach-Baladan. 16. Mardocempadus, having Reigned 12 years, was succeeded by Arkiamis, who ruled 5. Then followed an Inter-regnum for two years; after which, Belbus obtained the Kingdom for 3; then Apronadus, 6; Rigibehd, 15; Mesfemardak, 4; after whom, another Inter-regnum ensued for eight years, he being said to have written Mesfemardak. Now the Royal Race seemeth to (f) one, to have failed, and (g) Sarchaddon the King of Affria, to have again subjected the Babylonians to his Kingdom; and his Reason is, for that he who followed at the end of this Inter-regnum, is by Pholony called Asfardadus, which he thinketh to differ only from Sarchaddon in the Sound of several Languages. If so, this is he, who brought out of the East-Country, Strangers to inhabit Samaria; whence, Salsumasser had, 40 or more years before, transported the Ephraimites. He is also, by the Posterity of this new Colony, called the Great and Noble Asfapper. But how this Affryan Kingdom had sprung up again, during these two Principalities of the Babylonians and Medes, is to be considered.

17. It is not probable that the vast Empire of Sardanapalus was all (nor perhaps the greatest part) subject to Media and Babylon; but that, although Arbaces left not the Medes to their Liberty, yet several People he did, for want of Power to keep them under: Hence, in some time, the People beyond Euphrates, weary of that Anarchy and Confusion under which they laboured, might be willing to admit of a Prince again, though not of the Old Stock of Beltis; whose Successors, having far excelled in Power and Dominion, the Greeks accounted Sardanapalus the the last King of the Assyrians. Who this new Prince should be, remaineth very obscure. One (a) thinketh him that same Phul who made an Incursion into the Land of Israel, in the Time of Menachem, fixing the Beginning of his Reign in the 4th Olympiad, 17 years before that of Nabonassar. Another (b) will have Tiglab-Pilefar (or Thilgath-Pileser, or Thelath-Phalsar) to be the man (in Helian, he faith, called Thilgannus) whom also he accounteth the same with Ninus Junior, mentioned by Eusebius, (c) having assumed the Name of the first Founder of the Assyrian Empire. This Tiglab-Pilefar, at the Invitation of Judah, went up against Rezen (d) King of Damascus, and killing him, transported his Subjects into Kira, a place, (as Josephus will have it) of Upper Media. He died when he had Reigned 19 years, and was succeeded by Salmanassar; to whom (e) Hofea King of Israel refused to pay Tribute, entering into Confederacy with So King of Egypt against him: But Salmanassar besieged him in Samaria, and at the End of three years, taking the City, carried the Israelites into Captivity unto Chelach, Chebar, and Nebhar-gelzan, A. M. 3273. Cities of Media; where he, as well as his Predecessor, might have Power, if, (*Dei*ces, as yet, not having obtained the Kingdom) that Country was still subject to a Popular Government, or rather in a Confused Anarchy.

18. After the Subversion of the kingdom of Israel, he over-ran all Phenicia and Syria. He sent an Army against the Tyrians, at such time as Elulais their King, made War upon the Citteans, which had Rebelled; but a Peace was presently made, and he drew back his Forces. Not long after, Sidon, Arce, Paletyrus, and other Towns revolted from the Tyrians, to him; so that they alone standing out, he returned; and having a Supply of 60 Ships from the Phenicians, engaged with them in a Sea-Fight; but they having but 12, yet overthrew his Fleet, and thereby obtained great Credit. At his Return, he set Guards upon the River, and Water-Courses, and there kept them five years together; which constrained them to make a Shift with Wells and Pits, as Menander (f) related out of the Tyrian Annals, Translated into the Greek Tongue, wherein the Name of Salmanassar was Recorded. Salmanassar dying, Senacherib his Son succeeded him; (g) called also Sargon in (h) Scripture, as some think. He infested all Asia and Egypt with War; into the latter of which as he descended, in his Retreat he fore (i) distressed Hezekiah King of Judah, who making his Application unto his God, (j) obtained Deliverance, to the Confusion of the Assyrian and his Army. Herodotus (k) telleth a Story, How when he came to Pelufium, Seteb, the Priest of Vulcan, then King of Egypt, by his Prayer to his god, procured all the Habilliments of War to be eaten with Mice; so that being rendered unable to fight, he was forced to draw back his Army. But the Prophecies against Egypt ascertain us, that this Expedition proved very disastrous to it, and that many Captives were thence led away; yet the Priests, from whom Herodotus had his Information, hid this, and all other things that tended to the Dishonour of their Country.

19. Returning from Egypt into Palestine, he besieged (l) Lachish, and thence (m) removed to Lisibab, where he wrote a Blasphemous Letter to Hezekiah. For, hearing that Tirihab King of Ethiopia (or Arabia) (n) by Josephus called Tharpeus; by Strabo, Tarkon was coming against him in behalf of the Egyptians; he removed for Fear; and God sent his Angel into his Camp, who flew in one Night 85000 men; which thing, as a Plague, was also recorded by (o) Berosus. Then returned (p) he (as God had promised Hezekiah) with great Conflagration into his own Land; where, raging against the Jews that dwelt at Nimveh (if Credit be to be given to the Book of Tobit) he was, after 44 days, slain in the Temple of his Idol Nisroch, by his two Sons Adramelech and Sharezer, (who fled for it into the Land of Ararat, or Armenia) and Esarchaddon his Son Reigned in his stead.

20. This Esarchaddon is thought (and that probably) to be the same with Asseraddus, mentioned by Ptolemy, in his Catalogue of Kings, and who subdued Babylon. It is also thought that (q) this is he, who, when he brought a new Colony into Samaria from Babylon, Cathab, Ana, Hamath, and Sepharvaim, at the same time making an Inroad into Judea (as 'tis very probable) took (r) Mennesech, the King thereof in the Thorns, and carried him in Captivity into Babylon; for it appeareth from both these Passages mentioned in Scripture, that at this time that City was subject to the King of Assyria. After Esarchaddon (or Asseraddus) had Reigned thirteen years, Sauldus succeeded him, according to Ptolemy; and not Merochad, whom the general Opinion will have (being King of Babylon) to have killed him, and again overthrown the Empire of the Assyrians. For this Succession is founded upon a feigned (s) Author imposed upon the World, with several florid Antiquities. vid. Joh. Grotium Biblioth. Hist. Tom. 2. p. 356. Gesh. barriam. lib. 2. p. 286. 407. 417. 431. Sth. Catv. flog. ceter. cap. 28. 29. & Ciron. p. 171. A. Non est germanum opus. Pam. in Tert. Apol. n. 287.

others of the same Credit, and therefore deserveth to be rejected. The time of this Sauldus falling in with that of Deiaces (who according to Herodotus, built Ecbatane the Metropolis of Media) if any Credit be to be given to the Book of Judith, we may judge him to be that Nabuchadonosor mentioned there to have overthrown Arphaxad, King of the Medes, and Builder of that City in the great Plains of Ragan. After he had taken him in the Mountains, he slew him, plundered Ecbatane, and then returned victoriously unto Nimveh, where he Feasted his Army for 120 days. The Year after, entering into Conflation how to subdue the several Nations about him; he ordained Holophernes his General, who straightly Besieged Bethsara, a Town of Judea; by the Wisdom and Courage of Judith, the Widow of one Manasses of the Tribe of Ephraim, was circumvented, and had his Head cut off in his Tent.

Chunladasus.

21. Sauldus (or Sauldus) having Reigned twenty years, Chunladasus succeeded him, thought also to be the same with Saracus, mentioned by Alexander Polyhistor. Against him came (a) Pharaces, the Son of Deiaces, in revenge of his Father's Death; after he had first of all others subdued the Perfians, and the rest of Asia. But his good Fortune here forsook him; and he perished with the greatest part of his Army, in the 22th. year of his Reign. His Son Cyxares Succeeding, is said to have been more puissant than his Ancestors, and the first that distinguished the People of Asia into several Provinces, and Souldiers into their several Ranks of Pikemen, Horsemen, and those that used Darts. He fought with the Lydians; at which time to great an Eclipse of the Sun happened, that the Day seemed to be turned into Night. Having brought to his Obedience all Asia, beyond the River Halys, he gathered his Forces together, and went against Nimveh, with Intentions to destroy the City. He overthrew the Assyrians in Battle, and Besieged the Place; but it happened at this time that a great Army of Syrians, having driven the Cimmerians out of Europe, under the Conduct of Madjes, the Son of Prothysa (called otherwise Judathyrus) their King, still followed them, and from the Lake Meotis, leaving the Mountain Caucasus on their right hand, pierced into Media.

22. Cyxares hereby was constrained to raise his Siege, went, and gave them Battle; but was overthrown, and lost the Dominion of Asia; which, the Syrians having obtained, marched straight for Egypt. Phameticus the King met them on their way, when they had new entered Palestine, and by good Words, back'd with Money, prevailed with them to go no further. They enjoyed the Dominion of Asia 28 years; after the expiration of which Term, managing their Affairs with as great Neglect, as formerly they had used Diligence in polling and rifting the Country; the greatest part of them being entertained by Cyxares, were made drunken, and slain, and the King recovered his Dominion. During these things, (b) Nabopolassar a Babylonian, and General to the Assyrian King, contracted Affinity with Astages the Son of Cyxares, and Governor of Media: Nebuchadnezar, the Son of Nabopolassar, marrying Amylis Daughter to Astages. The Effect of this Alliance was, that they jointly set upon Barachus, or Cynladanus in Nimveh, and taking the City, slew him therein, after he had Reigned 22 years. At this time the Prophecies against Nimveh seem to be fulfilled in its Destruction. For in the latter end of the Greek Book of Tobit it is written, that Nebuchadnezar and Astages took Nimveh, Tobias being yet alive, who is said to have lived 127 years (or, as the Latine hath it, 99.) 95 having already passed from the taking of Samaria; at which time he was carried Captive with his Father into Assyria by Salmanassar.

Nabopolassar.

23. Cynladanus being dead, Nabopolassar (or Nabulassar) obtained his Kingdom in the 123d year of Nabonassar, according to (c) Ptolemy, whose Canon of Kings also (as to the Term of Years collected from the particular Reign of each) directly answereth to this Account. (d) Against him came up Pharob Necho, and took Carchemish, a City situate upon Euphrates, killing Josiah the King of Judah, who attempted to stop his passage. He holding this Town, the (e) Governour of Celofyria and Phenicia, revolted from the Babylonian; who, being now unable to undergo the Trouble of War, made his Son Nebuchadnezar King with him, in his 17th. year, and sent him with an Army to subdue Egypt and Syria; with him joynd (f) Ashbaces, King of the Medes, whom some think to be Cyxares; and others, more probably, Astages his Son. In this Expedition he made Jeboja, King of Judah, his Tributary, and drew him from the Obedience of Egypt; which Necho taking in Diddan, came up against him, and engaging once more at Carchemish, was overthrown, and slain, as may be gathered out of Scripture.

ture. Whilst Nebuchadneſar was prosecuting his Victories, overrunning all from the River of Ægypt to the River Euphrates; in the mean time his Father, being ſick at Babylon, died; after he had Reigned twenty one years, as it is now in the Catalogue, for which ſome Learned men think, 29 is to be read. He underſtanding hercof, diſpoſed of the Affairs of Ægypt and other Countreys, and giving Order for the Conveyance of the Judean, Syrian, Phœnician, and Ægyptian Priſoners, he himſelf made haſt through the Deſart, and took Poſſeſſion of the Government reſerved for him by the Chaldeans.

his great Exploits and Buildings.

24. He diſtributed the Captives into Colonies about Babylon, adorned the Temple of Pelus (which Semiramis had built) with the Spoiles; repaired and increaſed the Buildings of the City, and fortified the Chanel of the River, that the Enemy ſhould not make Uſe of it againſt the Town. He added a new City to the old, and compaſſed both with three Walls of Brick. He raiſed divers remarkable Edifices, built a new Palace, and about it a Garden or Wilderneſs, ſo much celebrated by the Grecians. His Wife being a Mede, and according to the Nature of her Country, delighting in mountainous woody Proſpects, brought him to imitate with Art, what was wanting in the Plains of Babylon. This Garden was made four-square, taking up in Compaſs ſixteen Acres, in height equalling the Walls, fet with tall and beautiful Trees. It was borne up by ſtone-Pillars; upon which a Pavement of four-ſquared Stones being laid, Earth was heaped up to great Quantity, and Engines were made for the Conveyance of Moiſture out of Euphrates to water it. The Trees that grew upon it were (many of them) eight Cubits in Compaſs at the Boles; and fifty Foot high, bearing Fruit as plentifully as in their Native Soil. Jehoſhaphat the King of Judah, rebelling againſt Nebuchadneſar, he came up againſt him, waſted the Country, and taking him, caſt him out unburied, as the Prophet Jeremiah had foretold. Four Months after, he ſo carried away Captive Jechonias, or Jehoſhaphat his Son, and made Mattaniah his Uncle King in his ſtead. This Mattaniah, whom he named Zedekiah, rebelled againſt him, notwithstanding his ſolemn Oath of Fealty taken at his Inſtitution; and therefore in the eleventh year of his Reign he was alſo taken by the Babylonians, had his Eyes put out, and was ſo carried to Babylon: the Temple and City were burnt with Fire, and the People led into Captivity, as will appear in its proper Place.

his Pride.

25. Nebuchadneſar returning home, was exceeding Proud, and puffed up at his Succels. He erected a great Image of Gold; in the Dedication whereof, all his chief Officers were commanded to fall down and worſhip; which was obeyed by all except three Jews, Shadrach, Mefhach, and Abednego, the Companions of Daniel. For their Punishment they were caſt into a fiery Furnace, heated seven times hotter than usual, and so miraculously preserved from the Fury of the Flame, that not an Hair of their Heads was sing'd; though it killed those that caſt them in. At this, the King aſtoniſhed, by publick Edict acknowledged Gods Power, and forbad the blaſpheming of him. Yet repented he not of his Pride, and notwithstanding a ſufficient Warning given him by God in a Dream, exalted himſelf in the conceit of the Greatneſs and Splendour of Babel, which he had built for the Houſe of the Kingdom, by the Might of his Power, and for the Honour of his Maſteſty. But the ſame Hour, as he was answered by a Voice from Heaven, the Kingdom departed from him, he was driven from men, made to eat Graſs as Oxen, and his body was wet with the Dew of Heaven, till his Hairs were grown as Eagles Feathers, and his Nails like Birds Claws, and ſeven times paſſed over him, till he knew that the moſt High ruleth in the Kingdom of men, and groweth to whomſoever he will. And this time prefixed being expired (ſeven years as moſt ſuppoſe, though ſome reckon but three and an half, counting for times, Winter and Summer) his Reaſon returned to him, with the Glory of his Kingdom, his Honour and Brightneſs, his Counſellers and his Lords ſought unto him, he was eſtabliſhed in his Kingdom, and excellent Maſteſty was added to him. Therefore he ſhamed not by a publick Writing to own the thing, praized, honoured and extolled the King of Heaven, all whoſe work he confeſſeth to be Truth, his wayes Judgment, and that thoſe that walk in Pride he is able to abaſe.

What is found recorded of him by the Hebræans.

26. Of theſe ſtrange Paſſages the Heathen were not utterly ignorant. Alydenus wrote, that being exceeding proud, and going up upon his Palace, he was taken with a divine Fury. This he had out of the Annals of the Chaldeans, who fancied him to have been ſeized on with a prophetic Spirit, and ſo to have vaniſhed. Megasthenes in his fourth Book of India, endeavourd to ſhew how this King in valiant Exploits exceeded Hercules by far; that he ſubdued the chief City

What he did againſt this City, God taking as Service done to himſelf, promiſed him the Land of Ægypt for his Wages, which we muſt accordingly believe to have been paid. At length, having foretold that Babylon ſhould be loſt to Cyrus, as Alydenus wrote; he died after he had reigned forty three Years, being in Ptolemy's Catalogue of Kings, called Nabocallaſſar, which may be corruptly written for Nabocodonaſſar.

Eximrodach.

27. Eulmerodach his Son ſucceeded him, who lifted up the Head of Jehoiakim King of Judah, in the 37th year of his Captivity, ſpoke kindly unto him, let him ſit upon the Throne above the Throne of the Kings that were with him in Babylon, and changing his Priſon-Garments, allowed him a continual Diet all the days of his Life. But for his Wickedneſs and Debaucheries, he continued not long, being circumvented by Nerigliſſar his Siſter's Huſband, and ſlain when he had reigned but two years. Nerigliſſar after his Death, reigned four. After him came his Son Laborſardochus, who being of an untowardly Diſpoſition, was made away by his Relations, after nine Months, and they preferred to his Place one Nabonidus a Babylonian, by Ptolemy called Nabonadus, by others, Nabannidochus and Labyntus. [Who reigned ſeventeen years, for which ſome think twenty ſeven is to be read.] This Succeſſion we have from Berofus the Chaldean, atteſted by Ptolemy, who yet leaveth out Laborſardochus, either for his final Continuance, or becauſe he reigned together with his Father. But learned men do not agree in the manner of reconciling this Hiſtory, with what Daniel hath written of Belſhazzar. Some will have Labyntus or Nabonadus, to be Belſhazzar, Nabonadus being the laſt of the Kings, which Belſhazzar alſo ſeemeth to be; at his Death, Babylon being taken by Cyrus, as the Interpretation of the Writing on the Wall hinteth: Peres, Thy Kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Perſians. As for Darius the Mede, he ſeemeth to them to be noother than Cyaxares, the Son of Alyages King of Media, and the Uncle of Cyrus, who of his own Accord delivered Babylon to him: and they think this ſufficient to prove that Laborſardochus could not be Belſhazzar, becauſe he hath but nine Months allotted him by Berofus, whereas we read in Daniel of the third year of Belſhazzar.

Whether the
ſhazzar.

28. Others think they have ground enough to deny Nabonidus to be Belſhazzar; who is called the Son of Nebuchadneſar; in regard no ſuch Relation is mentioned by Berofus, that can intitle him to ſo much as his Grand-child, which Laborſardochus was by his Daughter, being called his Son by a common Hebraiſm: For the Latin Verſion of Joſephus, which maketh Nabonadus of the Blood; it is in no caſe agreeable to the Original, which plainly relateth him to have been of the Conſpiracy. For the fifth year of Belſhazzar, it well enough agreeth with Laborſardochus, becauſe he reigned four years with his Father; and after his Fathers Death, nine Months by himſelf. Now the Hiſtory of Daniel only relateth Belſhazzar to have been ſlain, not that Babylon was then beſieged by Cyrus: it being improbable, ſay they, that a time of ſo great Danger, the King and his Nobles ſhould ſpend in Feaſting and Jollity; but rather likely, that behaving himſelf too indolently in that drunken Fit, he was knocked in the Head by his Companions, as Berofus hinteth, and the Scripture rather ſeemeth to approve than contradiſt. As for the Interpretation of the Writing on the Wall, it might note what was already determined, and within a little time was to be accompliſhed, concerning Cyrus the Perſian, who being at that time known to the World, could not be hid from Daniel, who had met with his name long before in the Prophecy of Iſaiah, and had his Mind, without Doubt, fixed upon the 70 years of Captivity foretold by Jeremiah, to which a Period ſhould ſhortly be put by that Perſon. That Darius Medus was of Median Deſcent, appeareth, but that he was King of the Medes, can no way be evinced; eſpecially ſeeing that no ancient Greek Hiſtorian maketh mention of Cyaxares the Son of Alyages, (whom we read to have had but one Daughter) except Xenophon; and he, either one Purpoſe ſeemeth to thwart Hærodotus, or to have written his Cyropædia, rather (2) to ſhew, what a Prince ought to be, than what Cyrus was indeed, and ſo to have taken ſome of that Liberty of Invention which others (3) have done of late upon the ſame and other Subjects. But though Joſeph Scaliger may ſeem to theſe more Reaſon for this latter Aſſertion, yet Pererius truly affirmeth the thing to be obſcure, perplexed, and difficult.

29. If Laborofardochus be taken for Belshazzar, then Nabonodus must be the same with Darius Medus; whom further, some would have to be the Brother of Astyages, not his Son, and yet called Cyxaxares. In him the Empire of the Babylonians ceased, and was derived upon the Persians by Cyrus, whose first Beginnings are to be viewed, with the Progress of his Actions, which made way to that Pitch of Greatness whereto he arrived. Herein Historians do not relate the same things. That Astyages was his Grand-father is acknowledged by all, except Ctesias, who will have them nothing akin, and calleth him Astysages: His Father's name is granted to be Cambyses, his Country Persia, but his Condition is diversely reported of. Herodotus writeth how Astyages dreaming two Dreams concerning his Daughter Mandane, (which by the Wizards were interpreted to portend the Loss of his Kingdom, through the Greatness of her Issue) gave her in Marriage to one Cambyses a Persian, of obscure Fortune; and not satisfied in this Security, sent for her when she was with Child, and as soon as the Boy was born, gave him to one Harpagus to be made away. Harpagus fearing he might afterwards be called to an Account by the Mother, for Violence offered to the Babe, delivered him to the Kings Shepherd, to be exposed in the Woods to the Mercy of the wild Beasts. This being done, and the Shepherd's Wife lately brought to Bed of a still-born Child, she prevailed with her Husband to fetch him home; nursed and brought him up as her own Son amongst the Shepherds. At seven years of Age being chosen King of the Boyes in their Play, he executed the Office with Severity, towards such as were disobedient, and for this was complained of by their Parents to the King. Being sent for and accused of the Crime, he would acknowledge none, alledging he had done like a King; and standing in his Justification without the least Change of Countenance, Astyages was struck with Admiration, and presently called to mind his Dream. Upon Examination of the Shepherd, he got out the whole matter; owned him for his Grand-son, because he thought the Dream fulfilled in his boyish Reign amongst the Shepherds; only he thought it good to fend him out of the way into Persia.

30. To punish Harpagus for his Disobedience, he invited him to Supper, and caused to be served up to the Table his only Son; of which, after he had eaten heartily, and approved the meat, he let him see his Entertainment, by the Head, hands and Feet, reserved in another Platter, Harpagus for the present kept down his Passion, seeming to acquiesce in the Kings Pleasure, until Cyrus came to mans Estate. Then, hearing of his Activity and Forwardness, he resolved by Presents to make him his Friend, meditating a convenient way of Revenge by the means of this Youth, from whom he expected something answerable to his Grand-fathers Dream. Knowing Astyages his tyrannical Carriage towards the Medes, he insinuated himself into the chief of them by Degrees, and secretly perswaded them, that it was convenient he should be removed from the Government, especially seeing they might with some Plausibility place Cyrus in his Seat. Having thus made War, he wrote Letters to the young man into Persia, (which, to prevent Discovery, he fowed up in the Belly of an Hare) wherein recalling to his Memory what he had suffered from his Grand-father upon his Account, he solicited him to draw the Persians to revolt; then to come down with an Army into Media, where he might be sure of him or any other the Kings Generals, and so easily become Master of all.

31. Cyrus considering of a way how to accomplish this Business, which now he made no less than a Design, called the Persians together: first gave out, that he was chosen their General by Astyages, and then easily perswaded them, by laying open, how much Liberty was to be preferred before that Slavery they now underwent, to close with him and break out into open Rebellion. The old man hearing this, sent a Messenger for him; but he returned Answer, he would come sooner than he should have cause to desire his Company; whereupon he armed his Subjects of Media, and forgetting how he had formerly injured Harpagus, committed the Army to his Conduct. Harpagus revolting, he lost thereby the first Battel, yet was not daunted, but threatened Cyrus, nailed to Crosses the Magicians who had perswaded him to dismiss him, and arming all both old and young that were in the City, led them out to a second Engagement, wherein his Success was worse than before, he being taken Prisoner. When Harpagus, boasting of his Revenge, insulted over him, he taxed him of Impudence and Injustice: of the one, for that having Power to make himself King he should transfer the Dignity to another; and of the other, because for to revenge a private Injury, he had enslaved the whole Nation of the Medes, out of which he might rather have have chosen one to the Kingdom, refusing it himself, than Him, who would now so order the matter, that the Persians, Slaves before, should be Lords and Masters of all. Thus Astyages lost his Kingdom, after he had held it thirty five years, enjoying all things else at his Grand-son's hands, till his natural Death: And the Medes became subject to the Persians, after they had enjoyed the Dominion of Asia beyond the River Halys, the space of 128 years, (except that Space wherein the Scythians kept them under) and in the second year of the 53th Olympiad, of the World 3446.

32. Cyrus having obtained the Sovereignty of Persia and Media, was within a A.M. 3446. while provoked by Cresus King of Lydia, who at this time was grown eminent, having improved the Inheritance which descended upon him from his 199. Ancestors.

The Lydian Nation was of great Antiquity, so named from Lud the Son of Lager Bochar-Sem, or rather descended of him who by Moses is so called; both he and they Pha-lase, having obtained this name from that Country, which from the crookedness and Winding of the River Meander took the Appellation of Lud, in the Pletemian Language signifying crooked or winding: The Greeks say, that the Lydians were *Herodotus lib.
first called Maones*, and Lydia Maonia, from Meon, an ancient King of Phrygia 1. c. 7. Scabro and Lydia, who was thought to have been the Father of Cybele, Mother of the 113. p.
Gods, and that long after him reigned Lydus the Son of Alys, and Brother of Tyrrhenus, from whom they fancy the Country to have been named. Better is the Opinion of Stephanus, who deriveth Maonia from the River Meon or Meander. *Dionysius lib. 1. p.
For*, though the Greeks might call them Lydians, yet that their right name was Ludians, appeareth from the Latin words, Ludus, Ludo, Ludic, &c. thence derived; seeing it is granted, that the first Players came from Lydia into Hetruria, fo Terrell. de Speto Rome, as the Lydians (a) boasted themselves to have been Inventors of those 114. p.
Games, which afterwards were common with them to the Greeks. Hence it ap-peareth that though the Country might be called both Lydia and Maonia, from 115. p.
the self-same thing; yet most ancient was the name of Lud. After the Posterity of Lydus, reigned the Heracleids or those that were descended from Heracles, by his Son Alcaeus. The first was Argon, saith Herodotus; the Son of Ninus, Grandson of Belus, and great Grand-son of Alcaeus; the last was Candaules the Son of Myrsus, by the Greeks called Myrsinus. Candaules, or Candylor, signified a certain kind of Lydian meat made of Flower, Cheese, Honey, Bread and Flesh; the Lydians being accounted the first (b) of all Nations, that busied themselves in Cookery, inasmuch that they became a Proverb for it.

33. The Antiquity of the Lydians appeareth further out of the ancient Fables, Atis, Tantalus, Pelops, Niobe and Arachne, being of this Country: Their Fruitfulness, from the Colonies they sent out into Peloponnesus and Caria, into Etruria also as they say. Their Valour and Power is shewn to have been of great Antiquity from their holding the Dominion of the Sea 92 years, which they took from the Cretians about the time of Jephthe, and 1200 years before Christ, losing it again and recovering it afterwards. But Candaules with his Family being extinct, and the Kingdom devolved upon the Mermmades (of whom Cresus descended) the Power of the Nation grew greater all at Land. These Heracleids, held it the space of 305 years, through twenty two Successors unto this Candaules, who fo far being enamoured of his Wife, as he esteemed her the most beautiful of all Women, contrained his Servant Gyges to see her naked. She observing Gyges whilst therein he only satisfied his Masters Will, offered him the Choice of killing her Husband, and marrying her with the Kingdom, or of suffering Death himself; one of their two Lives being the least he could require in way of Justice. He in so great a Strait, preferring his own Safety before his Master's Life, slew him in his Bed-chamber, the place where the Fault was committed, and so enjoyed the Queen with the Kingdom; wherein he was confirmed by the Oracles of Delfos, to the Sentence of which, he and his Adversaries had agreed to stand.

34. Gyges reigned thirty eight years; in which Space, he made War upon Miletus and Smyrna, and took the City Colophon; Arads his Son and Successor subdued Priene, fought against Miletus; and in his time the Cimmerians being expelled their Seats by the Scythian Noamades, passed into Asia, and took Sardis, all but the Castle. He reigned forty nine years, his Son Sadyattes twelve, who gave Place to Alyattes his Son and Successor. Alyattes waged a War with * Cyxaxares King of Media, and expelled the Cimmerians out of Asia; took Smyrna, and set upon Clazomenae. In the fifth year of the War betwixt the Median and him, whilst they fought upon equal Terms, the Sun was eclipsed, which Thales, one

The Royal family of *Ly-

of the seven wife men, had foretold to his Milefians. Both the Armies seeing the Day beginning to be turned into Night, left off fighting, and then by the Mediation of Synnests the Cilician, and Lalynitus the Babylonian a Peace was concluded; Ariene the Daughter of Halvates being married to Alyages the Son of Cyaxares. From the Tables of Ptolemy (or of Hipparchus) it appeareth that this Eclipse happened in the fourth year of the forty fourth Olympiad, the 147th of Nabonassar, the fourth day of the Ægyptian Month Pachon, (which answereth to the twentieth of September, three hours and twenty five Minutes before noon; nine Digits being eclipsed, and the Duration almost two hours. Halvates pursued also the War left him by his Father, against Miletus, the Inhabitants whereof received from him two great Blows, for that none of the Ionians helped them except the Chians, in way of requital for the Aid they had afforded them against the Erythraeans. At length, having Notice that he intended to send a Messenger into the Ciey, at the Command of Thrafsbulus their Prince, they brought all the Provision they had into the Market-places, which appearing to be much, and as such related to Alyates, he thinking himself mistaken in his former Belief of their distressed Condition, made Peace with them; and died after he had reigned fifty seven years.

35. Cræsus his Son succeeded him, at the Age of thirty five years. He made War upon Ephefus, which when he besieged, the Towns-men for their Security gave up the City to Diana, by a Rope fastned from the Wall to her Temple; but for all this he brought them under, and subdued all the rest of the Greek Cities in the Continent. He brought into his Subjection all the People of Asia, within the River Hæls, as the Phrygians, Myfians, Bythinians, Paphlagonians, the Mariandyni, Chalchies, Thracians, Thyni, Carians, Ionians, Dorians, Rhodiens, Lycians and Cilicians. Being grown great, and flowing with Wealth, and flourishing with Glory, the choicest Wits of Greece flocked to Sardis, and amongst the rest Solon the Athenian, who being now in his Travels, had been with Amesius of Ægypt, and now came to visit Cræsus. He kindly entertained him, and shewing him his Treasures, out of a vain Conceit of his own Felicity, demanded of him, whom he thought the happiest man. He answered, he esteemed for such one Tellus an Athenian, who having lived in good Credit, and leaving divers Children and Nephews of honest and virtuous Carriage, died in the War at Eleusine, after he had first helped to put to flight the Enemy, for which he was honoured by his Citizens with a publick and stately Funeral. Cræsus expecting, if not the first, yet the second place, asked him, Whom he accounted next to Tellus, he replied Cleobis and Biton, two Brothers of Argos, who had sufficient to live on, and being very strong, had gotten the better in Trial of Masteries. On a time at the Feast of June, their Mother being to be drawn in a Chariot to the Temple, and the Heifers not at hand, they yoked themselves, and drew her thither. She being much affected with the Piety of her Sons, prayed the Goddess, that whatsoever was best for Man, might be bestowed on them, who sleeping that night in the Temple, were found dead in the Morning, and honoured by the Argives with two Statues, erected to their Memory at Delfos.

36. The King was troubled that his Felicity should be so little valued, as not comparable to that of private men. But Solon plainly told him, that all things were uncertain in this Life, and no man ought to be accounted happy till his End; for which Philosophy, as strange to the Courtiers, he was dismissed with small Reputation for Learning. Cræsus, growing exceeding proud and irreligious; to humble him, had a Dream, That the choicest of his two Sons, (whereof one was dumb) should be slain with the iron Head of some Weapon. Hereupon he removed all things of that Nature out of the way, looked to him diligently, and married him out of hand. But at this time it hapned, that a certain wild Boar haunted about the Mountain Olympus in Myfia, which, doing great harm to the Inhabitants, they were in no wise able to master, and therefore sent to Cræsus, desiring him to send his Son, accompanied with a sufficient Train, to hunt and kill the wild Beast. He plainly denied, because of his Dream, to let him stir from home; but the young man, having a great desire to the Exercise, thereby to approve himself for Activity to his new married Wife, obtained Leave to be sent, saying, that no such thing would be used in the game as that of which he had dreamed. He committed him then to the Care of one Adrafus, the Son of Gordius (and he of Midas) King of Phrygia, who having at unawares killed his Brother, had been banished by his Father. When they came into the Field, and had dislodged the Boar, Adrafus throwing a Dart at him, chanced to hit the young man, and so fulfilled the Dream; for which, offering himself to be killed, upon Cræsus his Refusal, as done without any Intention, he yet flew himself. Cræsus took the Accident very heavily, and kept himself in Mourning two years.

37. This Mourning was broken off by the Prosperity of Cyrus, who having now overthrown the Kingdom of the Medes, advanced highly the Affairs of Persia. Herein he found himself exceedingly concerned, so as to withstand, if possible, his Success, and make an Addition thereby to his own Fortune. For Encouragement in this Design, he sent to enquire of the Oracles far and near; which answer returned with one Consent, that he should overturn a great Principality, he was much encouraged, not doubting but that of the Persians was meant thereby; and much more, after the Oracle at Delfos had (in Answer to his Requiry, whether his Empire should long continue) bid him look to himself, when a Mule should have Possession of the Sovereignty of Media; taking this in a literal Sense, notwithstanding the constant Ambiguity of such Answers. Now (the Oracle giving way to it) he sent to make a League with the Lacedæmonians, who being obliged to him, easily complied; though no Supplies do we read of sent to him. For he, being in great Hate, prevented the sending of any; and, with all the Force he could make, invaded Cappadocia, to revenge, as he pretended, upon Cyrus, the Injury offered to Alyages his Brother-in-Law; but indeed to lay that fertile Country to his own Dominions. Having passed the River Hayls, he came into a place of Cappadocia called Pteris, the most safe of all the Country, near to the City Sinope, which was situated upon the Æuxine Sea. Taking up his Quarters here, he made Incursions, took the City of the Pterians, with all the rest round about, and banished the Syrians (so were the Cappadocians called by the Greeks, till subjected to the Persian Empire) though they had nothing ill deserved at his hands.

38. Cyrus coming against him sent to the Ionians, to draw them to his Party; but they standing off, he proceeded, and pitch his Camp against Cræsus. After some Skirmishes the Armies engaged, and a very hot Dispute continued, till night parted them, many falling on both sides. Cræsus, though neither Party owned any Defeat, was blamed by his Souldiers for engaging with so numerous an Army; so that, Cyrus not stirring out against him the next day, he thought it best to retreat to Sardis, and sent out of Hand for Aid to Amesius King of Ægypt, and Lalynitus of Babylon, whom he had by a League obliged to him: to the Lacedæmonians also, to dispatch their Auxiliary within five Moneths, with which, resting that Winter, he would re-invoke the Persians the following Spring. Accordingly he dismissed all his Mercenaries, standing then in no need of them, as he thought; which Cyrus hearing, resolved with all Speed to follow him to Sardis, hoping he might utterly defeat him before he could recollect his Forces: and accordingly marching into Lydia, he prevented any Message of his Coming. Cræsus, though exceedingly perplexed at so unexpected a thing, gathered his Subjects together, as time would give Leave, and provided for his Defence; which the other perceiving, and fearing the Power of his Horse (wherein the Lydians excelled all other People of Asia) took off the Burthens from all the Camels that followed the Camp, and setting Riders upon them, placed them in the Front; the smell of which (when the Armies joyned) the Horses not enduring, turned aside. Yet were not the Riders thereby deterred from Fighting, but dismounting, performed on Foot what could be expected, till over-powered, rather with number than Valour, they were put to Flight, and besieged in the City.

39. Cræsus thinking he might possibly be able to hold out some considerable time, sent again to his Confederates to hasten their Succours. But Cyrus, on the fourteenth day of the Siege offering a great Reward to him that should first mount the Wall, one Hyreades, a Mardian, having taken notice of a place, which because of its Height and Precipitancy was held impregnable, and therefore neglected by the Besieged (where yet he had seen a Souldier come down to fetch his Helmet, he had let fall) made means to climb up, and after him more and more followed; till the City was thereby surprized. All Places being full of Slaughters, a Souldier not knowing Cræsus, was about to kill him; which he neglected, as willing to dye with his Kingdom. But his dumb Son, affrighted at the Danger he saw him in, is said to have broken Silence (or Dumbness) with this Expression; Man, do not kill Cræsus, and thenceforth to have enjoyed the Use of his Tongue. Thus Cræsus overturned a great Principality, as the Oracle had foretold, after he had reigned fourteen years, and been besieged for many Days.

The Ionians

Cyrus adjudged him to Death, and had burnt him alive, but that he, almost too late, remembered the words of the wife Law-giver of Athens, and cried out Solon, Solon! Cyrus commanded the Interpreters to demand of him whom he Solomon, c. 7. invoked (thinking it to be some God he mentioned:) to which he answered, when compelled to speak, that he named one whom, rather than any thing, he would have to speak with all Princes; and being urged to explain himself, told the whole Story concerning the Discourse betwixt him and Solon. Herewith the Conqueror was so affected, that, considering the Uncertainty of his own prosperous Condition, though the Pile was already kindled, yet commanded he the fire to be quenched, and receiving him into his most inward Councils, held him ever most dear, and in great Esteem for his Wisdom; wherein, after such manifold Experience, he excelled. This happened in the fourth year of the 58 Olymp. A. M. 3460: an. 4-671 15. ad, the fifteenth year of the Reign of Cyrus. A. M. 3460.

40. When the Ionians and Æolians heard that Cressus, with so little ado, was utterly subdued, they sent to Cyrus, offering to put themselves into his hands, on the same Terms as the Lydians were received; but he returned them no Satisfactory Answer, because of their Refusal formerly to joyn with him. All of them then (except the Milesians, those having yielded themselves) made their Application to the Lacedæmonians, who refused to grant any Aid; but sent some to make Discovery how matters went in Asia. The Messengers finding Cyrus at Sardis, according to Order acquainted him with the Pleasure of that Republick, not to suffer him to molest any of the Greek Cities. He enquiring what the Lacedæmonians were, presently slighted them, and answered, That if the Gods preserved him, they should have Cause to bewail their own Calamities, and not busy themselves with what concerned the Ionians. He committed Sardis to the Custody of Tabalus, a Persian; to Paityas a Lydian, the Treasure of Cressus and others: and so set out for Ecbatane, making little Account of the Ionians (against whom he intended to send some Lieutenant) in Comparison of Babylon, the Babylonians, Sace and Ægyptians, upon all which he had cast an hungry Eye with purpose to invade them. After his Departure Paityas revolted, and drawing into Rebellion the Maritime Coasts, besieged Talyzus; whereat Cyrus being angry, as esteeming it a Plot of the Lydians, Cressus fearing worse things might come upon them, after an Excuse of the Generality, advised him to take from them the Use of Arms, and enure them to exterminate Courses, whereby they would easily be kept under. Cyrus according to his Advice, dispatched away with an Army, one Mazares a Mede, who finding Sardis deserted by Paityas, put in Execution what Cressus had advised. By this Course was brought to pass, that the Lydians, to whom for Valour no Nation in Asia could be compared, grew infamous for Effeminateness and Luxury; so that gluttonous (a) and voluptuous Persons (b) such as made it their Profession to afford Incitements to Debauchery, received Epithets from their name.

41. Paityas having fled to Cuma, Mazares sent to demand him of the Citizens; but, they dismissing him, he fled to Mytilene, and thence to the Chians, who fold him to Mazares. He then reduced such as had revolted, and harassing the Country of Priene, with that lying upon Meander and Magnesia, fell sick and died. Harpagus the Mede succeeded him, and out of hand undertook an Expedition against the Ionians. The Phœceans being first besieged, obtained Truce for a day, and then shipping themselves, left their ancient Seat, and passed over into the Island Chios, and thence (for that the Chians refused to sell them the Islands Ocnus, left they should thither carry the Traffique) to Cyrrus, where twenty years before, they had built a City called Alidia. Here playing the Pirates, they were after five years defeated in a Sea-fight by the Tyrrhenians and Carthaginians, and then those that remained passed over to Rhegium in Italy, where they built a City named Hyela, in the Territories of Oenotria. The Tians also, after their Example departed into Thrace; where they built up a City called Abdera, the Foundations of it being formerly laid by one Temisius a Clazomenian, whom the Thracians thence expelled. The rest of the Ionians stood it out against Harpagus, who yet utterly subdued, and forced them to undergo the Yoke the second time, having refused to follow the Counsel of Bias the Prienean, (one of the seven wise men of Greece), who advised them to shun Servitude by going to Sardinia, and there Planting themselves in one great and common City; as they had formerly rejected the Advice of Thales the Milesian (another of that number) to set up one common Court at Tens in the middle of Ionis. After the Conquest of the Ionians, Harpagus subdued the Carians, Camiars, and Lyicians, Lyicians, and brought all the lower Asia under the Dominion and Sovereignty of Cyrus, who in the mean while not idle, did as much by the upper Provinces, leaving nothing in his way, but clearing all before him.

42. Having conquered the rest of the Continent, he went against the Affyrians, who, being aware of him, had furnished themselves in Babylon for a long Siege. Coming to the River Gyndes (which rising in the Manitenean Mountains, runneth through the Country of the Dardaneans, and emptieth it self in Tigris) he could find no Ford to pass it, and a certain white Horse, sacred to the Sun, boldly taking the Water, was overwhelmed in the Floods. Hereat being exceeding angry, he threatened to reduce it to such a Condition, as it should not be kneed deep, and accordingly setting all his Army on work, devised it into 360 Rivulets, in which Employment he spent all that Summer. The Spring following, he marched for Babylon, the King whereof (Labinus) opposed him; but, being defeated, retreated into the City, to which he then laid close Siege. In vain for a long time did he attempt the Taking of it. At length he divided his Army, and leaving the two stronger parts of it, the one at that side of the Town where the River entered, the other there where it came out; with the third he retired into the adjoining Fens, and digging great Ditches derived the River into them. Hereby he brought it to such an Ebb, that his Souldiers easily passing it, became Masters of the City, and he of the Babylonian or Affyrian Empire. This is the Sum of what Herodotus hath written concerning the prosperous Fortune of Cyrus.

43. Xenophon, contrary to the former Story, will have Cambyses his Father no obscure man; but King of Media: not a word from him of his Grand-father's Dream, or Expofing of the Infant. When he was twelve years old, he was sent for by Aflyages into Media, where having tarried till almost a man, and being admired for Understanding and Abilities far above his Age; he returned to his Father, and entered into the College of Youth, where he was trained up in all strict Discipline according to the Customs of Persia. Aflyages dying, Cyaxares his Son succeeded him, at what time the King of Affyria having subdued all the Syrians, Arabians, Hyrcanians, and had now fallen upon the Bactrians, promised himself the absolute Empire of the East; if he could but bring under the Medes and Persians. He sent therefore to all his Neighbours; to Cressus King of Lydia the King of Cappadocia, to both the Phrygians, Cassians, Paphlagonians, Cilicians, and Indians, accusing these two Nations of ambitious Designs to enslave them all, and procured them to joyn with him in an offensive and defensive League against them. Cyaxares hearing this, desired of Cambyses his Brother-in-law to send down Cyrus to him, with an Army; Cyrus being accordingly chosen General by the People, first subdued the Armenians, who because of this Combination of the Princes, had denied to pay their accustomed Tribute to Cyaxares, and then perwaded his Uncle to invade the Affyrians, to keep the War from his own doors.

44. Making then an Inroad into Affyria, the King thereof, Cressus of Lydia, and divers other Confederates came against them, but in the first Engagement were worsted, and beaten back into their Camp, and amongst others the Affyrian himself (Neriglossor, if any) was slain. The Night following, all brake out of the Fortifications and fled; whereupon Cyrus prevailing with his Uncle to suffer him to pursue them, with as many of the Medes as would follow him of their own Accord, in his way entered into Confederacy with the Hyrcanians, through the Conduct of whom he overtook, and again defeated them: they also flew the Kings of Cappadocia and Arabia. After this he invaded the Territories of the Babylonians, went up to the City it self, and challenged the King to a single Combat, who refusing it, he, after some few Skirmishes thereabout returned to Cyaxares, upon the Borders of Media, to deliberate about carrying on the War: He found him greatly discontented at his Success (out of Apprehension that he had robbed him of all the Glory) and much averse to the War; but at length he appeared him, and so wrought under hand upon the Officers of the Army, that they unanimously voted the War to be carried on. Some time being necessary then for Preparation, he chose out a convenient place for the Army's Quarters; and not long after, understood by certain Fugitives and Prisoners that the King of Affyria was gone towards Lydia with much Treasure.

45. Cyrus, supposing his Design to be for raising men, prepared for the main Chance, by horning his Persians, inventing new and more convenient Chariots, and, to get Intelligence of the Enemy's Purposes, sent one Arastes into Lydia, who, under Colour of a Revolt, should inffamate himfelf into their Counfels. This Device taking, he difpofed of his Affairs according as he faw behooveful, modelled his Army, and marched againft the Confederates, whom without any great Difficulty he overthrew, all but the Aegyptians. They put him to fure Trouble, and endangered his Life; but having fall'n in upon their Rear, and thereby diverted the Front, he fo overpowered them behind and before, as, glad they were to deliver up their Arms, and, upon Promise of better Entertainment, willing to change Mafters and ferve him. Crefus now, who commanded in Chief, fled amain to Sardis, whither Cyrus purfued him, and getting the Cattle into his hands, by the Help of a Perfian, who had been Slave to an Officer in it, got Poffeffion both of the City and its King. He, coming to Cyrus, acquitted the Oracle of Delphos from all Blame, and took the Fault upon himfelf, in that he, overweening of his own Condition, had fooled himfelf continually in a fond Opinion of Happinefs. After this the Carians falling into two Factions, both fent unto him: and he difpatched to them Adafas with fome Forces, who overpowering both the one and the other, compounded their Differences.

46. Then fent he Hysafpes into Phrygia, who fubdued the Country, and took the King Prifoner; at what time the Greeks of Affa fubmitted themfelves, procuring by Gifts, that they fhould not be constrained to receive any Garifon, but only pay Tribute, and ferve in the Wars. Afterward, in his March to Babylon, he brought under that City with a vaft Army, the Walls whereof after he had viewed, he concluded there was no ftorming of it, and refolved, the beft way was to pine them out. Underftanding then, that they were provided within for a whole year, he divided his Army into twelve parts, affigning to each a Moneth to lye in Leaguer, at which the befieged fcoffed, as utterly out of Danger. But Cyrus taking Notice how the River ran through the City, caufed deep Ditches to be made, which by dreining, rendered it fordable, and fo taking Advantage of a folemn Feaft, entred by night, and furprized them all in their Cups. The King was flain by Gobryas and Gadates, who both, being formerly injured by him, had revolted to Cyrus. The Inhabitants, commanded upon pain of Death to deliver up their Arms, instantly obeyed. And thus the Babylonian Empire being quite overthrown, Cyrus affumed to himfelf Royal Majefty, fettling his Court with great Wilfdom, wherein Xenophon, in his moft exquisite History, maketh him to have excelled, in all things, to Admiration.

47. But Ctefias will have Aflyages (whom he calleth Aflygas) nothing akin to Cyrus; tells us how he fled to Ecbatane, where he was hid by his Daughter Annyris, and her Husband Spitamame; and how Cyrus coming upon them, put them both to the Rack, to make them confeß where he was, with their Children Spitaces and Magabemes. Aflygas, rather than they fhould be tortured, difcovered himfelf, and was firft bound with Fetters, but afterwards honoured as a Father by Cyrus, who at length married Annyris, having killed Spitamame, becaufe he had denied he knew where he was. After the Marriage, the Bactrians gave up themfelves to Cyrus and Annyris, though formerly they made great and effectual Refiftance. He relateth alfo how Cyrus made War upon the Sace, whose King Amorges he took Prifoner; but Sperethe the Queen gathered an Army of 300000 Men, and 200000 Women, and therewith overthrowing Cyrus, took him with other Prifoners, and thereby redeemed her Husband. With the help then of Amorges, he made War upon Crefus, and befieged Sardis, which City he took by a Stratagem taught him by Oebares; making Images of the Perfians, and placing them upon the Walls, at which the Defendants were affrighted. But before this, Crefus, deluded by a Speitrum, gave out his Son, an Hoftage to Cyrus, and delaying to perform what he had promifed, procured his Death, which the Mother beholding from the Wall, tumbled her felf down headlong, and yet was not killed; but the City being taken, fled to Apollo's Temple, and died there.

48. Crefus being bound in the Temple, by an Art he had of Deceiving the fight, three times was loofed, though the Place was fecured, and committed to the Care of Oebares; for which they that were bound with him loft their Heads. Then was he brought into the Palace and more ftroingly fetter'd, but was loofed again by Thunder and Lightning. Hereat Cyrus his Anger abated, and giving him his Liberty, he ufed him ever after with great Refpect, and beftowed on him a great City called Barene, near to Ecbatane. After this, Cyrus fent Petifacas his Eunuch to fetch Aflygas from the Barcarians, both he and his wife having a great Defire to fee him: But Petifacas through the Infligation of Oebares left him in a defart Place, where he was famifed to death. The Treachery was revealed by Dreams, and Petifacas was given up into the hands of Annyris, who plucked out his Eyes, his Skin over his Ears, and then crucified him: Oebares fearing the like Punifhment, though Cyrus promifed him Indemnity, killed himfelf. As for the Body of Aflygas it was fumptuoufly buried, having been guarded by Lions in the Wildernefs, till Petifacas fetched it away. Thefe improbable things are related by Ctefias.

49. Crefus the Chaldean left recorded, that, in the 17th year of Nabonidus, Cyrus having fubdued all Affa, with a great Army, turned againft Babylon. That Nabonidus meeting and engaging with him in Battel, was overthrown, and be took himfelf into a Town of the Boriffians. Cyrus befieged Babylon, and confidering it was not to be taken in haft, returned to Boriffus, where Nabonidus not expecting a Storm, yielded himfelf; and Cyrus uſing him kindly ſent him from Babylon into Caramania, where he allotted him an Habitation. Abydenus further added, that Cyrus beftowed upon Nabonidus, now above eighty years old, the Government of Caramania. This is the Sum of what the moſt ancient Hiſtorians delivered concerning Cyrus his Attainment of the Empire of the Eaſt; which happened about the year of the World 3465, the firſt of the 60th Olympiad, 538 years before the Æra of Chriſt.

1. Phaleg being thirty years old, begat Ren, otherwife called Rehu and Ragan by the 70: Ren 32 years old, begat Sarug. He at thirty years of Age, had a Son named Nachor. And Nachor, one (when he was 29) called Terah or Thare.

2. Terah being ſeventy years old begat Abram, Nachor, and Haran. Not that all theſe were born at the ſame time, or are to be accounted in Age as we find them in Order; Priority in years not being conſtantly obſerved in Scripture; but rather that of Piety and true Worth. Haran is to be reckoned as the eldeſt; who died at Ur of the Chaldees, before his Father departed thence, and left three Children, viz. one Son named Lut: and two Daughters Milcah married to his Brother (and her Uncle) Nachor and Sarai (or Iſcab) to Abram. The ſecond was Nachor, Father to Chefed (or Chafed); and ſo Abram the youngſt; becauſe he was born, not in the 70th as hath been thought; but 130 year of his Father. For Terah lived in all 205 years, and died in Charran. Abram, when he came out of Charran (which Stephen faith, was after his Father's Death) was 75 years old; which being deducted out of 205, 130 years will remain. But if he was born in the 70 year of his Father; then, at his Death, was he 135 years old; and having Iſaac born to him, when 100, in the Land of Canaan, he muſt with him have returned back to Charran (which ſeemeth very incredible); or elſe he left it not at his Fathers Death, as Stephen muſt make us believe he did.

3. Abram therefore was born in the 130 year of his Father's Life, and the 2008th of the World, as is clear from the Ages of all his Progenitors, taken at the Births of their Sons, and laid together. About the 70 year of his Age, God commanded him to leave his Father's houſe, and come into the Land which he ſhould ſhew him, promifing to make of him a great Nation, to bleſs him, and in him all the Families of the Earth. He, obeying this Command, drew on his Father also with him, and so (together with Lot the Son of Haran, and Sarah Abram's Wife) they came from Ur of the Chaldeans to Charran, and dwelt there. Dwelling there, Semeth to imitate a longer Stay than of one year; so that some probably think five Years to have been there spent. For Terah, now very old, might detain them by his Weakness; they being unwilling to leave him, till they saw him either recovered or dead: But after his Death, mindful of Gods Command, they left Charran, and came into the Land of Canaan. This Journey from Ur to Charran, was the Beginning of the four hundred thirty years of him, and his Posterity's, sojourning in a strange Land; the Promise also made to him being so many years before the Promulgation of the Law in Mount Sinai, as the Apostle Paul hath observed.

4. The first Place of Canaan in which Abram made any Stay, was Sichem; where God again appeared to him, and renewed his Promise; another of giving that Land to his Seed being added to it; and in this place he built the first Altar to the Lord. Thence he removed towards the hilly Country, and the Eastern Tract of Luz, (afterwards called Bethel) where a Famine drove him into Egypt. He proceeded into the Southern Coasts, whence a Famine drove him into Egypt. There he sojourned, and taught the Egyptians Astrology, which Joseph saith they were ignorant of, till he communicated to them the Knowledge of it, and of Arithmetic. His Wife being beautiful; for fear of his Life, he counterfeited himself her Brother, so that Pharaoh began to cast his Affections on her, till, plagued by God, he was constrained to dismiss them both in Peace. Out of Egypt then he returned to that place, between Hai and Bethel, where he built the second Altar: Now was he and Lot grown fo rich, that no longer could they conveniently live together. Lot being departed to the Plains of Sodom, God again renewed his Promise to Abram, which he more largely explained, both as to the Giving of the Land, and the Propagation of his Posterity. After this, as he was commanded, he went and viewed the Land; then pitch't his Tents in the Plain of Manre near to Hebron, where he built another Altar to the Lord.

5. At this time four Kings about the River Euphrates, viz. Anrapel King of Shinar or Babylonia, Arioch King of Ellasar, (thought to be Aravia, because of a City upon the Borders of that Country, called Ellas) Chedorlaomer King of Blam (afterwards Persia) and Tidal King of Nations, (thought to be many petty Kingdoms, adjoining to Pkenicia and Palestine) came and fought against the five Kings of the Pentapolis; viz. Bera of Sodom, Birisa of Gomorrab, Shinab King of Admah, Scemeber of Zebojim, and the King of Bela (afterwards called Zoar) of which who, had twelve years served Chedorlaomer; and in the thirteenth rebelled. They overthrew these five petty Princes, led away much Pillage, and many Captives, amongst which was Lot, who then sojourned in Sodom. Abram hearing this, armed 318 Servants; and pursuing them, recovered Lot, and all the Prey, which he restored to the Owners. In his Return, Melchisedech (whom some improbably make Sem) King of Salem (or Jerusalem) Priest of the most high God, brought him Bread and Wine, and blessed him; to whom he gave the Tithes of all. In this Story Abram is first called an Hebrew by Moses; (And there came one which had escaped and told Abram the Hebrew) which Word, in Scripture, is not found applied to any other before him.

6. Some think he was so called from Heber the Son of Salah; and that this Appellation only was proper to his Family, because it kept the most ancient or Hebrew Tongue incorrupt. But (a) others finding the word to signify one no other from beyond the Water, or a Stranger; think it was given to Abram upon no other Account, than because he came from beyond Euphrates: None of Heber's Posterity being called so; but only he, and some of his; they think, addeeth much to their Reason. They conclude, that the Hebrew Language was not appropriate to Heber as a Reward of his Piety, because those that descended of him used it not always; and to others, besides his Posterity, it appeareth to have been natural. They instance, that Laban spake Syriack, and the Canaanites and Philistines the Hebrew naturally; as the names of their Men, Places, &c. do shew. Therefore they judge it most probable, that Abram speaking the Chaldean Language before, (which only differeth in Dialect from the Hebrew) got both the Name and Language, after his Arrival in the Land of Canaan. The Heathen (a) Writers thought them to have been called Hebrews from Abram, as corrupted from Abraheans, out of Ignorance of the Language. Augustine also once inclined to this Opinion, which he afterwards renounced.

7. Abram,

7. Abram, after his Victory over the Kings, received a more large promise from God, who engaged to become to him a Shield, and a sufficient Reward; and (for that it troubled him to go childless) to give him Ishac, from which should proceed an innumerable Posterity, that, inhabiting a strange Land four hundred years, was to return and possess this of Canaan, when the Iniquity of the Americas would be full, in the fourth Generation. This League made betwixt God and Abram, was confirmed by Sacrifice; yet, Sarah, seeing her self barren, persuaded her husband to go into Hagar her handmaid, of which he had a Son born to him, and named Ismael, in the eleventh year after his coming into Canaan, the 86 of his Age, and of the World, the 2094. In the thirteenth year after, God made another Covenant with him concerning the seed of Ishac, who was to be born the year following, and Circumcision was instituted as a Seal thereof. Now, whereas his name before was Abram or an High-father, it was changed into Abraham, or Father of a great multitude. And Sarah, which signifieth My Princess, or Lady, (as of one Family) was altered into Sarah, or a Princess absolute; as of many Nations. Not long after, God made known to Abraham his purpose to destroy Sodom, and the other Cities, for their abominable wickedness. He interceded hard for them; but there being not so many as five righteous Persons in Sodom, God having taken care for Lot and his Family, rained Fire and Brimstone down upon the Cities, which, together with the Plain were utterly destroyed; only Bela was spared for Lot's sake, who fled thither. Of the rest the Dead Sea (into which the Ground was converted) remaineth a lasting Monument to this day. In this Sea (or Lake) no living Creature is bred, having nothing but a Sulphureous matter thence taken in great quantities. It is described to be 72 miles in length, and 19 in breadth. Nigh to it fair and pleasant Apples grow, which being touched, turn into a Sulphureous Vapour: and a Tradition remained amongst the Heathen, of these Cities being destroyed with Thunder and Lightning from Heaven. Lot's Wife, after he had got out of Sodom, looked back, and was turned into a Pillar of Salt. His two Daughters, thinking all Mankind to have perished, made their Father drunk, and lay with him; from which incestuous Copulation came Mobab and Ammon, Fathers of the Mobabites and Ammonites, two great and powerful Nations.

8. A little after (in the same year) Abraham having continued in the Plain of Manre about eighteen years, departed unto Gerar the Metropolis of the Philistines; where happened the same thing concerning his Wife, as formerly had done in Egypt, Abimelech the King having taken her into his House, who therefore was plagued till he restored her with large Gifts. The year being precisely finished, Sarah bare to him Ishac (so called because he laughed when God made mention of it to him) he being now an hundred years old, and the ninety; four hundred before the Departure of his Posterity out of Egypt. At the weaning of Ishac, Sarah seeing Ismael mocking, procured him and his Mother to be banished the House, God bidding Abraham fulfill her Desire herein, and promising to make of him a great Nation. When Ishac was grown up (though of what Age, is not expressed, some guessing thirty years; others (improbably) ten, or twelve, because he must have been of sufficient Strength to carry wood) God to try his Fathers Faith, commanded him to offer him up for a burnt-offering on Mount Moriab, where afterwards the Temple of Solonon stood. He, out of Obedience, went about to do it; but God accepting his Will for a Performance, renewed his Promise to him. Sarah died aged 127 years, and after her Death Abraham married another Wife, called Keturah, by which he had other six Sons. To those he gave Gifts, and before his Death sent them away from Ishac, the Heir of the Promise.

9. When Ishac was forty years old, his Father procured him to Wife Rebecca, the Daughter of Bethuel, who was Son to Nachor, the Brother of Abraham. She (married at fourteen years of Age, according to the Tradition of the Jews) was barren twenty years; but then her Husband beseeching God for her, he brought forth Twins (Eshau and Jacob) which struggled in her Womb; the elder being, as God foretold, to serve the younger. Fifteen years after, Abraham died, being 175 years old, having sojourned in the Land of Canaan a hundred years; twenty two after the Death of Sem, four before that of Heber; in the days of Inachus King of the Argives, 1821 years before the Aera of Christ, in the 2183 year of the World. Of Abraham (besides Artapanus and Charran before mentioned) Berjus the Chaldean had some Knowledge, though he named him not. Hecateus not only made mention of him, by the way, but wrote an History of him: Nicolaus Damascenus, in the fourth Book of his Histories, related that Abra- ham married. 9. When Ishac was forty years old, his Father procured him to Wife Rebecca, the Daughter of Bethuel, who was Son to Nachor, the Brother of Abraham. She (married at fourteen years of Age, according to the Tradition of the Jews) was barren twenty years; but then her Husband beseeching God for her, he brought forth Twins (Eshau and Jacob) which struggled in her Womb; the elder being, as God foretold, to serve the younger. Fifteen years after, Abraham died, being 175 years old, having sojourned in the Land of Canaan a hundred years; twenty two after the Death of Sem, four before that of Heber; in the days of Inachus King of the Argives, 1821 years before the Aera of Christ, in the 2183 year of the World. Of Abraham (besides Artapanus and Charran before mentioned) Berjus the Chaldean had some Knowledge, though he named him not. Hecateus not only made mention of him, by the way, but wrote an History of him: Nicolaus Damascenus, in the fourth Book of his Histories, related that Abra-

Seft. 1. ham, a certain Stranger, reigned at Damascus; having come from a Country about Babylon, said to be that of the Chaldeans. That he departed thence with his People into the Land of Canaan, afterwards called Judea, where his Posterity grew very numerous; concerning which he should speak in another Place. In Josephus his time the name of Abraham was famous at Damascus; where was shewn a certain Village, called Abraham's dwelling.

10. After the Death of Abraham, God blessed Isaac, and made the same Covenant with him. In a time of Famine, he also sojourned in Gerar, where diffembling concerning Rebecca his Wife, the same thing happened to them as formerly to Abraham and Sarah, from another Abimelech, which name was common to all the Kings of the Philistines. Some years after, Ismael died, aged 137 years, 48 after his Father, in the year of the World 2231. From his eldest Son Nebaioth, descended the Nabatians, who inhabited part of Arabia, from the River Euphrates to the Red-Sea, called Arabia Petraea, from Petra the Metropolis of the Country; which, wanting Fruits, abounded in Sheep and Cattel. Diodorus describeth it to have been like a Wilderness untill, as without Inhabitants; without Rivers or Fountains. It was unlawful with them to sow or plant, to drink Wine or build Houses, being extraordinary desirous of Liberty, and judging these things but Temptations, so such as were stronger, to inhale them. Some of them kept Camels, others Sheep; some used to convey Spices, brought out of Arabia the Happy, to the Sea. When they were invaded by an Enemy, they betook themselves into the Wilderness, which being vast, and without water, afforded them sufficient Protection. Another Son of Ismael, named Kedar, gave name to a Place of Arabia the Desart, often mentioned in Scripture. It is thought that, though the Chuseans, Madianites, and Ismaelites were of several Originals, yet their dwell promiscuously together, and grew up into one Nation of the Saracens.

11. Fifteen years after this, Isaac being 138 years old, and blind, sent his eldest Son Ejau to Hunt for Venison, that he might eat and bless him before his Death. But Jacob, by his Mother's Help, supplanted him, and got the Blessing, having formerly bought his Birthright for Potage. Hereat Ejau, enraged, determined to kill him after his Father's Death; which Rebecca knowing, sent him into Mejopotamia to her Brother Laban, that he might thence also take a Wife out of her own Kindred, and not make his Choice amongst the Hittites, of which Ejau had married two Wives. In his Journey God appeared to him in a Dream, and blessed him; for which Cause he changed the name of the Place from Luz into Bethel. Coming to Laban, after a Month's time, he covenanted to serve him seven years for his youngest Daughter Rachel; which being ended, Leah, the eldest, was given to him in her stead, and presently after, Rachel, for which he agreed to serve him other seven years. Rachel, most beloved, continued barren; and Leah, because neglected, obtained Favour of God to be fruitful, which raised such Emulation betwixt them, as Rachel first, and then Leah, gave her Maid to his Bed, accounting the Children begotten on them, as their own. Within seven years, he had by Leah seven Sons, viz. Reuben, Simon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zabulon, and a Daughter named Dinah; by Bilhah, Rachel's Maid, two Sons, Dan and Naphthali; by Zilpah, Leah's Maid, also two Sons, Gad and Asher. Lastly, by Rachel, her self one Son, named Joseph, and born the fourteen year of his Service ending. Six years longer he served Laban for Wages (being to have the Cattel of such and such a Colour) which his hard Master changed ten times; but could not withstand the Providence of God, in his growing rich.

12. Having served his Father-in-law and Uncle twenty years, and observing what Envy he had contracted from him and his Sons, he stole away with all he had, and proceeded three days on his Journey, ere his Departure was known. Then Laban with his Friends pursuing, overtook him after seven days in Mount Gilead, which from the Event of this Meeting had his Name. After several Expotulations, they made a Covenant (Laban being warned by God not to hurt him) and, in Testimony thereof, laid together an Heap of Stones, which Jacob then called Gilead; but Laban, in his Syrian Tongue, Jegar-Schedanutha. Jacob then continued his Journey towards Canaan, wrestling with God's Angel in his Way; from which he received a Blessing, and the Strname of Israel. His Brother Ejau also met him, and lovingly received him, contrary to his Fears. The first place he stayed at was Succoth, so called because there he built an House, and made Booths for his Cattel. Thence he passed over Jordan, and came to Siechem, where he bought of Hamor, the Father of Siechem, a Field, for a hundred Lambs, or or so many pieces of Money. How long he continued in either of these places is not expressed. Demetrius and Alexander Polyhistor wrote that he abode ten years in Secot, saying nothing of Siechem; perhaps because he made little Stay there. Indeed Dinah seemeth to have been Ravished not long after their first coming thither; Hamor speaking to his Citizens concerning them, as persons lately come, and her curiosity to see the Women of that Country, probably may be thought to have proceeded from the strangeness of it. At the end of these ten years she was Ravished, then sixteen years old; being born a little before Joseph, and perhaps the same year. To be revenged upon Siechem, who committed the Rape, her two Brothers Simcon and Levi slew him, and put the whole City to the Sword, coming upon them when they were yet fore by Circumcision, which he had procured them to admit of, that he might obtain the Maid for his Wife.

13. Jacob much troubled heret, was commanded by God to go to Bethel, having Buried all the strange Gods and the ear-rings of his Family under the Oak in Siechem. At Bethel he erected an Altar to the Lord, and here Deborah the Nurse of Rebecca died. Thence he removed to Ephrath, being 107 years old, and when they had almost reached the place, Rachel died in Travel of Benjamin, having (as Demetrius and Alexander wrote) lived with her Husband 23 years. Eleven years after Jacob's Return into Canaan, when he was now 109 years old, Joseph being hated of his Brethren, because he had brought to their Father their evil report, and for his Dream (which prefiged his preeminence over them) they sold him to the Ismaelites; who carried him down into Egypt, where Potiphar Captain of the Kings of M. 2277. Guard bought him, being now seventeen years old. Ten years belived with him: Till refusing to satisfy the wanton Desires of his Mistress, he was falsely accused by her of his own fault, and cast into Prison. The year after, he Interpreted the Dreams of the chief Butler and Baker of Pharaoh, both which were in Prison with him; and accordingly the Baker was hanged, but the Butler restored, who yet forgot Joseph.

14. At this time his Grand-father Isaac died; aged 180 years, in the 2288 year of the World. He was buried in Hebron, by his two Sons Ejau and Jacob; the former having (as some think they have Ground in Charity to believe) reconciled himself to his Brother, and joyined himself to the Church; not being estranged from the Grace of God, but only from the special and particular Covenant, as to the promised Seed; which they have the same Reason to think concerning Ismael: The Funeral past, and the Goods divided betwixt them, being both exceeding rich, and therefore requiring large Room, Ejau departed to his former Possession of Mount Seir; Providence for ordaining it, that when the Ismaelites should afterwards come to inherit Canaan, his Posterity might neither be destroyed, nor displaced. He was otherwise called Edom, and from him Idumaea took it's Name, which seemeth from Strabo to have also included the Country of the Nabatians. And likely enough it is, that he who married the Sister of Nebaioth, might joyin himself to them, and preside over them. This is the famous Heros, Vite Fuller from whom not only Idumaea, but also the adjoining Erythraean, Edomaeon, or Redsea, (all signifying the same thing) was so called; being known to the Greeks, by the name of Erythras, the same with Edom.

15. But two years after Joseph had interpreted the Dreams of the Servants of Pharaoh, he was called up out of Prison, to explain the meaning of one, which the King himself had dreamed. This, brokering seven years of great Plenty to come, and after them as many of Famine; and it being necessary, as he hinted to Pharaoh, to chuse out some wife Man, who being set over the Land, should gather and preserve the Fruits of the Earth, against the time of Want; Pharaoh made Choice of him, being about thirty years old, for this purpose: he appointed him next to himself, and gave him in Marriage Asenath the Daughter of Potiphar, Priest of On (or Heliopolis, where Strabo writeth, that the Priests of old time had their Habitation) on which he begat Ephraim and Manasser. According to his Prediction, seven most plentiful years ensued, wherein he gathered into Store-Houses the Corn that abounded; and after them came seven other of Famine, which prevailed fore both in Egypt and the neighbouring Countries of Canaan and Arabia. Jacob, amongst others, wanting Provisions, in the second year of the Famine, sent his Sons down into Egypt to buy Corn. Joseph knowing them, though undiscovered, accused them for coming as Spies, cast them into Prison, and dismissed them not, till Simon (the eldest of those which conspired against his Life) was bound and left as an Hostage, for their bringing down of Benjamin; that so their Story might be confirmed, of their being one Mans Sons, and that their youngest Brother was left behind. The next year, being pressed with Famine

Now, after some further terrifying of them, he made himself known, and sent for his Father down into Aegypt. Jacob understanding of his Son's Life and Promotion (whom he had given over of a long time, for dead) gladly went down, and with him 66 Souls, besides his Son's Wives; in the third year of the A. M. 2298. Famine, of the World the 2298th, aged 130 years.

16. By Pharaoh's Consent, Joseph placed them in the Land of Goshen, and there nourished them during the Famine. He sold to the Aegyptians the Corn formerly treasured up, and therewith purchased for the King all their Money, Goods and Lands, except the Lands of the Priests, which were not alienated. The Grounds he afterwards granted to the former Owners, paying the fifth part of the Profit to Pharaoh's Life. After Jacob had lived in Aegypt seventeen years, he adopted the two eldest Sons of Joseph, viz. Manasse and Ephraim, of whom the younger he preferred before the elder: He called his Sons together, blessed them, and told them apart, what should befall them in their Posterity. From Reuben A. M. 2315. he his first born he took the Preheminence, because he had defiled his Bed, and gave it to Judah. He prophesied of Christ's Coming, commanded them to bury him in the Cave of Machpelah, in the Land of Canaan, with his Ancestors, and then died at the Age of 147 years, in the year of the World 2315. Joseph caused his Servants the Physicians to embalm Israel, and a Mourning of seventy days (or seventy two,) was observed for him, which number in that Country was only proper to Kings; Then, obtaining Leave of Pharaoh, he and his Brethren, with a great Company of Courtiers, carried him into the Land of Canaan, and buried him there, according to his Will, where they also mourned for him seven days.

17. Being returned into Aegypt, Joseph forgave his Brethren the Fault they formerly had committed against him (which now they feared he would revenge, after their Fathers Death,) and as long as he lived, he nourished them and their Children. This space of time was fifty four years after his Fathers Death, at the end whereof, having exhorted them to Unity and Concord, foretelling them their Departure out of Aegypt, and commanding them thence to carry his Bones, he dyed at the Age of 110 years, when he had governed Aegypt, under several Kings, the space of 80. Trogon Pompeius (as appeareth out of Justin his Epitomizer) wrote many things concerning him, partly taken out of the Sacred History, partly mixed with such Fables as the Heathen were not wanting to invent concerning the Jews. Abram, Moses, and Israel, are made by him Kings of Damascus, which City took its name from their Predecessor. Israel had ten Sons, to whom he committed the Kingdom, and commanded them to call themselves Jews, from Judah, who died before the Division, and whose Portion was divided amongst them all. The youngest of the ten Sons was Joseph, whose excellent Wit his Brothers fearing, they sold him to some Merchants that carried him down into Aegypt. Here learning the Magic Arts, he became very dear to the King, having skill in working Wonders, and Interpretation of Dreams: moreover, nothing either Divine or Humane was beyond his Reach; inasmuch, that he foretold the Barrenness of the Ground several years before it happened, and all Aegypt had perished with Famine, but that the King, by his Advice, caused Corn to be treasured up many years: finally, such was his Knowledge, that his Answers seemed rather the Oracles of a God, than the Replies of a Man. Then following, that Moses was his Son, who both wife and beautiful, became a Leader to such Aegyptians as were infected with Scab and Itch, and so returned to Damascus, the Country of his Ancestors. Which Lyes (with others hereafter to be mentioned) are to be attributed to the Malice of the Aegyptians. With the Life of Joseph endeth the first Book of Moses his History, called by the Greeks, Genesis, which containeth the Account of 2369 years of the World. The next to it in order of time, the Book of Job is thought to be; of which Moses also is reputed Author, by the common Consent and Opinion of the Hebrews.

18. After the Death of Joseph, and all that Generation, the Children of Israel increased abundantly, and grew exceeding mighty; so that the Land was filled with their numbers. But a certain King arising, which knew not Joseph, to keep them down, he pressed them with fore Labour; and left they should increase, gave order to the Midwives to drown all the Male Children in the River. At this time (fifty eight years after the Death of Joseph, and forty one after that of Levi) Auram, the Son of Caath, and Grand-son of Levi by Jochabed the Daughter of Levi (so called by an Hebraism, and not Caath's own Sister, as some have thought) thought) was made Father of a Son, whom for his Beauty they hid three Moneths, not fearing the Kings Command, and when he could no longer be concealed, put him in an Ark of Bull-rushes, daubed within and without with Pitch, and laid him on the Brink of the River. Hither the Kings Daughter (by Josephus called Thermutis) coming down to wash her self, found the Babe; and moved with Compassion, sent for a Nurse, which was Jochabed her self, through the Procurement of Miriam her Daughter, which had watched what would become of the Child, and unknown, had offered her self for a Messenger. Being nursed up, the educated him as her own Son, and called him Mose, because the God had taken him out of the Water. Moy in the Aegyptian Tongue, as Josephus saith, signifying Water, and Tyes taken out, though Mose in the Hebrew is no compounded word, signifying drawn out, delivered, or rather a Deliverer; not without a Mytery; he being a Type of that great Deliverer of Mankind. He was learned in all the Learning of the Aegyptians, and became mighty in Words and in Deeds.

19. But Mose being grown up, by Faith refused to be called the Son of Pharaoh's Daughter, and despised the Pleasure of his Court; having, according to Josephus his History, thrown down his Crown, set upon his head when a Child, and trampled it under his Feet; for which, as an ill Omen, the Priest (who had foretold, that his Nativity would prove disastrous to the Aegyptians) would have had him slain; but he was spared through the Affection of Thermutis. Being forty years old, he visited his Brethren the Israelites; and looking upon their Burdens, when he saw an Aegyptian smiting one of them, he killed him, and hid his Body in the Sand. But this coming to Pharaoh's Ear, he was forced to fly for his Life, into the Land of Midian, where he kept the Sheep of Jethro, or Hebah Priest of that Country, who gave him Zipporah his Daughter to wife. Forty years he continued with him, till the Birthens of the Children of Israel were grown so intolerable, after above eighty years Continuance, that God being moved with their Cries, called to him out of a burning Bush, as he was feeding Sheep, to send him on a Message to Pharaoh, about their Dimission. He laboured by all means to make Excuse; but at length, confirmed by Promise of divine Assistance by Miracles, and the Company of his Brother Aaron, (three years elders) he undertook the Employment.

20. This Message was ill relented by Pharaoh, and greater Burthens imposed on the People; no Straw being now allowed them, for the making of Brick, in which servile work they were employed. Many Signs and Wonders were wrought by Mose in the Kings Presence, which little availed; Janer and Jambres, Magicians, doing the same with their Enchantments. Ten Plagues also by the Ministry of Mose, God inflicted upon the Land. 1. The Waters were turned into Blood. 2. Frogs swarmed in the Land. 3. Lice. 4. Flies and other Insects. 5. A Murrain followed amongst the Cattel. 6. Ulcers in Man and Beast. 7. Thunder and Rain mingled with Fire and Hail, that destroyed the Corn with the Trees of the Field. 8. Locusts covered the Face of the Earth, and consumed the Fruits thereof. 9. Enforced Darkness throughout the Land of Aegypt, such, as no Aegyptian could stir out of his House, yet the Israelites had Light in their dwellings. 10. Last of all the first-born were slain, from Pharaoh that sat upon the Throne, to the first-born of the Captive in the Dungeon, and the first-born of Cattel.

21. The nine former Plagues Pharaoh's heart was so hardened as to withstand; but the tenth forced him to let the People go. Upon the Death of the first-born, he and his Subjects thrust them out with Halfe, out of the Land, and forgot the Jewels of Silver and Jewels of Gold, which they had lent them. For the Israelites were commanded by God, to borrow these things; and, the Night before their Departure, to kill a Lamb; with the Blood of which they were to sprinkle the Lintels of their Doors, that the Angel appointed to do this Execution upon the first-born, might pass by their Houses, at the sight thereof. And in Memorial of the thing, this they were to do every year, on the tenth day of that Moneth (thenceforth commanded to begin the year, being called Abib) eating a Lamb in a travelling Posture, with their Loins girt, and Staves in their hands. Thus left they Aegypt, 430 years after the first Promise made to Abraham, and his Leaving Ur of the Chaldeans, 400 after the Birth of Isaac, 210 after Jacob's Descent into Aegypt, in the 2508th. year of the World. This their Departure is also attested by Heathen Writers; but related to have been upon such Grounds, as the Aegyptians themselves

SECT. II.

From the Departure of the Israelites out of Ægypt, to the Death of Solomon, and the Rent of the Kingdom.

The Number of the Children of Israel may be esteemed by what is recorded concerning their men of War, of the Age of twenty years and upwards. Of these went out about 600000, besides Women and Children; so that if those of that Age be reckoned as two parts of five, of the whole Multitude, (which is the usual Account amongst all Nations, to reckon men for War, as forty to a hundred, in respect of the whole Body) then the total number of all, both old and young, amounted to about 1500000. To these must be added a mixed Multitude; which, having taken up their Religion, went out with them, and is thought by some to have consisted of as many more; so that the whole Sum of all together, at that rate, would arise to 3000000. As for the number of the Israelites, it need not seem incredible, that from about 70 Persons in the space of 210 years, so many should proceed. For if but one man, in the thirtieth year of his Age, should begin to be a Father, and had but one, in the thirtieth year of his Age, should begin to beget at the same Age, in all ten Children, who also with their Posterity should beget at the same Age, that one man, before 200 years, would have descended from him, of the sixth Generation 1000000. of the fifth 100000. of the fourth 10000. of the great Grand-Children 1000. of Grand-Children 100. and of Children 10. But that the Israelites began to be Fathers before the Age of thirty is more than probable; Nature * sometimes not requiring half that time, and there is ground sufficient to think that they often exceeded the number of ten Children. The Scripture relateth Abdon to have had forty Sons, Alexander, Danani, Prianus, and Daridion seventh Sons, and Abah as many. Egyptus, Danani, Prianus, and Daridion are reported to have had fifty Children; Alexander, Jyslin relateth to have had 115. and Hierotimus 600. These things (to add no more) prove the great Increase of the Israelites to have been possible in the course of Nature, although not without an especial Providence.

2. Moses had gathered the People together, as Josephus writeth, about Ramses the chief City of Goshen, that they might be in a Readiness; and thence they came to  Succoth where was their second Station. Here Moses propounded the Command of God concerning the annual Observation of the Passover, and the Consecration of the first born. A ready way hence to the Land of Canaan would have been through that of the Philistines; but because the Israelites were born in Slavery, and therefore had but low and poor Spirits; to exercise them, to stir them up, and left, for want of Experience, they should be so terrified as to return, God lead them another and longer way. From Succoth therefore they came to Etham in the end of the Desert, in two days; whither God conducted them by a Pillar of a Cloud by day, and Pillar of Fire by night, that never forsook them, till they came to the Borders of the promised Land. From Etham they journeyed to Pihahiroth, and thence to the Red Sea. Hither Pharaoh pursued them with all his Forces, repenting he had let them go. They were there exceedingly struck with Terror, and murmured against Moses, for bringing them out of Aegypt. In this Extremity God divided the Waters of the Red Sea, which being as a Wall on both sides to them, they passed over on dry Ground. The Aegyptians stayed also to pursue them in this place, but the Pillar then removed from before them, and placed it self between them, giving light to the Israelites, but causing great Darkness to their Enemies. Hereupon ensued great Consecration, and a panick Fear amongst the Aegyptians, which causing great Disturbance, the Lord to fought against them, and they fled. But then the Waters returned to their Place, and overwhelmed them all, so that neither Pharaoh, nor any one of his men escaped. This place of the Red Sea being here not at all fordable, the sole Power of God procured their Passage; though Jofephus, to gain Credit to the Story from the incredulous Heathen, taketh off from the Miracle, by an unfeitable Comparing of it to Alexander the Great his Paffing the shoar of the Pamphylian-Sea, which at low Water was ever bare, and at other times not very deep.

3. From the Red Sea they journeyed three days through the Wilderness of Eibam; (which, as it seemeth, stretcheth forth it self to both the fides of the Sea) where they found no Water. Thence they came to Marah, where they found Water, but bitter, and thence the Place had its name; which Bitterness was removed by the casting in of a certain Tree which God shewed to Moses. From Marah, they came to their fifth Station at Elim, where were twelve Fountains of Water, and seventy Palm-trees, and thence to the Red Sea; which name seemeth to be applied to some Bay or Creek thereof. From the Sea they came into the Defart of Sin, where they pitched their Tents on the fourteenth day of the second Month after their Departure. Here murmuring for Flesh, Quails were rained down upon the Camp at Evening, and in the Morning was there found Manna, which continued every Morning to fall, all the forty years they abode in the Wilderness. This Wilderness of Sin being very large, and reaching as far as Mount Sinai, they had several Stations in it. The ninth was at Diphka, the tenth at Alufis, the eleventh at Rephidim; where the People again Murmuring for Water, the Rock being struck by Moses gushed out into Streams. Whilst they here continued, the Amalekites (descended from Amalek, who was the Son of Eliphaz, and Grand-son of Elsau) fell in upon their Rear, and made Slaughter of the weaker sort. Moses against them sent Jogbua the Son of Nam, he himself in the mean time praying to God in the Mount. And as long as his hands were lifted up the Israelites overcame, but when he let them down the Amalekites prevailed; so that Aaron his Brother, and Hur his Sister Miriam's husband, bore them up till the Going down of the Sun.

In the third Month they removed and took up their Station in the Desert of Sinai, over against the Mountain Horeb (which 'tis thought was some part of Sinai); and here they continued almost a year; to the twentieth day of the second Month of the next year. Upon this Mountain, God gave the Law of the ten Commandments in a terrible manner, on the fiftieth day after their Coming out of Egypt, as some of the Ancients apprehended. The day after, several other Laws were promulgated, as it were Commentaries upon the Decalogue both Judicial and Ceremonial. Then Moses having offered Sacrifice, read the Book of the Law to the People, and made a Covenant betwixt God and them, and went up into the Mountain, where he remained forty days, six in the lower and cloudy, and thirty four in the highest and fiery Part. In this space of time he received Advice concerning the Structure of the Tabernacle, the Ornaments and Consecration of Priests, &c. From this familiar Conversing of God with Moses, the Heathen Law-givers took occasion to feign such a Privilege to themselves. As amongst the Grecs, Zamolxis gave out he received two Laws from Vesta; Zathraustes amongst the Arimalians from a good Demon; Mneces, amongst the Egyptians, from Mercury; Minos the Cretian, from Jupiter; Lycurgus the Lacedæmonian, from Apollo; and Numa the Roman, from the Goddess Egeria. To this number * Diodorus, out of Ethnick Ignorance, addeth Moses himself, writing that he counterfeited Conference with the God Jau.

5. But the People mistof Moses fo long a time, and not knowing what was become of him, raifed a Tumult, and caufed Aaron to make them a God that might go before them. The Hebrews have a Tradition, that Hur, oppofing this, was flain; but Aaron, overcome with their furious Impunity, made them a molten Calf of Gold, after the Falfhion of the Egyptians, who worfhipped two Heifers, Apis and Mnevis, which they accounted Gods. Forty days, and as many Nights being ended, God gave Moses two Tables of Stone, wherein was written the Decalogue by his own Finger, and fent him down, telling him wherein his People were employed. Moses fomething appealing Gods Wrath, came down from the Mount; but feeing them done before the Calf, in a great Rage caft the Tables out of his hands, and brake them. He put the Calf into the fire, and grinding it to Powder threw it into the Brook, and made them to drink of the Water:

Sect. 2. then commanded the Levites to take every man his Sword, and slay his Neighbour; so that the People fell that day about 3000 men. After this going up to Mount the second time, he interceded for the People, and at his Return, removed the Tabernacle, or Tent, wherein he used to speak with God, out of the Camp, in token of the Lords Displeasure. He hewed two new Tables of Stone, like to the former, and having given order for the making of an Ark of Wood, and all things about the Tabernacle, according to the Pattern shewed him in the Mount, he went up the third time, and continued there forty days and as many nights, without eating any thing, as before. In this time God wrote anew the Ten Commandments; and, being pacified, renewed the League conditionally, and propounded other Laws to the People. When Moses returned, his Face shone, so that he put thereon a Vail when he spake to the Multitude, to which he declared Gods Commands, urged the Observation of the Sabbath, and the Offering for making of the Tabernacle; in the Work whereof, the latter part of this year was spent by Bezaleel, and his Companions.

The Tabernacle reared. Chap. 40.
On the first day of the first Month of the second year, was the Tabernacle reared, and in this Month were these things done which are spoken of in the third Book of Moses, called Leviticus. On the fourteenth day was the Passover celebrated in the Wilderness of Sinai. On the first of the second Month God commanded Moses to number all the Israelites, except the Tribe of Levi, from twenty years old to sixty; the number of whom amounted to 603550, just so many as had been found seven Months before, when the Contribution was to be made for the Tabernacle. On the twentieth of the same Month, the Cloud which rested on the Tabernacle, removed, and they following it in four Armies came from the Wilderness of Sinai to that of Paran, where they stayed twenty three days, in the thirteenth Mansion of Kibroth-Hattavaab. Here the People, weary of their Heavenly Bread, lusted after the Flesh of Egypt, and were punished with a sudden Fire, which devoured many, and was at length quenched by the Prayer of Moses. Here also Moses complaining to God of the great Burthen which lay upon him; the Sanhedrim of the seventy Elders was instituted. In this place, moreover God gave the People Quails for a whole Month, on which they fasted, so that a Plague arose whilst the Flesh was yet betwixt their Teeth, and many perished. Hence the Place had it's name of Kibroth-Hattavaab, or the Sepulchres of Conscience.

Abim struck with Leprosie. Chap. 12.
7. From Hattavaab they removed to Hezerath, where Aaron and Miriam spake against Moses about his Wife; Miriam for that, was struck with Leprosie, and cast out of the Camp, till Aaron confessing their Fault, and interceding for Moses for her, he prayed to God, and she was healed. She being after seven days received again into the Camp, they removed, and came to Rithma, near unto Cades-barnea, in the same Desert of Paran. In the fifth Month of the second year, and the time of Vintage, Caleb the Son of Jephunne, Joshua the Son of Nun, and ten other principal men were hence sent to spy the Land of Canaan. After forty days they returned, bringing with them of the Fruit of the Land. Caleb and Joshua encouraged the People, but the rest utterly disheartened them, causing them to despair ever to possess it, because of the Strength of the walled Towns, and the Giants which there lived. This raised such a Mutiny, that they not only murmured against Moses, but spake of making them a Captain, and of returning into Egypt, threatening to stone Caleb and Joshua, who laboured to the contrary. This so highly provoked the Lord, that he threatened suddenly to destroy them, and being prevailed with by Moses to mitigate his Wrath, denounced that none of twenty years and upwards should ever enter into the promised Land, but wander up and down till their Carkeites fell in the Wilderness; except Caleb and Joshua. And this Sentence was presently executed upon the ten, which had caused the Sedition.

The Israelites commanded to turn back. Chap. 13.
8. When they had therefore now arrived at the Borders of the promised Land, they were commanded to turn back again into the Wilderness towards the Red Sea. But to make some amends, as they thought, for their late Fear and Cowardice, they arose in the Mornings; and against the express Command of Moses, went up into the Mountain to fight, where the Amalekites and Canaanites that there inhabited, smote and discomfited them even unto Hormah. At their Return they wept before the Lord, but were not heard; and upon this Occasion, and the Death of those that fell daily in the Desert, Moses, as it's thought, composed the 90 Psalm, wherein complaining of humane Frailty and shortness of Life, he signifyeth, that mans Age was reduced to 70 or 80 years: and to now the third time time was it, as it were, cut shorter by the half; the two former having been immediately after the Flood; and again, in the time of Phaless, at the Division of the Earth.

Their Mansions for thirty seven years. Chap. 20.
9. Thenceforth, from their Departure from Cades-barnea, are numbered seventeen more Stations in the Wilderness of Paran, wherein they spent 38 years, wandering about, till all the rebellious ones were consumed. The things which happened in those years, cannot certainly be fixed upon any particular one, Moses herein being silent. Yet it is thought, that the History of the Man that gathered Sticks on the Sabbath day, and for it was stoned; of the Rebellion of Corah and his Companions, of Aarons Rod that budded, &c. are to be referred to the latter part of the second year; none of the forty, except the two former and the last of all, being taken notice of by Moses, who recordeth only the seventeen Mansions which were taken up, during the 37 years that passed between. The seventeenth and the last of these (being the thirty second Mansion reckoned from the Beginning) was at Ezion-gaber, upon the Red Sea in the Country of the Edomites, whence they came to Cades, where they took up their 33 Mansion. Heron and others, account this Cades the same with Cades-barnea, the fifteenth Station, making the Israelites to have after 30 many Windings and Turnings, in 30 many years, returned to the same Place. But, others finding Cades-barnea in the Southern Confines of Canaan, will have this Cades or Kadesb, a place different from it, and near to Ezion-gaber upon the Red Sea, (whence they immediately passed to it) in the Desert of Zin. Whilst they remained in Cades, Miriam died at the Age of 126 years, and was there buried. After this the People murmured, because the Water which had hitherto followed them from the Rock Rephidim, here failed, being, as some think, swallowed up of the Red Sea. Hereupon Moses and Aaron were commanded only to speak to a Rock in that Place, to give out Water; but Moses, wearied with the Untowardness of the Multitude, uttered some words of Impatience and Diffidence, and struck the Rock twice, so that the Water gushed out in great Abundance. Because they did not sanctify God in the Eyes of the People, he was angry with them, and excluded them both from Entering into the Land of Promise.

Aaron dieth. Chap. 21.
10. Moses afterwards sent to the King of Edom, desiring Leave to pass quietly through his Country; but, he opposing, he led the People by the Borders from Kadesb unto Mount Hor, where Aaron, died, some four Months after his Sister Miriam, at the Age of 123, in the 40 year of their wandering in the Wilderness; and Eleazar his Son succeeded him in the Office of High-priest. In the sixth Month of the 40 year, the King of Arad, who inhabited the Southern parts of Canaan, came out against them, and took many Prisoners; whereupon, they vowed, if God would deliver his Country into their hands, to destroy his Cities. Hereunto God assenting, they went up, and prospering, gave to the Country the name of Hormah, which is the same with Anababim or Cursed. Then journeyed they from Mount Hor, to compass about the Land of Edom (against which God had charged them not to fight, because of their Ancestors) and came to the thirty fifth Mansion of Ijalmuna, which signifyeth an Image. For here the People murmuring against the Lord and Moses, because of the tediousness of the Journey, and loathing Manna, were bitten by fiery Serpents sent by God (the Greeks call them Dyspades, and Asian maketh them chiefly to breed in Arabia); so that many perished without Remedy. At length, Moses by God's Appointment erected on a Pole a brazen Serpent, upon which as many as looked, were presently made whole.

The King of Arad vanquished. Chap. 33.
11. From Ijalmuna they came to Punon, thence to Oboth, and so to Jic-Abarim, on the Borders of Moab, in the Desert thereof, towards the Sun-rising. Here runneth the Brook Zared, towards which, when they passed, God commanded them not to make War upon the Moabites, who had formerly beaten hence Giants called Emmim, as their Brethren the Ammonites had also outed others, known by the name of Zamzummim. Thirty eight years after their Removal from Cades-barnea, the Israelites passed Zared, all the Carkeites of the rebellious being in that space fallen in the Wilderness, and came to their thirty ninth Mansion of Diken-Gad. Thence they travelled to Almon-Diblathaim, still in the Desert of Moab, and being to touch upon the Borders of the Ammonites, God forbade them to molest these also, because descended of just Lot. He commanded them to pass over the River Arnon; which having done, they removed to their 41 Mansion, in the Mountain of Abraim, over against Nebo.

18. Jofhua drove the five Kings to that Streight that they hid themselves in a Cave at Makkedah; where after he had utterly vanquished and destroyed their Armies, he took them, and killing them, hanged their Carcasses on five Trees till Sun-set: then cast them into the Cave and laid a great Heap of Stones thereon. After their Death he warred with many other petty Kings, as with the King of Limbah, Lachish, Gazer, Eglon, Hebron, and the rest: there was not one City that made Peace with Israel, save the Hivites, the Inhabitants of Gibeon; all others they took in Battle, and utterly destroyed, except such as it pleased God to reserve, for a Lath and Scourge, wherewith to reduce them in times of Rebellion and for their Exercise to be as Thorns in their Eyes, and Goads in their Sides. The Canaanites being thus deprived of their ancient Habitation by Jofhua Sides. The Canaanites: as is conjectured, removing to the Mediterranean-Sea, (where they were known afterwards by the name of Phenicians) continued not all there, but spread themselves abroad, and sent Colonies far and wide into many Places of Europe, Asia, and Africa, concerning which, the old Book of Ezechias, called Canaan, is to be consulted. That is remarkable, which Procopius mentioneth concerning Pillars erected in the Province of Africa, called Tingitana, by a Phenician-Inscription to this Purpose: We are they who fled from the Face of Jofhua the Robber, the Son of Nane. How

Sect. 2. How long this War continued till the Division of the Land, is not expressed in Scripture; yet is thence to be gathered. For Caleb being forty years old, when with others he was sent by Moses to search the Land, was at the time of the Division, as he saith, forty five years older. Now the Spies were sent out in the fifth Month of the second year, after their Departure out of Egypt, or sooner; so that from that time to the Entrance into Canaan, followed almost 39 years; (the Israelites being forty years in the Wilderness) which being deducted out of the said forty five, six years and some few, Remain; during which, the War in Canaan must have continued.

The Claronchia, or Division of the Land.

19. The Claronchia then, or Division of the Land, fell out in the Beginning of the seventh year from their Entrance into Canaan, and in the year of the World 2555 also beginning. It continued about one year, as some gather from the Story. A. M. 2555. First of all, an Inheritance was given to two Tribes and an half, viz. The Tribes of Judah, Ephraim, and the other half Tribe of Manasse. Then met the Israelites together in Shiloh, because seven other Tribes yet remained undisposed of. Therefore certain men were sent from that place to bring a Survey of all the Land, which could not be done in a few days; and then, after their Return the Division was perfected; for all which no less than the space of a year seemeth necessary. So, there are from the Beginning of the World to the end of this Division, 2555 years, containing just so many Weeks of Years, as there are natural Days in the year, viz. 365. Or if we make a great year consisting of so many years as the solar Year consisteth of Days; then have we fix (or seven) such great years. It is further observable, that from the Beginning of the World, to the Entrance of the Israelites into Canaan may be reckoned so many Jubilees of years (viz. 52.) as are Days in the seventh part of a Solar year, one only excepted. The War having endured six years, they rested on the seventh, wherein the Division was made, as in the Sabbatical year.

Sabbatical years and ju-
biles.

20. The Rise therefore, and Beginning of the Sabbatical year, and of Jubiles, some chuse rather to fetch from the first Entrance into Canaan, than from the Division of the Land. For though they began not to sow the Land on this side Jordan till after the Division; yet before this, had they taken Possession of the Country lying beyond the River, which was divided betwixt the two Tribes and the half; whereof, though it must be granted that those which were fit for War, accompanied their Brethren over Jordan, according to the Charge laid upon them by Moses, yet it is to be supposed that those which stayed behind were nourished by the Fruits of that Soil. For Manna had already ceased, and the Corn which the other reaped of the Enemies sowing being but gotten by Degrees, according as they conquered the Country, could scarce maintain them without sending for Supplies to those that stayed beyond the River. When they had ended the Division, the Children of Israel gave for an Inheritance to Joshua that which he asked, even Timmeth Serab in Mount Ephraim, where he built a City, and dwelt therein. The Tabernacle of the Congregation was set up at Shiloh by the whole Assembly. As for the Levites they had no Inheritance assigned them, but (the Lord being their Inheritance) they were to live of Tythes and Offerings. Only 48 Cities on both sides of Jordan, were set apart for them to dwell in, which were also to be Cities of Refuge, whether those that were guilty of casual Homicide might fly from the Avenger of Blood, and there remain in Security till the Death of the High priest. Joshua being very old at the Division, is by the Jews said to have lived past the first Sabbatical year, but to have died before the next arrived. Some give to this Congregation 20 years, and some above; but others think he died not long after the Division. There is no Certainty thereof from Scripture; but that he lived a hundred and ten years is expressly recorded.

21. After Joshua and that Generation were dead, which had seen the Wonders of the Lord, another arose after them, that knew not the Lord, nor the Works he had done; so that the Children of Israel followed other Gods, serving Baal and Astarteh. For this Cause the Anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of Spoilers which spoiled them. He fold them into the hands of their Enemies round about, inasmuch that they could not stand before them; but whithersoever they went out, the Hand of the Lord was against them for Evil, as he had said and sworn. Nevertheless he raised them up Judges to deliver them out of the hands of those that spoiled them; and yet they would not hearken to their Judges, but went a whoring after other Gods, and bowed themselves unto them. Hereupon the Lord resolved not to drive out thenceforth any Nations before them, which Joshua left when he died, that that by them he might prove Israel whether they would keep his way, and to teach them War. There were left five Lords of the Philistines with all the Canaanites, the Sidonians, and Horites that dwelt in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baal Hermon, unto the entering of Hamath. The Children of Israel dwelt amongst the Canaanites, Hittites, Ammorites, Perizzites, Horites, and Jebusites: They took their Daughters to be their Wives, gave their Daughters to their Sons, and served their Gods.

22. For this, the Anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he sold them to the hand of Cushan-rishathaim King of Mejopotamia. How long this was after the Division, the Scripture expresseth not. We read that he oppressed them eight years, but some think it should be read in the eighth year, viz. after the Division, or eighth years, because this Servitude ended in the eight. But that it began not immediately after the Division, neither after the Death of Joshua, seemeth evident, because the Israelites served the Lord as long as that Generation lasted which had seen his Wonders; which cannot be conceived extinct at the same time with him. Others think a longer time than seven years to have passed betwixt the Division and this Oppression, assigning fourteen years to the Government of Joshua after the Division, then ten more to the Government of the Elders after his Death, who might very well live longer than 70; none that were twenty years old when they came out of Egypt having entered Canaan, except Joshua and Caleb. After that, as many years they attribute to an Anarchy, in the sixth year of which they will have the Civil War to have broken out betwixt Benjamin and the rest of the Tribes, wherein all the Benjaminites, except six hundred, were slain. Four years after this War, and at the end of the tenth, Cushan the King of Mejopotamia afflicted Israel for its Idolatry eight years. But concerning this there is no Certainty.

23. At the end of the eight years, God stirred up for a Deliverer, Othniel of the Tribe of Judah, Nephew to Caleb by his younger Brother Kenaz, and his Son-in-law. Into his hands the Lord delivered Cushan, and the Land had rest forty years. After his Death (which is set to the end of these forty years) Israel turned again to Idolatry, and the Lord delivered them up to Eglon, King of Moab, for eighteen years. At the end of this Term he stirred up Ehud a left-handed man of the Tribe of Benjamin, who under Colour of a Mellaage stabbed Eglon into the Belly, and gathering the Israelites together on Mount Ephraim, slew 10000 of the Moabites, all men of War. After this, the Land is said to have rested eighty years, the words being taken literally; but then some think none of the years of the Tyrants or Oppressors, are to be counted severally, and by themselves, but to be included herein as other years after mentioned; else the Account will swell much larger than the whole number of years which the Scripture seemeth to allow of. If we take in all the years ascribed to the Tyrants, then they will have it an Enallage (frequent in all Languages) and instead of 80, Ehud governed, or the Land rested under him only eight years; but others think they have as much reason to take them literally.

chap. 4.

24. After Ehud, Shamgar the Son of Aneth judged Israel, but no mention is made of any time. It followeth, when Ehud was dead, the Children of Israel did Evil again in the sight of the Lord, and he sold them into the hand of Jabin, King of Canaan, whose General was Sisera, and who had 900 Chariots of Iron: he mightily oppressed them twenty years. It is most probable that in this time the Government of Shamgar, was included. (he flew with an Ox-goad 600 of the Philistines, who at this time might also afflict Israel) or else it being but short might fall betwixt Ehud's Death, and the Oppression of Jabin; there being Probability enough that some time passed after his Death, before the Israelites to highly provoked the Lord as to be given up into Jabin's hands. At the end of these twenty years Deborah, the Wife of Lapidoth (judging Israel at this time in Mount Ephraim) moved by God, for Barak the Son of Abinoam from Kadesh-Naptali, and made him Captain. He, with 10000 men of Zebulun and Naptali, overthrew Sisera, who flying on his Feet to the Tent of Heber the Kenite (descended of Jethro, Father-in-law to Moses) Jaeh his Wife killed him, by a Nail driven into his Temples as he lay asleep. So the Land rested under Deborah forty years, as we read it, another interpreting it in the fortieth year, viz. after the Rest restored to it by Ehud.

Jud. 6.

25. This time expired, and the Israelites relapsing to Idolatry, God gave them up into the hands of the Midianites, and other People of the East, which afflicted them seven years, destroying their Corn, driving away their Cattel, and making Havock of all things. This made them cry to the Lord, who first reproved them by a Prophet; and afterwards, by an Angel stirred up Gideon, the Son of Joab, of the Tribe of Manasse, to deliver them. He having pulled down the Altar of Baal, and burnt his Grove, out of 23000 men chose 300. with which number marching against the Midianites, he fo affrighted them by a Stratagem of Lamps and Pitchers, that he routed their whole Army. The Ephraimites took Oreb and Zeeb: Gideon following the Chace beyond Jordan wholly discomfited them, and took, and slew two Kings of the Midianites; Zeba and Zalmunna. After fo great a Victory the Israelites offered him the Kingdom; but he refused it, and asked only the Earrings of the Prey, wherewith he made an Ephod, which afterwards gave Occasion to Idolatry (all Israel going a whoring after it) and became a Snare to him and his Houfe. But thus Midian being subdued, the Country was in Quietness under Gideon forty years, as most read it; but, as others, was quiet in the fourth year; viz. after Quietness restored to it by Deborah and Barach.

26. Though Gideon refused the Sovereignty, yet Ahimelech his base Son thinking such a thing was not to be neglected, dealt with the Sichenites, of whose City his Mother was Native, to make him King: and by their Help he seized on the Kingdom, having slain his seventy Brethren upon one Stone; Jotham the youngest only escaping. The Israelites, after Gideon's Death, had again turned after Idols, and therefore God not only subjected them to the Dominion of this most wicked of all Parricides, but to intestine Dissentions, by reason of him.
For after he had tyrannized three years, Gaal with the Sichenites conspired against him, which having timely discovered, he destroyed them and their City (owing it with Salt) and burnt the house of their God Berith, with a thousand Men and Women which had fled to it. Then went he against Thebez, and took it, the Inhabitants whereof retired for Defence into a stronger Tower. Here, as he was about to set Fire to the Door, a Woman cast down a Piece of a Mill-stone upon his Head, and so brake his Skull, and he caused his Armour-bearer to kill him, left it should be said, that he died by the hands of a Woman. After his Death, Tolab, the Son of Puab, the Son of Dodo, a man of Issachar, that dwelt at Samir in Ephraim, arose to defend Israel, and judged it twenty three years. After him Jair a Gileadite 22 years, thought to be defended of that fair who took the Towns of Argob, and called them after himself Hanoth-Jair; as his thirty Sons in like manner, after that Example, named fo many Cities, which they possessed in the Land of Gilead.

27. Jair being dead, the Israelites returned to their evil Courses, serving Bala-am, Abstaroth, the Gods of the Moabites, Ammonites, and the Philistines; for 8, 9. which God fold them into the hands of the Philistines and Ammonites. It is written, And that Year they oppressed the Children of Israel eighteen Tears, all that were on the other side Jordan, in the Land of the Amorites, which is in Gilead. Moreover, the Ammonites passed over Jordan, to fight also against Judah and Benjamin, and the house of Ephraim; so that all Israel was sore distressed. Some will have this Oppression but to begin at the Death of Jair; others think, they had oppressed Israel eighteen years before, and now passed over the River, to afflict the other Tribes.
The Israelites cried to God, and being reproved, put away their Idols: hereupon, the Ammonites being got together in Gilead, and the Israelites assembled in Mispah in the same Country, Jephthab the Son of Gilead, begotten on an Harlot, was sent for by the Gileadites and made Captain, being a mighty man of Valour: chap. 11.
He first sent to expostulate with the King of Ammon, and to demand the Cause of the War. He answered, it was because Israel took away his Land, when they came out of Egypt, from Arnon unto Jabbock, and unto Jordan; of which he required Restitution. Jephthab replied, that in their Journey from Egypt, they sent to the Kings of Edom and Moab, to desire Passage through their Coasts; but this being denied, they turned aside through the Wilderness, and compassed about the Lands of Edom and Moab, not coming within the Borders of Moab, and so at length came and pitched on the other side of Arnon, which was the Limit of Moab's Coasts; Then, that Sibon King of the Amorites denying them Passage, and fighting against them, the Lord God of Israel delivered him into their hands: and they possessed the Land of the Amorites from Arnon unto Jabbock, and from the Wilderness unto Jordan.

28. Seeing the God of Israel had dispossessed the Amorites, he demanded a Reason, why he should possess that Country; and whether he was any thing better than Balack the Son of Zippor, King of Moab, who never strove nor fought against Israel. Lastly, he asked him, why he recovered not the Land all the 300 years which

which the Children of Israel had enjoyed it, and appealed to God for righteous Judgment betwixt them. These 300 years, if they be reckoned exactly, the years of the Oppressions, and of the Judges, must all along be counted in Length, without including the one in the other; but if this be done, still many more than 300 will be found, and a hundred years more will arise in the Account of time, from the Coming out of Egypt to the Building of the Temple, than the Scripture in another Place alloweth of. Some say, if fo many years really passed, betwixt the last year of Moses, save one, and this time of Jephthab, as those Successions do make; 400 years was rather to have been mentioned, seeing the number exceeded that of 300; and therefore accounting the other way short of 300, they alledge, that it is usual, when a Kill or round Number is chosen, rather to make Use of that which most favoureth their Cause; and therefore Jephthab meant by 300, about, or almost fo many. On the contrary, others believe, that the Scripture doth not suffer them to omit the years of Servitude, and contain them under those of the Judges, which they suppose clearly appeareth out of those words before mentioned, which in General describe the Condition of the Israelites, as successively gui-ty of Idolatry, then punished, and delivered; after which, falling into an Anarchy at the Death of their Deliverer, they again relapsed into the same Sin. They will have also the particular Accounts of these things in Scripture, by their Order and Distinction, to hold out no less unto us.

throweth the Ammonites.

29. But the King of the Ammonites not hearkening to Jephthab, was overthrown with a very great Slaughter. Jephthab at his going forth, vowed, if the Lord would deliver the Enemy into his hands, that whatsoever came first out of his House to meet him at his Return, should surely be the Lord's, and he would offer it for a Burnt-offering. It hapned that his only Daughter came out to meet him with Timbrels and Dances; and after she had bewailed her Virginity, he is said to have done to her according to his Vow. Some observe that for And in the place may be read Or, as if, he would offer the thing, if it were to be offered, or, however to consecrate it to the Lord. And their Opinion seemeth most probable, who hold the was not offered up as a Burnt-offering, but consecrated by perpetual Virginity and Austerity of Life, being altogether separated from Humane Society, except four days in a year, for a little Refreshment; it being said, that he executed his Vow upon her, for that he did not redeem her with Money, according to the Law mentioned in Exodus, but left her consecrated to God in an unmarried State, left she should seem to be another's and not the Lord's. Jephthab, after this, warred against the Ephraimites, who spake against, and threatened him and his House. He cut off forty two thousand Men, all being slain in their Passage over Jordan, that could not pronounce Shibolet. Having judged Israel six years, he died, and was buried in Gilead.

Samson;

30. After Jephthab arose Ifrah of Bethlehem, and judged Israel seven years, then Eli a Zebulonite ten, and Abdon the Son of Hillel a Pirathonite, after him eight years. Now the Philistines again vexed Israel forty years. Seeing neither of these three are said to have delivered the Land, some think those forty years, to have included some of Their Government. There are that fetch the Beginning of them from the fourth year of Ifrah, and end them at the Death of Samson, whom they will have the immediate Successor of Abdon. Of those that are for the lengthening out of the time, some think they are to be reckoned from the Death of Abdon, and end at the Beginning of Samson's Government, which others again infer, by good Arguments, to be included in them, or else twenty of them must fall in with the time of Eli; the seventy Interpreters accordingly, giving to Eli not forty years, as the Hebrew Copies, but only twenty. Still there are not wanting, who think Eli to have succeeded Abdon, and Samson's 20 years (who was yet unborn) to have been included in his 40. They fetch the Rise of the forty years of the Oppression, from seventeen years before the Beginning of Eli, and end them so many after his Death. Samson was a Nazarite from his Mothers Womb, no Razor coming on his Head, and keeping himself from Wine and strong Drink all his time. Hence, as his admirable Strength is said to have lain in his Hair, so others have ascribed it to his Abstinency, as if it had not proceeded from the especial Providence and Power of God. He was the Hercules of the Israelites, really performing such things as the Greeks would scarce attribute to theirs, on whom yet they heaped those things that were done by many. He afflicted the Philistines much in his Life, but much more at his Death, by throwing down the House of Dagon upon the chief of them, being therein assembled

Seft. 2. to make themselves Sport with fo great an Adverfary, whom having got into their Power, they had deprived of his Sight.

31. Had Eli preceded Samfon, he would have been reckoned amongst his Predecessors; according to general Apprehenfion. The High-priest-hood which hitherto had continued in the Family of Eli for five Generations, (viz. in himfelf, Phineas, Abifina, Bukki, and Uzzi, according to Josephus) was in Eli tranflated to that of Ithamar, another of Aaron's Sons. The Sons of Eli being very lewd, grievoufly abufed their Power, and he ufed not his Authority in Correcting them, whereby he fo far incurred Gods Difpleafure, that he threatened to deftroy his houfe; as it came to pals. The Ifraelites, towards the end of his forty years, fought with the Philiftines, but were worfted, and loft four thoufand men. To better their Succels, they then fent for the Ark of God from Shiloh, promifing to themfelves Victory in it's Prefence; but of the next Battel the Ifue was the fame. Hophni and Phineas the Sons of Eli were flain, and the Ark taken. This News being brought to Eli, upon mention of the Captivity of the Ark, he fell backward from a Seat, and being 98 years old, his Neck brake. The Philiftines placed the Ark in the houfe of their God Dagon, which Idol fell down twice before it; and the Multitude was fo plagued with the Hemorrhoides, that they were glad to return it back with Prefents.

32. To Eli fucceeded Samuel, both a Levite and a Prophet, to whose Government, from the Divifion of the Land, paffed 450 years, according to St. Paul, as the Text of Luke now hath it. But to this Place another in the firft Book of the * Kings, exprefsly femeth to contradidt, which maketh the Foundation of the Temple to be laid in the 48th year after the Ifraelites Departure out of Egypt. This later number exceeded the other but by 30. although in it muft be comprehended, beides what is in the former, the forty years of their Stay in the Wilderness, the fix years which paffed before the Divifion, the time of Samuel's Government, the Reigns of Saul and David, with the three years of Solomon, that paffed before the Building of the Temple; all which make up the number of 1295; fo that the literal Senfes of thefe two cannot ftand together: Some go about to reconcile them by drawing down the Beginning of the 480 years, lower than the Text will bear; and by removing that of the 450, higher than is convenient: to whom others joy, in attempting the Reconciliation both of thefe Numbers, and clearing up the matter concerning the 300 years afcribed by Jephthah, to the Poffeffion of the Land of the Amorites before mentioned. But there are, who find a Necessity of confeffing a Miftake, either in the one or other Copie of thefe Places. Thefe are divided in their Opinions; one Party thinking they have better Reason to ftick to the Place of the Kings, which is not fo liable to any Corruption (through the great Care of the Jews) as the Greek Text hath that, by Reason of the Similitude of Words, might well be changed from one to another, through the Ignorance of Tranfcribers. Another will have the 450 years to belong to the Divifion of the Land, and not to the Judges: all which have been miftaken through the wrong Reading of the words.

33. Others both of ancient and modern times, are very confident, that, all confidered, the Fault muft fall upon that Place of the Kings, which giveth but 480 years, to all that time that paffed from the Departure out of Egypt to the founding of the Temple; and that, inftead of 480, 580 was anciently written. For when any one Place difagreeth with the whole Series of Hiftory, clearly held out elfewhere, it is rather to be corrected in its number (which may eafily be altered by a Miftake of one Word) than many Places wrefted to a Compliance with it. Now all the times of the Anarchies, Liberty, War and Servitude, of the Ifraelites laid together, without Confufion of years (for which there is no ground at all,) clearly hold out a hundred years more than this Place of the Kings; and fo exactly from the feveral Particulars make it up, that it feemeth to take away all Doubt. From the Departure out of Egypt to Mofes his Death, intervened 40 years; thence to the Beginning of Othniel 34. whereof 26 are given to the Government of Jofhua and the Elders, and eight to the Servitude under Cushan. Then Othniel governed 40 years, the Oppreffion of the Moabites followed for eighteen. Abud ruled 80. The Canaanites tyrannized 20. Deborah and Barak governed 40. the Madianites oppreffed the Ifraelites 7. thence Gideon judged Ifrael 40. Abimelech reigned 3. Tolab 23. Jair 22. and then the Ammonites oppreffed Ifrael 18. All which numbers amount to 385 years. After this, Jephthah judged Ifrael 6 years, Izan 7. Eli 10. Aldon 8. the Philiftines vexed Ifrael 40. and Heli ruled 40. which make up the Sum of 111 years. Then Samuel and Saul governed 40 years (as will be feen)

Seft. 2. feen) David alfo 40. and Solomon 22, before the Foundation of the Temple was laid, which make up 83 years. Now all thefe numbers laid together amount exactly to 579 years, to which if the fourth year of Solomon be added, wherein the Temple was founded, there arifeth the full number of 580. They perceive therefore it was not without Reason that fo many of the Ancients differed from that Place of the Kings, which might alfo be lyable enough to the Carelefsnets of Scriptures. According to this Account, Students in Hiftory and Chronology are to take Notice that a hundred years are to be added to the more ordinary Æra of the World.

34. In the days of Samuel, the Philiftines grievoufly afflicted Ifrael, till fuch time as by his means, the People being turned to the Lord cast off their Idols, and folemly repented at Mizpah: Hereat God was pleafed to fpare them, and thundring upon the Philiftines, when they were ready to joynt Battel, difcomfited them utterly, and fo terrified them that they forfook the Cities formerly feized on, leaving only one Garrifon in the Country; and no more afflicted the Children of Ifrael fo long as Samuel had the chief Power in his Hands. When he grew old he made his Sons Judges over the Land; who perverting Juftice by Bribery, the People thence gladly took Occafion to defire a King, that in Government they might be conformable to other Nations. Their moft urgent Reafons were, for that the Philiftines yet kept an Hold in their Country, and Nabab the King of the Ammonites threatened them with War; at which they were fo affrighted, that neither trufting in God's Providence (who hitherto had been their King, and Avenger) nor to the Juftice and Prudence of Samuel, would they be fatifised, or put off without a King. God therefore gave unto them Saul the Son of Kijho of the Tribe of Benjamin.

35. In the Book of Samuel no certain years are either given to his own Government, or to that of Saul, but it femeth probable from Scripture that he governed about twenty years alone, from the Death of Eli to the Election of Saul. For it is faid, that the Ark of God abode in Kiriath-jearim twenty years; and that, the time being long, all the houfe of Ifrael lamented before the Lord at Mizpah; which Paflages are joynt unto the ferious Exhortation of Samuel to move them to Repentance. So then the end of twenty years, the Exhortation, their Repentance hereupon, and their moving for a King, with good Reason feem to have been about the fame time; fo that 20 or 21 years and an half are to be given to his Government, which began at Eli's Death. Now Heli died when the Ark was taken; which ftaying feven Months in the Land of the Philiftines was then fent away and came to Bethfhemefch, where the Inhabitants lofing 5060 of their number, for their Curiofity of looking into it, fent Meffengers to thofe of Kiriath-jearim to fetch it unto them, with whom it remained twenty years; and thefe years the Ifraelites counted along.

36. Saul was firft by Samuel privately anointed, and afterwards publicly declared King at Mizpah. Not long after (a moneth it's thought) Jabesh-Gilead was befieged by Nabab, who refufed to grant Peace to the Inhabitants upon any other Terms than to put out all their right Eyes, and lay this for a Reproach upon Ifrael. They defired Truce but for feven days; in which Space, if no Relief came they promifed to come out to him. But Saul, hearing of their Diftreff, got together an Army of 300000 of Ifrael, and 30000 of Judah, with which he eafily overthrew the Ammonites, and raifed the Siege. Hereupon, at the Procurement of Samuel, the People again met at Gilgal, where the Kingdom was eftablifhed, and confirmed unto Saul: at which time Samuel, upbraiding them with their Unthankfulnefs to God and him, terrified them with Thunder and Rain in Wheat Harvest; and again comforted them in the Mercy of God. Saul having reigned two years, the Philiftines again afflicted the Land, with whom he had fore War all the days of his Life. He fought againft his Enemies round about; againft Moab, the Children of Ammon, Edom, and the Kings of Zobah: he fmote the Analekites, and delivered his People out of the hands of them that spoiled them. Yet, his heart not being upright before the Lord, God chofe him out a man after his own heart, and rejected him and his Family. This man was David, the youngelt Son of Jeffe, of Bethlehem-Judah, whom Samuel was fent to anoint fome years before his own Death, and more before that of Saul. In this Space, Saul perfecuted him from Place to Place; yet fuch ardent Affection was there betwixt Jonathan his Son, and David, that the Love of a Kingdom it felf, joynt with the deep Difpleafure of a Father, was nothing able to interrupt it.

Sect. 2.

37. The Apostle Paul declareth, that, after God had destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by Lot, he gave unto them Judges for the Space of 150 years, untill Samuel the Prophet. And afterward, they desired a King, and God gave them Saul, the Son of Kis, a man of the Tribe of Benjamin, by the Space of forty years. Some take the words as giving to many years to his Reign alone; but by general Consent the Government of Samuel is to be included in them. Samuel seemeth to have died not long before Saul (two years it's supposed) at such time as David was provoked by the Churlishness of Nabal; and is said to have judged Ishbath all the days of his Life. Hence is it certain, that Saul reigned not alone all those forty years, and probable that Samuel having governed alone for one half of them, had still an hand in the publick Affairs of the Nation. At length Saul was overthrown in Battel by the Philistines, and lost his three Sons, Jonathan, Abinadab, and Melchishai. And he himself being fore wounded, after he could not prevail with his Armour-bearer to kill him, fell upon his own Sword and died. His Son Ishbath, by the means of Abner Captain of his Host, succeeded him at the Age of forty years; but the Tribe of Judah anointed David King over them in Hebron, who had formerly been consecrated to this Office by Samuel: and he reigned over that Tribe alone, seven years and six Months. Ishbath is said to have reigned over Israel two years; which is to be interpreted peaceably, and not disturbed by War; as his Father is said to have reigned one year, viz. unmolested by the Philistines.

Saul's three Sons slain, and he killed himself. Ishbath succeeded him.

Ishbath slain after seven years.

Punished.

Amnon ravished Tamar. Absalom rebelled.

The Conspiracy of Simei.

38. For, after these two years were expired, a long War ensued betwixt David and him, his side growing weaker and weaker, as David's grew stronger and stronger: David to strengthen himself married Maacka, the Daughter of Talmai, King of Geshur, on which he begot Abalom and Tamar. At length Abner conceiving a Displeasure against Ishbath, because he had reproved him for meddling with his Father's Concubine, revolted to David, and laboured to transfer the Kingdom to him; but coming to visit him about this Affair, he was treacherously slain by Joab, David's General, and Nephew by his Sister Zeraiab. All being out of order now in Israel; Baanab and Recab two Benjamites, the Servants of Ishbath, slew their Lord as he slept in his Chamber, and brought his head unto David. He rewarded them with Death, and was by the Captains and all the Elders of the Tribes, anointed the third time King at Hebron, over all Israel, which Government he held 33 years. A little after this Intallment he took Jerusalem from the Jebusites, and made it the Seat of his Kingdom; himself building and fortifying the City of Sion, and Joab repairing the rest. Then twice he overthrew the Philistines in Rephidim, who came up against him after they heard he was made King. The Ark of God he removed from Kiriath-jearim, to the house of Obed Edom the Gittite, and thence, after three Months, into Sion. He purposed to build God an House, but was forbidden (because a man of Blood) that Work, which was to be reserved for Salomon. For besides his Wars in his younger time, all the Space betwixt this and the Birth of Salomon, seemeth employed in Wars; wherein he overcame the Philistines, Amalekites, Moadites, Ammonites, Idumeans and Syrians. The Borders of his Empire he very much enlarged, not only from Shibor of Egypt to the entering in of Hamat; but also as far as Euphrates, the utmost Limits promised by God unto Abraham; and only possessed by him, and his Son and Successor Salomon.

39. Salomon was the second Son begotten on Bathsheba, the Wife of Uriah the Hittite, with which Woman David first committed Adultery, and then for a Cover added to it the Murder of her Husband. After he had been reproved by Nathan the Prophet he repented, and wrote the fifth first Psalm upon this Occasion. Yet the Infant conceived in Adultery, died as soon as it was born; and, though Salomon was born the next year (as it's thought) yet this Sin escaped not without a further Punishment. For within a while, his eldest Son Amnon ravished his half-Sister Tamar, and for that was killed by Abalom. Some years after, Abalom by the Advice and Policy of Achitophel seized upon the Kingdom. David hereupon fled to God as his Rock of Refuge, and composed the third and the fifty fifth Psalms: then opposing Force to Force, overthrew Abalom in the Wood of Ephraim by Joab his General, who thrust the young man through with a Dart as he hung in an Oak, contrary to David's Order, who had charged all the Captains to deal gently with him for His Sake. This Rebellion was followed by a new Sedition raised amongst the Israelites, by one Sheba, upon this Occasion; because they had not the chief hand above the Tribe of Judah, in bringing back the King to his house; but this was happily suppressed, after Joab had procured the Inhabitants of Abel to cut off Sheba's head.

40. After these things, several Battels infused with the Philistines, in one of which (the last wherein he was present) David hardly escaped the hands of Ishbi-benob, one of the Sons of the Giant; being rescued by Ahishai his Nephew, who slew the Philistine. Not long after, tempted by Satan and his own Ambition, he numbered the People: for which God being angry, propoted to him three sorts of Punishments, viz. Famine, Sword, or Pestilence; as to which, he chose rather to fall into the hands of God, than of man. Then God sent a Plague, whereby perished in one day 70000 men; but, as the Angel was about to destroy Jerusalem he was commanded to desist. David at length having arrived at seventeen years of Age, was so decayed and spent by his many Labours and Troubles, that he could not receive any heat from Cloaths, and therefore a young Maid, one Abigail, a Shunamite was chosen out, to lye in his Bosom. Adonijah his Son taking Advantage at this Infirmary, by the Assistance of Joab the General, and Abiathar the Priest, seized upon the Kingdom. When he had Notice thereof, according to the Prediction of God, and his Promise unto Bathsheba, he established Solomon in his Throne, and having given him a Charge, died about six Months after, when he had reigned over Judah alone in Hebron seven years and six Months, and in Jerusalem over all Israel and Judah 33 years in the year of the World (according to the vulgar way of reckoning, without taking in the 100 years formerly mentioned in the History of the Judges) 2985.

41. David being dead, and Solomon established in the Kingdom, Adonijah asked Abigail the Shunamite to wife, and for that was put to Death, as affecting the Sovereignty. Abiathar was removed from the Priesthood, and Zadok, of the Posterity of Phinehas, placed in his Room, as had been foretold by God, against the house of Eli, from which the Priesthood now returned; Joab for Fear fled to the Horns of the Altar, and there was slain by Benaiah, who was made General in his stead. Simei, who had cursed David when he fled from Abalom, was commanded to build him an House in Jerusalem, and not to stir thence beyond the Brook Kidron, upon pain of Death; which he after two years suffered, having broken the Order. Solomon within a year after his Father's Death, married the Daughter of Pharaoh; after which, offering 1000 Burnt-offerings at Gibeon, where the Tabernacle then rested, God appeared to him in a Dream, and offered him whatsoever he would ask. He asked only Wisdom to govern his People, and neither Riches nor Honour; with which God was so well pleased, that he made him to excell therein all meer men, and accumulated also the other upon him.

42. About all things in a Readiness for building an House to the Lord, (for which David his Father had made large Provisions) Vaphres King of Egypt supplying him with 80000 Men, and Hiram King of Tyre with as many, besides an Architect named Hyero (whose Mother was an Israhelish Woman, of the Tribe of Judah) he laid the Foundation of the Temple in the fourth year of his Reign, and the second day of the second Month Zif. The Structure being in building seven years, the Work began (according to their Computation, who by reckoning the years of the Judges, and the Oppressions severally, add 100 years to the Era of the World) in the 3089th year from the Creation entering, was dedicated in the 3095th ending, and in the 387th year after the Departure out of Egypt, also ending; from which if we subtract those 40 they lived in the Wilderness, then 547 years will be found to have passed from the Original of Jubilees to the Dedication of the Temple, which make up eleven Jubilees, and eight years. So the Service therein began in the eighth year of the twelfth Jubilee, or in the first year of the second week of the twelfth, which seemeth agreeable to the Ceremonial Law, wherein most things consist in the number of seven, and are reckoned by Sabbatical years and Jubilees. And if we divide 3025 by seven, we shall find the Temple dedicated in the first year of the 442 Week from the Creation, almost twelve intire Jubilees after the Service thereof had been first appointed on Mount Sinai.

43. About the same time Solomon built a Navy at Esfon-gaber, on the Shoar of the Red Sea, in the Land of Edom. This furnishing with his own Subjects and the Tyrians (then, by reason of the Situation of their Country, the best Sailors in the World) sent to him by Hiram, he dispatched to Obir, once in three years, for Gold and other Merchandize, whence they brought him 420 Talents. The Country of Edom David had formerly subdued, and thence Solomon his Son had the Privilege of building his Ships there. Aleth or Eluth, called by other Writers Ailana and Ailannum, was then a famous City, seated upon the Arabian Gulf, to part whereof; lying about it, it gave Appellation. 4. Afa his Son succeeded him in the twentieth year of Jeroboam ending, and which was righteous in the Sight of the Lord. He reformed what was amiss, commanding his Subjects to seek the God of their Fathers: in his time the Land had rest ten years. In his 11th year, according to Jehophaz, came Zerah the Ethiopian against him, with 100000 Men, of Cushan: (inhabiting Arabia, where al-Zerah his Ethiopia is only to be found) and Labaan, besides 300 Chariots. To those he opposed himself with 30000 of Judah, and 28000 of Benjamin; and calling upon his God, obtained the Victory, which he prosecuted, and got much Booty. Returning to Jerusalem, he was so wrought upon by the words of Azariah the Prophet, the Son of Obed, as together with his own Subjects and others, (that fell to him in Abundance out of Israel) he sacrificed to, and made a Covenant with God. Then proceeding in the Reformation of his Kingdom, he removed Maaca his Grand-mother from her Dignity, because she was the Patroness of his Idolatry. Basja who now reigned in Israel, provoked with the Revolt of his Subjects, and jealous of the growing Power of Afa, came up against him, and built Ramah, in the 36th year from the Division, left any should go in or out to him. Afa to divert him, hired Ben-hadad the King of Syria, to invade Israel. This Ben-hadad was the Son of Tabrimmon, and Grandson to Hesrim, or Resin, the first King of Damascus, and from him the Surname of Hadad descended upon his Posterity. He smote Jion, Dan, Benmach, all Creveroth, with the Land of Naphthali, and constrained Basja to leave off building Ramah. Afa then destroyed Ramah, and with the Stones thereof built Seba and Mizpaz; but was checked by God for not trusting in him, but putting his Confidence in the King of Syria; and War for this was denounced to be upon him all his Days. Hereat he grew angry with the Seer that brought the Message; and oppressed some of his People: and for this was punished with the Gout in his latter days, for a Remedy to which, he had Recourse to the Physicians, and not to God. So he died, in the 41 year of his Reign.

Jehophaz.

5. Jehophaz succeeded him, to a good Father a better Son. In this third year he sent the Levites throughout the Cities to teach the People, having removed the Sedmites out of the Land. He married his Son Jehoram to Ataliab the Daughter of Abah King of Israel, and in his eighteenth year made him Vice-King. This Affinity drew him down with Abah to fight against Ramoth-Gilead, where Abah received his Death-Wound, and he escaped narrowly with his Life. For joyning himself with this wicked King, he was sorely chidden by Jehu the Prophet, the Son of Hanani; which so affected him, as he reformed his Subjects, travelling himself from Beerseba unto Mount Ephraim to accomplish it: he also constituted Judges, to whom he gave a pious and strict Charge. After this the Mozabites, Ammonites, and a great Multitude of others invaded him; against which he first strove by Prayer to God, and thereby obtained Victory, his Enemies being so stricken with Madnets, that they fell upon, and slaughtered one another. Afterwards intending to send Ships for Gold to Ophir; because he joyined with wicked Azaziah King of Israel, the Lord spoiled the Works, and the Ships were broken at Ezion-geber. Some think he made his Son Partner in the Kingdom it self, having formerly been but his Vicegerent, a year or two before he died. He reigned 25 years, or rather 24, with some odd Months.

Joram.

6. To Jehophaz succeeded Joram being thirty two years old, to the best Father the worst Son; who being established in his Seat, made away all his Brethren, and some of the Princes. In his days the Edomites, or Idumeans, who hitherto, from the time of David, had been in Subjection to the Kings of Judah, revolted. They had heretofore been governed by a Vice-Roy, chosen either out of themselves or the Jews; but now they made themselves a King; the Prophecy of Isaac, the common Progenitor of both Nations, being now fulfilled, that though Elsau should serve his younger Brother Jacob, yet the time should come, when he should break the Yoke from off his Neck. At the same time Livnah (a City of the Priests in the Tribe of Judah) revolted, because he had forsaken the God of his Fathers; for having married Abah's Daughter, he followed the Example of his House, making high-places in the Mountains of Judah, and causing his Subjects to commit Idolatry therein. Because of this, there came a Writing to him from the Prophet Elijah, rebuking him for his Sin, and foretelling his Punishment. Elijah being before this taken up to Heaven, the Jews have believed that this Letter was sent down thence. Some think, there was another Prophet of this name; but most are inclined to believe, that foreseeing, before his Assumption, the Idolatry of this man, he left this Letter with his Scholars to be delivered to him in due time. According to the Threatnings therein contained, God first stirred up against him the Philistines and Arabians, who making an Invasion took away all his Goods, his Wives, and Sons, except Jehozabab the youngest, otherwise called Abaziah and Azariah. Afterwards God struck him with an incurable Disease in his Bowels, which after two years came out of his Body: so that he miserably died, having reigned eight years; three whereof are to be reckoned in Conjunction with his Father. He was buried without Honour at Jerusalem, not in the Sepulchre of Kings; not defired, mislead, nor lamented.

Azaziah.
A. M. 3116.

Jom.

7. Azaziah his Son succeeded him, who followed the Steps of his Grandfather, Abah's wicked Family, and became a Patron of Idolaters. But having scarce reigned one year, he went down to Jezreel to visit his Uncle Joram, King of Israel, where they were both killed by Jehu; Joram being slain outright, and Azaziah dying shortly after of his Wound, at Megidda. Ataliab his Mother seized upon the Kingdom, wherein to establish her self, she destroyed all the Royal Seed. Only Jehoshaba the Daughter of Joram, and Wife to Jehojada the High-Priest, withdrew Joash an Infant, her Brothers Son, and hid him six Years in the House of God. At the end of these years, Jehojada brought him out to the People, then seven years old, and anointed him King, slew Ataliab, restored the Worship of God, and destroyed the House of Baal, whose Priest Matthan he slew before the Altar.

8. Joas then succeeded his Father after six years, who did what was good and just as long as Jehojada the Priest lived, and through his Advice took Care to repair the Temple, which now had stood 155 years. But Jehojada being dead (who lived 130 years; the Jews observing that he, the Repairer of the Temple, was born the same year that the Builder thereof died) Idolatry brake out afresh through his Connivance. The Prophets exclaimed against it in vain, especially Zacharias, the Son and Successor of Jehojada, against whom Joas was so far transported beyond the Bounds of Piety, and Gratitude to his Father's Memory, that he commanded him to be stoned, and that in the Court of the House of the Lord. While't as he died, he said, The Lord look upon it and requite it. So he did; for after a years time, the Forces of Hazael, King of Syria, though but small, invaded Judah, destroyed all the Princes of the People, and sent the Spoil to their King. Joas himself they left very sick of great Diseases, but when they were departed from him, his own Servants conspired against him for the Blood of the Sons of Jehojada the Priest, and slew him on his Bed, in the 40th year of his Reign. A. M. 3160.

9. Azaziah his Son succeeded him, who also seemeth to have reigned with him the three last years; seeing he is said to have begun his Reign in the second year of Joas, King of Israel. When he was confirmed in his Seat, he put those to Death that slew his Father, sparing their Children, according to the Law of Moses. In his twelfth year, he undertook an Expedition against the Edomites with 300000 of his own Subjects, and 100000 Israelites, which he hired for 100 Talents of Silver. But as he was about to begin his March, a Prophet deformed him from joyning to himself the idolatrous Israelites, so that he dismissed them, and they returned home in great Discontent. He prospered against the Idumeans, but the Souldiers (dismissed) fell upon his Cities, and smiting 300 of them, took much Spoil. Yet he at his Return, to amend the matter, having brought home the Gods of the Idumeans, set them up to be his Gods, bowed down before them, and burnt Incense to them. The Lord being fore angry for this, sent first a Prophet to him, whom he rejected. But burning with a desire to be revenged upon the Israelites, he sent and defied Joas their King, who admonished him to be well advised, but this being in vain, they met, and joyined Battle, wherein Azaziah was taken, and led back to Jerusalem; the Wall of which City Joas demolished 400 Cubits, and plundered the house of the Lord, with the Kings House then, departed. Fifteen years after, Azaziah lived; but then, having turned away from following the Lord, a Conspiracy was made against him in Jerusalem; whence he fled to Lachish, and there was slain by the Pursuers, after he had reigned 29 years.

Uzziah.

10. He left a Son named Uzziah and Azariah, who succeeded him; but being said to have begun his Reign in the twenty seventh year of Jeroboam, King of Israel, an Inter-regnum of twelve years must needs have passed betwixt his Father's Death and his Beginning; the Kingdom all this time having, perhaps, been governed by a Lieutenant, or the High-Priest. When he came to the Age of 16 all the People of Judah took him, and made him King in the room of his Father, and under him the State of Judah much flourished. He fought prosperously against the Philistines and Arabians; that dwelt in Gur-Baal, and Mehunimi, or Minenai, dwelling in Seft. 3. *Arabia the Haplie upon the Red Sea: the Ammonites fought to him with Presents, and his name was great in those Parts. About the 35th year was celebrated in Greece the first Olympiad, that great Help to our Understanding in the Distinction of times. He invaded the Priests Office in offering Sacrifice, and for that was stricken with Leprosie, which continued upon him till his Death, living in an house by himself and Joatham his Son ordering the Affairs of the Kingdom. He reigned 52 years.*

Joatham. 11. Joatham his Son succeeded him, who prevailed against the Ammonites, and forced them to pay Tribute two years. He became mighty, because he prepared his ways before the Lord his God; he built the high-gate of the Temple much on the Wall of Ophal; Moreover, Cities in the Mountains of Judah, and in the Forests thereof Cattle and Towers. Under him, his Predecessor, and his two Successors, prophesied Isaiah and Hofea. Micah began in his time; and Nahum also, according to Josephus, prophesied the Destruction of Niniveh, which was fulfilled 115 years after; though others think the Beginning of these years should rather be placed in the time of his Son. He reigned sixteen years, and was succeeded by Ahaz, his Son, whose Reign if it be compared with that of Pekah and Hofea, Kings of Israel, it will appear that he reigned seven or eight years with his Father. He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, walking in the ways of the Kings of Israel: he made molten Images for Baalim, burnt Incense in the Valley of the Son of Hinnom, burnt his Children in the Fire, sacrificed and burnt Incense in the high Places, on the Hills, and under every green Tree. Because of this, God stirred up Pekah, King of Israel, and Rezin the Son of Remaliah, King of Syria against him, who invaded his Kingdom, and did much Hurt: Rezin got Elath, which Uzziah had recovered and built; the King of Israel gave him a grievous Overthrow: the Edomites also afflicted him; and the Philistines, whom Uzziah had brought under, made Inroads upon him. Suspecting his Estate because of these things, he sent to Tiglath-Pileser, King of Assyria, for help, presenting him with the Silver and Gold, which was found in the Temple.

Ahaz. 12. Tiglath-Pileser accordingly came up, and taking Damascus, killed Rezin, in whom fell this Kingdom: which having continued ten Generations, and began in a Rezin, ended in one of that name. Then turned he his Forces upon Pekah, transported into Assyria the Inhabitants of Gilead and Naphthali, as formerly he had done those of Damascus. But Ahaz, to procure those things, having made himself his Vassal, was yet never the better, remained in great Fear of him, and still continued in his Wickedness. He made his Son Hezekiah for his three last years Partner with him in the Kingdom, and at the end thereof died, having reigned together with his Father, and by himself, 16 years. Hezekiah succeeding, opened the Temple which his Father had shut, and reformed the Abuses in Religion. He brake in pieces the brazen Serpent, because the superstitious Multitude fancying some Divine Virtue therein, gave it suitable Worship. He took off the Yoke of the King of Assyria, refusing to pay Tribute; for which Cause in his fourteenth year, Sennacherib, being to make War upon Egypt, led part of his Forces into Judea. Besieging Lachish, Hezekiah bargained with him to depart; but he brake his Promise, and sent Rabshakes with others to Jerusalem, who blaspheming God, and reproaching the King, laboured to draw the People from their Obedience. This being to no Purpose, Rabshakes returned to him, who had now departed from Lachish, and besieged Lisnab, a strong City of Judah; removing still nearer Jerusalem, that he might seem to pursue what he had given in Charge to Rabshakes to denounce against Hezekiah.

Hezekiah. 13. But lying before Lisnab, News came that Tirshakah, King of Ethiopia (who, as it seemeth, had entred into Conspiracy with the Egyptians against him) was moving towards him; at which he was so terrified, that he brake up his Siege, and departed homewards. Yet having a greedy mind towards Judea, he sent a blasphemous Letter, full of Threats to Hezekiah; but he lost in one night by the Stroke of an Angel 180000 men (as some think being on his way towards Jerusalem) and confounded here, returned to Niniveh, where he was slain by his two Sons, Ashamelech and Sharezer, as he was worshipping in the house of Misrob his God. In the time of these Dangers, Hezekiah fell sick unto Death, the Sentence of which he received from Isaiah the Prophet. But by his Prayers and Tears he obtained a Prolongation of Life for fifteen years, and in Confirmation of the Promise, the shadow of the Degrees which was gone down in the Sun-dial of Ahaz was brought ten Degrees backward; and it followeth, So the Sun returned ten Degrees, by which Degrees it was gone down. As for this Sun-dial it's thought that in those ancient times the Knowledge of Dials was scarce amongst the Hebrews. Yet it is possible that Ahaz might have something of that Nature, though imperfect, from the

Baby-

Babylonians, who were of old much given to Astrology, he being otherwise too curious an Admirer of foreign things, as appeareth, in that he must needs have such an Altar made, and erected at Jerusalem as he had seen at Damascus. That the Sun went back, hath been generally believed: but one of late hath gone about to prove that the Shadow was lyable to Reduction, without Retrocession of the great Luminary.

14. The Knowledge of this Miracle coming to the Babylonians (who by reason of their continual Observation of the Heavenly Bodies might have more Occasion to take notice of it) Merodach-Baladan their King sent to Hezekiah to congratulate his Recovery, desirous, it's likely, of his Friendship whom he had understood to be so much in the Favour of God; especially bearing no Good Will to the Assyrians. He in a vain Ostentation of his Wealth shew'd the Ambassadors all his Treasures, and whatsoever was in his House; for which, Isaiah the Prophet denounced the Carrying away all these things to Babylon. For the Pride of his Heart there was Wrath upon him and Judah; yet he humbled himself, both he and the Inhabitants of Judah, so that the Wrath of the Lord came not upon them in his days. He flourished in Abundance of Riches and Honour, stopped the upper water-courfe of Gihon, and brought it streight down to the West-side of the City of David. He reigned 29 years (three whereof were together with his Father): being dead, they buried him in the chiefest Sepulchers of the Sons of David, and all Judah, with the Inhabitants of Jerusalem, did him Honour at his Death.

Manasse.

15. Manasse his Son succeeded him at the Age of twelve years, and therefore was begotten by him after his Recovery. He did Evil in the sight of the Lord above those Nations, which the Lord had cast out before Israel, being more idolatrous than any of his Predecessors; he was also given to Witchcraft and Divinations, built Altars for all the Host of Heaven, which he served in the two Courts of the House of the Lord, wherein he also set up an Image of the Grove which he had made. He filled Jerusalem with innocent Blood; amongst other Martyrs Isaiah the Prophet (as it's said) being fawn asunder with a wooden Saw, because he was free with him in reproving his ungodly Life; although he was of the Blood Royal, as the Son of Amos, the Brother of King Amaziah, according to the Tradition of the Jews, who also have related him to have been Father-in-Law, nay (as some) Grandfather by the Mothers side, to Manasse himself. In such Wickedness continued he for several years, till such time as God sent upon him the Captains of the King of Assyria (Elishachaddon some think) who took him lying amongst the Thorns, and carried him bound with Fetters unto Babylon, which City (as it appeareth from this Place) was now again under the King of Assyria. Here having Leisure and Occasion to bethink himself, in his Affliction he repented, was humbled greatly, and besought the Lord, who heard his Prayer, and restored him to his Kingdom. After this, he knew that the Lord was God; and purged his Realm of Idolatry; which Reformation the Jews make to have been in the 33 year before his Death. He reigned 55 years.

Amon.

16. Amon his Son succeeded him in his Kingdom and Idolatry, but not in his Repentance, worshipping and sacrificing to all the craved Images which his Father had made, and going on to trespass more and more. After two years, his Servants conspired against him and slew him in his own house, all whom the People of the Land put to Death, and made Josiah his Son (a Child of eight years old) King in his stead. He in the eighth year of his Reign began to seek after the God of his Fathers, and in his twelfth to cleanse his Kingdom, and all the Land of Israel, from Idolatry: although the greatest part of the latter, was now Subject to the King of Assyria. In the eighteenth year of his Reign and of his Age the 26th, he commanded the Temple to be repaired, and the Worship of God therein restored: where also finding a Book of the Law, he renewed the Covenant between God and the People, and celebrated such a solemn Passover, as had not been kept in Israel since the time of the Judges. Now if the time of the Judges, and the Oppressions, be not confounded, but taken at their full Length; then this year being the 930th ending, or the 931st Beginning, from the entering into Canaan, was the 7th of the 133 week, or the last of the 19th Jubilee. Josiah in his 21th year ending, disguised himself that he might fight with Necho King of Egypt (who was going up against the Assyrians) and would not hearken to his words from the Mouth of God, labouring with him to refuse Fighting against the Lord; who had sent him, and commanded him to make Haste: Therefore joyning Battel with him in the Valley of Megiddo, he was fore wounded, and being carried to Jerusalem, died there; all Judah and Jerusalem, mourning and making great Lamentation for him.

Jehoshaphat.

17. Whilst Pharash was busy in his Affairs against the Assyrians, the People made Jehoshaphat the younger Son of Josiah, King; who continued but three Moneths in the Seft. 3. Jehoiakim. Dignity. For Pharaoh having finished his work at Euphrates, and in Celestria, came to Jerusalem, whence he led away into Egypt this young King, and left his elder Brother Eliakim in his Place, whose name he changed into Jehoiakim, imposing a Tax of a hundred Talents of Silver and a Talent of Gold upon the Land. Though Jehoaab be said to have reigned three years, yet some will have a year to have passed betwixt the 31 year of Jofiah, and the first of Jehoiakim; partly for that Jofiah seemeth to have reigned something more than 31 years, and some space would be taken up in so solemn a mourning for him, before the Infatment of Jehoaab; and also to consult about this thing, seeing it was against Right and Custom to give this Honour to the younger Brother: lastly some time (perhaps some Moneths) was requisite for settling the Affairs of Judea, about the Infatment of Jehoiakim, and the Tribute. Ludovicus Cappellus moreover, giveth a whole year to Jehoaab, and Jehoiakim (though the Scripture speaketh but of three Moneths apiece) that the last year of Zedekiah might fall into the 390th year from the Rent of the Kingdom; and of which more, when we arrive at that time.

18. Jehoiakim thus advanced by Pharaoh Necho, was twenty five years old when he began to reign; which if so, he was born in the fifteenth year of his Father's Age; as, if Jehoaab was twenty three when he began his Reign, he must also have been born in the sixteenth of Jofiah. This maketh Jofiah to have applied himself to Procreation of Children at least in the fourteenth year of his Life; which (seeming too early, and not agreeable to the Piety of that Prince, there are that suspect for 25, ought to be read 15, and 13 for 23; so that the one might be born in the 24 and the other in the 25 year of his Father. But there is no Necessity for such a Reading of the Text. The fourth year of Jehoiakim fell in with the first of Nebuchadnefar King of Babylon, and was the 23th from the 13th of the Reign of Jofiah, wherein Jerem. 25. 11 & 3. Jeremiah the Prophet first began to prophetic; and hence it also appeareth, that Jofiah reigned at least full 31 years, and that one passed between his Death and the Beginning of Jehoiakim, else 23 only had passed betwixt the 13th of the one, and the 4th of the other. In this year Pharaoh Necho fell upon the Babylonians with War, because, as it seemeth, they had solicited Jehoiakim his Tributary to revolt, and fought against Nebuchadnefar at Carchemish near Euphrates, (by the Greek Chap. 6. and Latin Writers called Ceremish;) in which Battel he was overthrown and slain.

19. After this Victory, came Nebuchadnefar to Jerusalem, where he either took Jehoiakim Captive to lead him to Babylon, or at least made him his tributary Vassal. Some account this year, as the Beginning of the Reign of Nebuchadnefar, so of the Captivity of Judah, and the Desolation of that Country, because that Jeremiah, having spoken first of the 12 years, in which he and the other Prophets had warned the People to no Purpose, afterwards addeth, that God would send Nebuchadnefar his Servant against the Land, which should be a Desolation and an Astonishment, and that these Nations should serve the King of Babylon 70 years. But the Prophecy of Daniel beginneth thus: In the third year of the Reign of Jehoiakim King of Judah, came Nebuchadnefar King of Babylon to Jerusalem, and besegged it: and the Lord gave Jehoiakim King of Judah into his hand, with part of the Vessels of the House of God, which he carried into the Land of Shinar, to the House of his God. This Place seemeth to contradict the other; some have chosen to close with the literal Sense of it, and to hold that in the third year of Jehoiakim, began the Captivity of the Jews. Others see more Reason to stick to the other Place, and to take away all Difference, interpret this third year of the third of the Sabbatical year, or the Week of Years, and thus would read it, In the third year, Jehoiakim the King of Judah reigned, came Nebuchadnefar King of Babylon unto Jerusalem, &c. But the Jews with some modern Writers understand by this third year, the third of the Rebellion of Jehoiakim, against whom Nebuchadnefar coming, about the end of the fifth year of his Reign, made him his Tributary, and so he continued three years; viz. the 6, 7, and 8th, of his Reign. Afterwards, changing his Mind, he rebelled in the Beginning of his ninth year, and so continued for three years in Rebellion, which began expired, in the end of the eleventh, Nebuchadnefar took Jerusalem, and carried him Captive to Babylon, with part of the holy Vessels, and others of the Royal and Princely Race, amongst whom was Daniel; and so the Captivity of 70 years began not till this year.

20. That this third year cannot be understood of the third of Jehoiakim's Reign, is clear from Jeremiah, who joyneth his fourth with the first of Nebuchadnefar; and because elsewhere is made Mention of his fifth: whence is apparent, that he could not be led Captive in his third year. The second Opinion indeed is not amiss; for this

this was really the third year of the Week or the third from the Sabbatical year. For, the 18th of Jofiah, in which the Passover was celebrated, being the last year of the 19th Jubilee, and so the Sabbatical year; from that to the 11th ending of Jehoiakim, or the 12th Beginning, are counted 31 years: viz. four weeks and three odd years; this being usual with the Pen-men of holy Story, to count their times by Sabbatical Years or Jubilees. Jacobus Cappellus would have Nebuchadnefar, at Adam. 3391 & 3392. the Command of Nabopolassar his Father, to have come into Judea in the second year of the Reign of Jehoiakim, who then swore Fealty to him; but in the third year rebelled: whence Nebuchadnefar came down again in his fifth year, and took him Captive. Then will he have him to have set Shallum over the Kingdom, till Jecoonias his Son, an Infant of a year old, should come to Age; but Jehoiakim himself there lived miserably in Captivity, till the 11th year, reckoned from his first being made King by Necho. He being then dead, and News of it brought to Jerusalem, they there made his Son Jehoiakim King in his stead. And he beginneth the seventy years of the Captivity in his fifth year, when he will have him carried to Babylon.

21. But Ludovicus Cappellus his Brother replyeth, that in no Place is there any Mention made of Nebuchadnefar's coming up against him in the second year of his Reign, the place thought to make for the Purpose, having as much Respect to the fifth, as the second year. And as little Mention is there any where made of Jehoiakim's six years of Captivity, who if he had died at Babylon, the Scripture would never have attributed to him the Reign of eleven years, but only so many as he really reigned, viz. 5. The rest, it would either have given to Shallum the pretended Vice-roy, or to Jehoiakim his Son; it being a thing improbable, that the Name should be preserved for Jehoiakim, whilst Sallum indeed reigned. Besides, the Babylonian King observed no such matter afterward in Jehoiakim, whom taking away he really made King Zedekiah, without the Title of Vice-roy or Lieutenant. Nay, though Jehoiakim lived long at Babylon, and after the Death of Nebuchadnefar, being loosed out of Bonds, was honoured and esteemed by Evilmerodach above any of his Condition (and therein excelled Jehoiakim, if he lived there so long;) yet is there no more time given to his Reign, than that wherein he only continued in his Principality. As for the Regency of Shallum, it is a meer Invention, there being no other, according to the Jews, than Jehoaab, who was also called by that name. For in the place thought to make this out, they are bidden not to weep for the dead (viz. Jofiah) but for him that goeth away (Jehoaab taken away by Necho) for he should return no more into his Native Country.

22. Jehoiakim therefore being taken to be led away Captive, in the third year of his Rebellion, and the eleventh of his Reign, died ere he went (as we may suppose) and was cast out or buried, according to the Prophecy of Jeremiah, who had foretold he should be buried with the Burial of an Ass; being cast forth beyond the Gates of Jerusalem, in the Day to the Heat, and in the Night to the Frost, which could be done by none, except the barbarous Babylonians. After his Death, the Conquerour placed in his stead Jehoiakim his Son, called also Conias and Jecoonias, who did civil in the Sight of the Lord, as his Father before him, and Nebuchadnefar it seemeth, repenting of what he had done, left he should be drawn from his Obdience, by the Example of his Father, and the Perswasions of those about him, sent his Army before him, (about a year after his former Expedition) to besiege Jerusalem. When he himself came to the Siege, Jehoiakim came out to him with his Mother and Servants, and yielded his Person in the eighth year of Nebuchadnefar ending. Then the Babylonian entering Jerusalem, took away the Treasures found in the House of the Lord, and the Kings House, brake all the golden Instruments which Solomon had made for the Temple, and so carried Jehoiakim with his Mother, Wives, and Servants unto Babylon. Besides those, he transported all the best sort of the People from Jerusalem, with the ablest and strongest for War from other Places, in which number was Ezekiel the Priest, the Son of Buzzi. Jehoiakim in (a) one place is said to have been but eighteen years old when he began to Reign, but in another (b) only eight. A Fault must needs be in the Reading of one place of the two, which may best be laid upon the former. For if Jehoiakim his Father was 15 years old when he began to Reign, (as some will have it) then was he born to him in the 18th year of his Age, being otherwise (according to this Tenet) absurdly made to have been begot in his 7 or 8th year.

23. Nebuchadnefar made King over the Jews that remained, Mattaniah the Son of Jofiah, from whom he received an Oath of Homage, and thereupon changed his name into Zedekiah. He trode in the Steps of his Brothers and Nephews, the people

ple also being with him incorrigible. He rebelled against Nebuchadneſar, taking part with the King of Egypt, who maintained a Quarrel with him, and therefore the Babylonian came up in the ninth year after his Establishment, took all the Cities of Judea, except Jerusalem, Lachish, and Azeka, which he also besieged. The year following Pharash came with an Army to his Assistance, which Nebuchadneſar understanding went to meet him, and he thereupon afraid to engage, retreated into his own Land. Nebuchadneſar then returning, fate down again before Jerusalem, wherein Famine at length prevailing, and Zedekiah still refusing to yield, though Jeremiah constantly advised him to do it, in the end of his 11th year, and the first Year of the Month it was broken into by the Chaldeans. Zedekiah flying, was overtaken, and brought to Riblah: where he first saw his Children and Friends slain, and then, having his Eyes put out, was carried to Babylon, where he miserably ended his days.

24. On the seventh day of the fifth Month, in the 19th year of Nebuchadneſar came Nebuzaradan, Captain of his Guard; and having got all things ready in two days, set the King's House, with the Temple, and the rest of the Buildings in the City on Fire. The same Month all the Walls were demolished; they that remained in the City, with those which before had revolted, and the rest of the People, together with the Treasures of the Kings and Princes, and the Utensils of the House of the Lord, did Nebuzaradan carry to Babylon. So went Judah into Captivity in the 12th year after the Death of Jehoiakim, 390 after the Death of Salomon and the Rent of the Kingdom (which the Prophet Ezekiel was commanded to represent by Sleeping for many nights upon his left side, the Iniquity of the Children of Israel having from that time abounded) to which the two years being added wherein the Captivity was completed at the Death of Gedaliah, and eight Jubilees are therein contained; 490 from the Beginning of Saul; so that the Kingdom of Judah continued 10 Jubilees, or 70 Weeks of years, so many as are given by Daniel to the Commonwealth of the Jews, from its Relinquition, to the Messiah: From the building of the Temple 420. which therefore stood eight Jubilees, with four Weeks, or in all sixty weeks of years; from the Entrance into Canaan 967, as Ludovicius Cappellus reckoned, containing 138 weeks: from the Departure out of Egypt 1007, during which time Satan was as it were bound, and Gods People were free: Lastly, from the Beginning of the World 3515, which make 502 Weeks, and 71 Jubilees with five weeks of years. The Concurrence of all these Accounts do mightily confirm the Discoverer in his Opinion of their Reality.

25. Jeremiah the Prophet had Leave, either to go to Babylon, there to live honourably, or to stay with the small Remnant that were left in the Land. The latter of these he accepted; and went to Gedaliah, who being appointed Governor kindly embraced him, and gave Encouragement to all the Jews left under his Charge, promising them Favour and Liberty, as long as they remained obedient Subjects to the King of Babylon: But ere the year went about, one Ishmael, a Prince of the Blood, who during the War had kept himself out of the way with Baalshazb King of the Ammonites, slew Gedaliah whilst he was lovingly feasting him at Misphah, with others, both Jews and Chaldeans in his Company. The Residue then of the Jews being without a Governor, and fearing the Revenge of their Lords and Masters, were minded to fly into Egypt, and caused the Prophet to inquire of the Lord for them. Jeremiah answered, that if they would remain in Judea, God would mercifully provide for them; but if they offered to save themselves in Egypt, they should undoubtedly perish. They, notwithstanding this Warning, went down and constrained him, with Baruch, to accompany them, where, by the Leave of Pharash, they inhabited near Taphanes. Here the Prophet often reprehending them for their Idolatry, and foretelling both their Destruction, and the Ruine of those that harboured them, was by their wretched and ingrateful hands stoned to Death; but it is said to have been exceedingly honoured by the Egyptians, so that Alexander the Great translated his Bones into Alexandria. In the 23th of Nebuchadneſar (who then besieged Tyre) Nebuzaradan, Captain of his Guard carried away the Reliques of the Jews and Israelites, to the number of 745, which was the last Deportation. And the Prophecies both of (a) Jeremiah and (b) Ezekiel confirm us in this Belief, that the Jews in Egypt, after Nebuchadneſar had subdued that Country, were partly slain and carried away Captive to their own Country with the Natives, being nothing reformed by the former punishments inflicted either upon themselves, or their Nation.

Jeroboam's Policy utterly destroyed.

THE ten Tribes, falling off from Rehoboam upon his churlish Answer, chose Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, of the Tribe of Ephraim to reign over them. He, being industrious in the Work of Fortifications, had been made by Salomon Ruler over all the Charge of the house of Joseph; but the Lord, after he was provoked by the Idolatry of Salomon, sent Abijah the Prophet to him, to promise him ten Tribes; which coming to the Ears of the King he sought so to slay him; whereupon Jeroboam fled for his Life to Shishak, King of Egypt, with whom he sojourned till Salomon's Death. Then he was sent for out of Egypt, and accompanied all Israel as their Speaker in their Address made to Rehoboam; whom after they had rejected, they made him King, that the Lord might perform what he had promised by the Prophet.

2. In the beginning of his Reign he built up Shechem, which had Iyen Waſte well nigh 260 years, from the time that Abimelech destroyed it. This place being situated in Mount Ephraim he first made his Habitation, till he went over Jordan, and built Penneh, whence afterwards he also removed his Seat to Tirza. He forsook the Lord, who promised him Establishment, if he would keep his Statutes and Commandments, going about by carnal and wicked Policy to secure his Interest. For left his Subjects by going up to Jerusalem to worship, should be turned again from their Obedience to him, he set up two Golden Calves, the one at Dah, and the other at Bethel, having learnt Idolatry towards this sort of Cattel in Egypt. To that in Bethel he sacrificed, instituting a Feast like to that of Tabernacles: and, though rebuked by a Prophet, he was stricken with Leprosy, and might have been convinced by other Miracles; yet neither these things nor the many Judgments of God against him and his Successors, could reclaim either him or them. Rejecting the Priests of the Sons of Aaron, and the Levites, he made of the lowest of the People Priests for the high Places: He had War with Rehoboam continually, and with Abijah his Son, who overthrew him in a great Battle, and slew 50000 of his men; although he added a Stratagem to the Force of his numbers (which doubled those of his Enemy) compassing in Abijah's Army whilst he was speaking to it. Some years after, he died, having reigned 22. Nadab his Son succeeding him, walked in the ways of his Father, and in his Sin wherewith he made Israel to sin; but in his second year, he and all Israel besieged Gibbethon of the Philistines, Baſha the Son of Abijah, of the House of Issachar conspired against him; and slew him there.

3. Nadab is said to have began his Reign in the second year of Aſa, and to have reigned two years: yet Baſha to have began to reign in the third year of Aſa. To this, either must be said, that Jeroboam made his Son King whilst he himself yet lived, or else not reigning twenty two years compleat, but some part only of the twenty second year (so that the far greater part of the first year of Nadab must fall in with the greater part of the second of Aſa) neither did Nadab reign two whole years, but one with a piece of another, and to the first year of Baſha will fall in with the greater part of the third of Aſa. For in this comparing of the times of the Kings of Judah and Israel, is to be taken notice; That, 1. A year only begun is taken for a compleat one. 2. The fathers often, yet living, communicated the Royal Dignity to their Sons. 3. Some were twice inaugurated, as Joram in the Tribe of Judah, and Hoshea in that of Ephraim. 4. That there were many Vacancies, especially in the Kingdom of Israel. Baſha cut off all the Posterity of Jeroboam, not leaving one to piss against the Wall, according as Abijah had foretold; so that here Jeroboam's Policy filled him, the Golden Calves having pushed down his Family. When Baſha saw that Aſa had restored Religion, and that Cause many of his Subjects revolted to him, he had War with him all his days, and in his fourteenth year built Kamath to restrain Fugitives. Aſa to divert him hired Bembadad, King of Syria, who breaking the League formerly made with Israel came up with his Forces, and smote Jion (a City of the Tribe of Aſer)

Secd. 4. Dan of the Danites, Abel-bethmaach of the Manassites, and all Cinneroth with the Land of Naphtali; which forced Baasa to leave off building Ramah, and return to Kings 16. Tirzah. He reigned 24 years, viz. 23 with part of another.

4. Elah his Son succeeded him in the twenty sixth year of Aza, and reigned A.M. 3071; at the end whereof his Servant Zimri, Captain of one half of his Chariots, slew him at Tirzah as he was drinking in the House of Arza his Steward, and the Prophecy of Jehu, the Son of Hanani, was fulfilled against the House of Baasa, that it should be made like to that of Jeroboam, all of it being destroyed in like manner by Zimri. But Zimri himself reigned only seven days; for the People then besieged Gibbethon, and understanding how things had passed at Tirzah, made Omri, the General of the Army, King. He presently led them against Tirzah, and took it; whereupon Zimri withdrew himself into the Palace, and setting it on Fire perished therein, because he also walked in the Steps of Jeroboam. A Schism now followed, for one half of the People chose Tibni, the Son of Gimeath, and he reigned four years (imperfect) as the Jews have it: the Division continued, till at Length Tibni dying, Omri reigned alone. He is also said to have began his Reign in the 31st year of Aza, which must be understood of his reigning alone, having slain Zimri in the twenty eighth year (beginning) of that King. After he had reigned six years at Tirzah, he translated the Seat of the Kingdom to Samaria, which City he had built on a Hill, brought of one Asser, from whom it took the name. Having done worse than any that were before him, he died after he had reigned twelve years. Which if they be accounted from the Death of Zimri, and so contain his whole Reign, then reigned Ahab his Son, and Successor but two years with him, his 11th year falling into the 38 of Aza; but if they be reckoned from the Death of Tibni, then must Ahab have reigned about five years together with him.

5. Ahab exceeded in Wickedness all his Predecessors, not only living in the Sin of Jeroboam, but marrying Jezabel the Daughter of Ethbaal, King of Sidon, whose god Baal he served and worshipped. For this, through the Prayer of the Prophet Elijah, it rained not upon the Land for three years; but at the end thereof he prayed again, and the Heavens gave Rain. He took Occasion to shew the Vanity of the Idol Baal, and then slew his Priests; for which being threatened by Jezabel, he fled into the Desert to Mount Horeb. Against Ahab came up twice Benhadad, King of Syria; once with 22 petty Kings, and both times with great Forces, but still was overthrown, and at the latter time yielded himself. Ahab honourably received him, and making a League with him, let him go in Safety; for which he was sharply rebuked by a Prophet, and told that his Life should go for the Life of Benhadad, and his own People for his People; but there followed a Peace between Israel and Syria for three years. In this space Ahab fell sick for Naboth's Vineyard, who being by Jezabel's Procurement accused of Blasphemy, was stoned to Death, and so Ahab enjoyed the Vineyard by way of Consecration. For this so wicked a Fact severe Judgment was pronounced against him and Jezabel, by Elijah; the Execution whereof by a temporary Repentance they caused to be prorogued. But the three years of the Peace being expired, he renewed the War with Syria; for that Benhadad having engaged to restore such Cities as he had taken, refused to surrender Ramoth-Gilead. Four hundred false Prophets persuaded him to undertake the Expedition; only Micajah sent from God dissuaded him from it. With him joyned Jehoshaphat King of Judah, whose Son Jehoram had married Athaliah his Daughter. But going down both together, Ahab received a Wound by an Arrow, and thereof died, that day, in the 22th year of his Reign.

6. Ahaziah his Son succeeded him, whom he had formerly made his Associate in the Kingdom, and reigned two years in all; being said to have begun his Reign in the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat King of Judah, because his Father then dyed, having reigned 21 years, and some part of another. After Ahab's Death, Ahab fell off from Israel, to which it had been subject ever since the days of David. Ahaziah falling sick, of a Fall which he had through a ladder in his upper Chamber, sent to consult Baal-zebub the god of Ekron, about his Recovery; but the Lord commanded Elijah to meet the Messengers, and denounce Death to him for his Sin. Hereat Ahaziah being angry, sent two Captains with him for his Fettes, one after another, to fetch him to him; but he called for Fire down from Heaven, which consumed them: then being intreated by the third, he went with him to the King, where denouncing the same to his Face, Ahaziah accordingly died, not long after him his Brother Jehoram followed, in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat King

King of Judah ending, who wrought Evil in the sight of the Lord, but not like his Father and Brother; for he put away the Image of Baal, erected by his Father, yet cleaved to the Sin of Jeroboam the Son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, because of his carnal Interest; all the Kings of Israel accounting it an especial piece of Policy, to busie the People in the Worship of the golden Calves.

7. Joram made War upon the Moabites which had revolted, in Conjunction with Jehoshaphat King of Judah, and the King of Edom his Tributary, Elifas the Prophet miraculously providing the Armies of Water, and promising them Victory. When the Sun arose and shone upon the Pits full of Water, it appeared, to the Moabites, Blood; so that they concluding their Enemies to have fallen one upon another, came out to take the Plunder of the Field; but finding other Entertainment, were repelled with great Confusion and Loss. The Israelites then falling upon the Country, made Havock of all things, and besieged Mesha King of the Moabites, in Kir-hazareth, who being straitened, attempted with 700 Men to break through to the King of Edom, but could not; whereupon taking his Son, (his own fume think, others the King of Edom's) which should have reigned in his Stead, he offered him for a Burnt-offering upon the Wall. This Spectacle seemed so horrible, as raised Indignation against Israel, and such Pity towards the Man driven by extreme Necessity, (as Josephus telleth it,) that they being mindful of the Mutability of humane Affairs, they raised the Siege and departed.

8. Benhadad King of Syria made several Attempts upon Israel, and besieging Samaria, reduced it unto extreme Necessity by Famine. Him Hazael his Servant slew, and possessed himself of his Kingdom; but having received, together with it, the Succession of the War, Jehoram went up against him, and was accompanied by Ahaziah King of Judah, to Ramoth-Gilead. Here receiving a Wound, he returned to Jezreel, to be cured; but the Army was left under several Captains, amongst which was Jehu the Son of Jehoshaphat, to whom Elifas sent one of the Sons of the Prophets, to anoint him King. He was presently received as such by the Army, and returning to Jezreel, slew Joram, (and gave Ahaziah his Death's Wound) after he had reigned twelve years. He caused Jezabel to be thrown down out of a Window, where her Carkeiss was eaten by the Dogs; after which, writing Letters to Samaria, he procured seventy Sons of Ahab to be slain, and their Heads sent to him. Then going thither, he slew 42 persons in his way, of the Kindred of Ahaziah King of Judah, who were going to visit Jehoram and Jezabel: at Samaria he put to Death all the Priests of Baal, and burnt the Temple with the Images. Yet took he no Heed to walk in the Law of the Lord God of Israel, with all his Heart, departing not from the Sin of Jeroboam. For his executing of Justice upon the House of Ahab, the Lord promised that his Seed of the fourth Generation should sit upon his Throne; yet because of the Rotteness of his Heart, he began to cut Israel short in his days, by the means of Hazael, who now subdued not only the Gileadites, but also whatsoever the Israelites possessed beyond Jordan, raging with Cruelty against Man, Woman, and Child, as Elifas had foretold him. Jehu coming to the Kingdom at the same time as Athaliah began her Usurpation in Judah, reigned full 28 years, and then died.

9. Jehoahaz his Son succeeded him, in the 23th year of Joash the Son of Ahaziah King of Judah, who did Evil in the Sight of the Lord, in the Sin of Jeroboam; a Grove being also in Samaria. Hazael mightily oppressed Israel also in his days, so that to him were left but 50 Horsemen, 10 Chariots, and 10000 Foot-men. Yet the Lord was intreated by him, and sent Israel a Deliverer; notwithstanding which, yet Prince and People remained incorrigible. After he had reigned seventeen years he died, and left his Kingdom to his Son Joash, who also reigned with him about three years, for that he began his Reign in the 27th year of Joash King of Judah, and is held by the Jews to be that Deliverer, mentioned to have been sent by God, to overcome the Syrians thrice, as dying Elifas foretold him (whom he visited, and consulted about the Affairs of his Kingdom;) and thereby recovered the Cities lost to Hazael by his Father. Upon the Occasion formerly mentioned, he took Jerusalem, with Ahaziah the King of Judah, and, breaking down the Wall of the City 400 Cubits, plundered the House of the Lord and the Kings House. He also was guilty of Jeroboam's Sin, and died after he had reigned together with his Father, and by himself sixteen years.

10. His Son came after him, Jeroboam by name, whom God made instrumental to preserve Israel; nay to raise it to the highest Top of Greatness it arrived at. For he recovered Damascus and Hamath, which had by Right belonged to the Se<sup>ct</sup>. 4. Tribe of Judah, with whatsoever the Syrians had taken from his Predecessors, from the ancient Border of the Entrance of Hamath, to the Sea of the Plains, or the Lake Asphaltites, as Jonas the Prophet the Son of Amittai had foretold, the fame with him that prophesied against Ninive, being of Gath-Hepher, a Town of the Tribe of (a) Zebulon, in (b) Galilee of the Gentiles; out of which therefore arose a Prophet, through the learned Pharisees so earnestly urged the contrary to Nicodemus. In the King's days also prophesied Hofea, and Amos, called from the Herd in Judea, to prophesie to the People of Israel. Notwithstanding all that God did for Jeroboam, he did Evil also in his Sight, accompanying his Ancestors in the Sin of Jeroboam the Son of Nabat. He reigned 41 years, and after his Death the Affairs of his Kingdom fell to decay; way being made for the Ruine of his House, and an Anarchy ensuing for 24 years. For so it must be, if Zacharias his Son began not his Reign till the 38th of Uzziah King of Judah, the last of Jeroboam falling in with the 14th of this King, seeing Uzziah is said to have begun his Reign in the 27th of his, and he reigned 41 years. This may well seem strange in this Kingdom, where Princes were often made away by Usurpers; but God had promised Jehu, that his Children should reign to the fourth Generation; and this Zacharias might be a Posthumus, or however very young, and therefore not admitted by the Nobility to govern, till he had attained to such Ripeness, as was convenient for so great a Charge.

11. Zachariah, doing Evil in the Sight of the Lord, as did his Ancestors, reigned but six Months, being then slain by Shallum the Son of Jabeesh, who reigned in his stead in the 39th year of Azariah King of Judah. He enjoyed his usurped Royalty but a short space, being after two Months seized by himself by Menabem the Son of Gadi, who also reigned in his Stead. Menabem smote Tiphah and all that were therein, with the Coasts thereof from Tirzah, because they opened not to him; and ripped up the Women with Child. He did Evil in the sight of the Lord, not departing from the Sin of Jeroboam all his days; wherefore God stirred up the Spirit of Pul King of Affyria, who invaded the Land; so he gave him 1000 Talents of Silver, which he wrested from the richest of his Subjects, to confirm the Kingdom in his hand. After he had held it ten years he died, and his Son Pekabiah reigned in his Stead, in the 50th year of Azariah; so that Menabem having begun his Reign in the 39th of that King, and reigned but ten years, here seemeth an Inter-regnum of a year or more to have happened after his Death, except that be admitted which some think, viz. that Menabem did not peaceably enjoy the Kingdom till about a year after Shallum's Death, purchasing it then of Pul; so that beginning his Reign in the 29th of Azariah, or Uzziah, must be understood peaceably, and in that year ending. Then mult Pekabiah have begun his Reign in the very beginning of the 50th year; and so a few Months being added to the ten years of Menabem, at the furthest, there will be no need of an Inter-regnum. Pekabiah treading in the wicked Steps of his Predecessors, reigned two years, and then was slain by Pekab the Son of Remaliah, one of his Captains, who possessed himself of his Seat.

12. Pekab joyned with the King of Syria against Abaz King of Judah, flew in Judah 120000 in one day, all valiant men, because they had forsaken the Lord God of their Fathers. Zichri, a mighty man of Ephraim, flew Maasiah the Kings Son, Azrikam the Governour of the house, and Elkanah that was next the King. Two hundred thousand were also carried Captive, with much Spoil, all which Obed the Prophet, when they came to Samaria, procured to be sent back. This made Abaz purchase the Help of Tiglath-Pileser King of Affyria, who first destroyed the King and Kingdom of Damascus, carried the Inhabitants thereof into Captivity; and then came against Pekab, and transported the Beniamites, Gadites, and the half Tribe of Manasse into Halab, Habor, Hara, and to the River Gozan: then crossing Jordan, he set upon Galilee, and carried away the Inhabitants thereof with all the Naphtalites (which remained of those that were left by Benhadad) into Affyria. Pekab doing Evil in the sight of the Lord, after he had reigned twenty years, was slain by Hofea the Son of Elab who usurped the Kingdom.

13. Hofea the 19th King of Israel began his Reign in the 12th year of Abaz King of Judah, who reigned seven or eight years with his Father Jotham, and began to reign by himself in the 17th year of Pekab; so that Hofea may truly be said to have begun his Reign in the 20th year from the Inauguration of Jotham; which we must say, except we allow of a kind of Inter-regnum for eight or nine years, during which time Hofea, for the Stirrs that hapned could not peaceably enjoy the Kingdom; and then mult we lengthen out the time of this Kingdom longer by so many years. Hofea did Evil in the Sight of the Lord, but not as the Kings of Israel which were before before him. Against him came up Salmanser King of Affyria, and made him his tributary Vassal, which he continued for some time, till weary of this Bondage, he conspired with so King of Aegyp, and refused to pay his Tribute: Hereupon, Salmanser subdued first the Mosabites, lest he should have an Enemy at his Back, then invaded Israel and besieged Samaria, in the fourth year of Hosekiah King of Judah, and the 7th of Hofea. At the end of 3 years (in the 6 of Hosekiah and the 9 of Hofea) he took the City, and carried the Israelites Captive into Affyria, where he placed them in Chalach, Chabor, by the River of Gofan, and in the Cities of Media, because they had not obeyed the Voice of the Lord, but transgressed the Covenant. In their Seat he placed certain Perfians that inhabited by the River Chabura, and afterwards, in Distinction from the Jews, were called Samaritans. This hapned to Israel, for their abominable Idolatry, 255 years after the Rent of the Kingdom; so that this Schism lasted five Jubiles and ten years; in the 832 after the Entrance into Canaan, according to L. adonice Cappellus, and therefore in the end of the seventeenth Jubile from that; in the year of the World 3380, or 3381. and so in the end of the 69 Jubile from the Creation; 134 before the Destruction of Jerusalem, and the Captivity of Judah.

CHAP. IV.

The most ancient Kingdom of Aegyp, Contemporary with the Babylonian Empire.

THIS Country falling, at the Division of the Earth, to Cham and his Posterity, seemeth also to have been inhabited by himself. For, thence (a) David knew it by the name of the Land of Hams; (b) Plinarch found it was called Chemia; Stephanus, Hermochymus; the Inhabitants themselves calling it (c) Kam, who distinguished their Nomi, by this Allusion, into Clemmis, Plochemis, Pstachemonis; the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon in Africk, and the names of Ammonis, and Ammonia, given to that Country, challenge no other Original. It is not probable that these names should be only given to it upon this Account, that part of his Posterity here fixed themselves, for then the like might have been expected concerning many other places. Misraim his second Son succeeded him; or he, to whom Mose giveth this name, as Father of the Inhabitants of the Land of Misraim; it scarce being the name of a man, because not of the singular number. The Scripture calleth Aegyp (d) often by the name of Misfor, which seemeth the singular of Misraim contracted from Mejoraim, and signifieth a fortified Place; no Country in the World being more fenced by its natural Situation. The Arabians at this day know the Metropolis Alcairo by the name of Mesre, and the Aegyptians anciently called their first Month Mesori. The dual word Misraim seemeth to hint at the Distinction of Upper and Lower; whereof the former, watered by the River Nile, running in one Channel, was divided into Thebais and Heptanomis. (Thebais being called the Land of Pthoras, and distinguished from Aegyp by Istah and Jeremiah) and the lower part was by the Greeks called Delta, from the Triangular Figure thereof; the River being herein divided into many Branches.

2. This Misraim is thought to be the same with Osiris, so much spoken of by the Aegyptians, and accounted the Son of Saturn, the eldest of the Gods, and also the Son of Jupiter Hammon. For Osiris being by the Greeks named Dionysius, one telleth us that he had this Appellation both from his Father and Country, the former part of the word noting the one, and the latter the other, viz. Nysa a City of Arabia Felix, built by Cham, in which he seemeth to have been born. From the Reign of Osiris, to the Coming down of Alexander the Great into Aegyp, the Priests reckoned, some above 10000 years, others little less than 23000. But several Forms of years being used in several Nations we are to suppose theirs to have been measured rather by the Course of the Moon through the Zodiac, than that of the Sun. Jacobus Cappellus therefore thinketh 1889 years to have passed from the Reign of this Osiris to Alexander his Going down into Aegyp, the beginning whereof he fixed at the 1778th year of the World; 100 and odd years after the Flood, about the same time time that Nimrod his Nephew began his Principality at Babylon. This Osiris is feigned by the Egyptians to have married his Sister Isis, and they make them the true Bacchus and Ceres. Much they are both reported to have done for the Benefit of Mankind, by bringing it to Civility; to Him they ascribe the finding out of Agriculture, and to Her the Invention of Corn and Laws. He built Thebes, the ancient Seat of the Kings, with 100 Gates; travelled into the greatest part of the World to teach men Civility with the Use of Corn and Wine, taking Pan along with him, who being had in great Reverence amongst the Egyptians, dedicated a City to him by the name of Chemmis. In his time lived Hermes, or Mercurius; and Hercules, who being otherwise called Gygion, or Gygionus, is said to have helped the Gods against the Giants. Osiris, when he returned, was killed by his wicked Brother Typhon.

Bull Apis.*

3. Typhon, seizing upon the Kingdom, was by Isis, through the Help of her Son Orus, dispossessed again of it, and his Life; after which gathering together the 25 parts of her Husbands Body (into which he had mangled it) she instituted to him divine Honours, ordering that the several Tribes of the Priests should dedicate some one of their living Creatures to him, and for him worship it as long as it lived; then at his Death, seeking out another of the same kind, to do as much to it. Several things were consecrated in several Places, yet by a general Consent the Sacred Bull, called Apis or Mnevis, was most valued, and chiefly adored, because of the special Help that kind of Creature afforded to Tillage. This Bull was black all over, having only a square white spot in his Forehead, saith Herodotus, on his right side saith Pliny, like to a Crescent, being also sacred to the Moon, as Marcellinus will have it. On the back he had the Image of an Eagle, a knot on the Tongue like to a Crab, and on his Tail double hairs. This kind of Beast did the Egyptians worship as the greatest God, with astonishing Veneration, as Macrobius termeth it, till it had lived several years; but not being suffered to pass a certain Term, it was then drowned by the Priests. Being dead, a great and solemn Mourning there was, until another could be found with the same Marks. Now some make this Beast to be worshipped in Honour of Apis, King of the Argives, who going down into Egypt, was there Deified after his Death, and called Serapis. But there having been several Kings in divers places, of that name, they are confounded one with another.

4. Nothing, indeed, but Uncertainties attend the most ancient History of that Nation; no two Authors agreeing betwixt themselves, concerning the Succession of the Egyptian Kings. This is not only to be attributed to the Force of time, but the Unfaithfulness of their Priests, who having it committed to their Charge, to record the Memorables of their Country, foisted things of their own heads into the Story, concealed from the Natives whatsoever made against their own Profit, and from Strangers all things that tended to the Dishonour of their Country. Out of such a kind of Design they related not the same things to such as travelled thither with a Desire to be informed; so that from the corrupt Fountains of their Records have proceeded the Histories of several, who pretending to have taken them out of the very Archives, are no less distant amongst themselves than from the Truth. The Catalogues of their Kings are full of inextricable Labyrinths; Manetho being of no Credit, because of his notable Lying, and all those who profess to follow him, as Josephus, Africanus, Eusebius, Synellus, Scaliger, Usher, and others not agreeing in their ranking and ordering of them.

5. Several Dynasties are made to have preceded the time of Abraham, with whose Birth (as it is placed in the 43th year of Nimrod) the beginning of the 16th is joyned. Much Labour is spent by some, in an Endeavour to clear the order of these Dynasties, and to expound them. But, if they should be allowed of, little more than 200 years are to be assigned to the Continuance of all the first 15, because the Passage of Cham, and his Posterity from the Mountains of Ararat into Egypt, and the Establishment of a formal Government there, could scarce be performed within one Century after the Flood; time for the Increase of mankind, and the unpassableness of the Earth duly considered; except we cast the Beginning of the first Dynasty back beyond the Flood. It hath been thought therefore that these were not several Successions of Kings, which continued for so small a time, but rather certain Ranks and Orders of Governours under the Kings; who might be content to enjoy their Ease and Quiet, together with the Dignity (as the Kings did which Typhon served) whilst the Management of publick Affairs was wholly committed to these Regents, or Lieutenants, of sundry Lineages or sorts of men, who by their Actions might leave greater Impressions upon Posterity than the Kings them-as Gods.*

6. After Typhon's Death, Isis, as Diodorus writeth, for some time governed the Kingdom; but so joyntly with her Son Orus, or Horus, that he is also said to have succeeded after the Death of his Father; and is moreover accounted the last of the gods. He instituted a year consisting of three Moneths, and thence a year was called after him Horus. The Egyptian Year, properly so called, consisted of 365 days; but besides this, they had also monthly years of thirty days, and others of four Moneths apiece, or 120 days; that by this various, and cunning Account, as Cappellus thinketh, they might delude the Greeks. Of this latter way few Examples we meet with: but Diodorus maketh mention of it, assigning the Cause to have been, for that they divided their solar Year, not into 12, but only three parts; and Cappellus maketh this following account to consist of such kind of years. After the gods, came men to the Government, and the Egyptians boasted that they had Kings of their own Country, and home-borne; for the most part, during the Term of 4700 years; after Cambyses Strangers, as Persians and Macedonians, having governed them. Now these 4700 years he guesseth to consist of four Moneths apiece, and to contain 1544 Julian years, which being deducted out of the years of the World, at the time whereof Cambyses came down into Egypt, 1931 will remain; at what time Osiris, or Orus his Son might perhaps die, who being the last of the gods, Kings began when they ended.

King.*

The first King that reigned after these gods was Menas, or Mene, whose name by some is thought to have been only of Dignity, and that Osiris was to be called. Others think Mercarius Trismegistus meant thereby, for that the Hebrew Word Mene significth an Arithmetician, and that Osiris might well be termed Trismegistus, being a great Conquerour, a Philosopher, and Benefactor to Mankind, in giving good Laws, and teaching profitable Arts. Another would have Sesothris, whom he supposeth to have succeeded Osiris, to be meant by Menas, as nothing inferior to Osiris in Prowess and great Undertakings. But Sesothris the Great reigned not till say nothing of the Greek) might be a proper name as well as a Title of Dignity. But, who succeeded him is not known; the Priests feigning 52 Princes to have followed him in order for the space of 1400 years, unto Eufus, multiplying Kings, for in this unknown Path, take the blind Conduct of the Dynasties again, of omitting the first seventeen, to which almost 4000 years are ascribed, the 18th is by Cappellus made to begin nine years before the time whereunto Eufus is said to be, in the 107th year of the Patriarch Jacob, the first in order of it being Amor, or Amorfi.

8. To his reign are given 25 years; for that, according to this Account, he it was who honoured Joseph, and set him over the Land. He dying in the second year of the Famine, Chebro succeeded him, who reigned thirteen years, and him Amenophis, who reigned 21, under whom Jacob died. To him succeeded Mephres, according to Eusebius, but Manetho after him placeth his Sister Amenesis, or Ameris, to which he giveth 21 years and 9 Moneths. After this reigned Mephres twelve years, Mephramuthosis, 26, and Thothmosis (or Thoutis) 9. After him followed Amenophis (otherwise called Palamothosis and Phamenophis) who reigned 31 years, and by some is accounted that Mennion whose Image of Stone, at Thebes in Egypt, which is witnessed by many Authors of good Credit. To him succeeded Orus, or Horus, who reigned 38 years, and to him Aenecheris, who reigned 12. Manetho maketh Aenecheris the Daughter of Orus, and giveth to her 12 years and one Moneth; after her, he bringeth in Rathosis her Brother, to whom he giveth nine years. But after Aenecheris, Eusebius placeth Achoris, and giveth to him but seven years, to whom succeeded Cenchris the twelfth King: who, being more wicked than his Predecessors, oppressed the Israelites most grievously, and continued eighteen years in his Tyranny, till an end was put to it in the Red Sea.

The Israelites afflicted in Egypt.

9. Above eight years had they vexed the Israelites with insupportable Burthens, notwithstanding which, they grew and increased exceedingly; nay, although Order was given to drown all the Male Children, lest growing too numerous, they might in time of War joyn with their Enemies; else get them out of the Land with an high hand; or because of a Prediction mentioned by Josephus, that an Hebrew should be born, who was to afflict and overthrow the Egyptians. That the Jews lived amongst them, is ever acknowledged by their Historians, accounting it an Honour, as all Nations do, to have set forth Colonies. But to take away Disgrace, and to save the Honour of their Country, (which to the Priests was ever most solemn) abominable Lies have been made, and strange Stories devised, concerning their first Coming into Egypt, and especially about their Departure: which briefly to relate seemeth agreeable enough to the Nature of our Design.

Lies concerning the Origin of the Jews.

10. Manetho, an Egyptian Priest and Historian, pretending to describe the Original of the Jews, relateth, That in the days of one of their Kings, Timani by name, a certain ignorant People called Hycor, (which signifieth Royal Shepherds, or Cap-tives, as he himself interpreteth it) from the Eastern parts, with great Confidence invaded Egypt, which easily obtaining without any Force of Arms, they burnt the City and Temple, and raged against the Natives with Sword and Servitude. At length they made them a King of their own Stock, named Saltis, who, coming down into the Country about Memphis, imposed a Tribute upon the upper and neather Province, and put Garrisons in convenient Places. Especially he took Care of the Eastern Coasts, being jealous of the Power of the Affrians; so that in the Principality of Sais, Eastward from the River Babylis, he built up a City called anciently Anaris, which fortifying with most strong Walls, he therein placed a Garrison of 240000 Men. When he had reigned nineteen years, he gave place to Boon, who governed 44, after him Apachnas 36 with seven Moneths, then Apochis 61, Janus 50, and one Moneth; then Affis 49. Under those six first Kings, they fore oppressed, and endeavoured utterly to destroy Egypt, and 511 years had they Power over it. Afterwards the Kings of the Province of Thebes, and the remaining part of Egypt fell on them with a great and lasting War, and by a King named Alis-fragmuthis, were they overcome, and driven up into a place containing the Quantity of 10000 Acres of Ground, called Avaris. The Son of this King, Themufis by Name, attempted the taking of this Place, besieged it with 480000 thousand Men; but, despairing of Success, agreed with him, that leaving Egypt, they should go whither else they pleased; so that, departing with all their Goods, to the number of 240000 Persons, they travelled through the Desert into Syria, (for that they feared the Affrians, who then obtained the Empire of Asia) and built them a City in the Country, afterwards called Judea, which might suffice for so many thousands, and named it Jerusalem.

11. To this History taken out of the ancient Records, Manetho addeth, as he confesseth, fabulous Reports rise amongst the Vulgar, mixing with the Israelites a Multitude of Egyptians languishing with Leprosy and other Diseases; which he relateth, as having forgotten, that the Shepherds left Egypt 518 years before, as may be gathered from the Series of the Kings, and the Distance of time betwixt Themufis, who reigned when the Shepherds departed, and Amenophis, under whom the Lepers went out, the time of whose Reign neither dareth he to define; though he be exact, in the years of other Princes, as Josephus noteth. Now this Amenophis, forsooth, was told by a Priest of the same name, That he might see the Gods, if he would cleanse his Kingdom from Lepers, and other unclean Persons. He, being a very religious man, gathered all the infirm out of the Land, to the number of 80000, whom he sent with others to cut stones on the East of the River Nile; there being amongst them also some of the learned Priests infected with Leprosy. Because Favour was shewed towards them, the Priest, who would have had them destroyed, feared much the Displeasure of the gods, as well against himself as the King, and foreseeing they should have Power over Egypt for thirteen years, he durst not tell the King so much, but wrote a Book concerning the matter, and then killed himself; which cast the King (you must know) into a great Melancholy.

12. But being still desired to do something for the Security of the diseased People, he gave them Avaris, the City of the Shepherds, now not inhabited: whither being entred, and perceiving the place to be very advantageous for Rebellion, they made Choice of Ojarisphus, one of the Priests of Helipolis, for their Captain, swearing to obey him in all things. He presently established for Law, that they should not worship the gods, nor abstain from such Creatures as were most sacred to the Egyptians; to marry with none but those that were tied to them by the same League, and commanding many other things (especially such as he knew, contrary to Egyptian Customs) he prepared for War. Then sent he to the Shepherds at Jerusalem, formerly expelled by Themufis, to open their Condition to them, and to invite them to give their Assistance against Egypt. The Shepherds readily clofed, with the Motion, and all, to the number of 200000, marched down to Avaris. Amenophis much startled hereat, especially because of the Prediction of the Priest, committed his Son, but five years old, to a Friend; and, together with Apis and his other gods, went into Ethiopia, where he was received with all his Multitudes of Subjects, and was kindly entertained by the King, who made Provision for them for their thirteen years. The Solymitans, or Shepherds, with the unclean Multitude, made now great Havock of all things in Egypt, burning Villages and Cities, and raging against the sacred Animals with their Priests, whom they compelled to be their Butchers, and drave away naked; the forementioned Priest still giving Laws, and framing their Policy; who being from Osiris the Helipolitan-god called Ojarisphus, now changed his Name into Moser. But at the end of the thirteen years, Amenophis returned with great Power out of Ethiopia, and with the Assistance of his Son Ramses, fell upon the Shepherds and unclean Multitude, whereof killing many, they purified the rest as far as the Borders of Syria.

13. These ridiculous Lies are more much augmented by others. Cheremoh, who professed to write the History of Egypt, giveth the same name Amenophis to the King, and of Ramses to his Son; but addeth, that the Goddess Isis appeared to the former, complaining that her Temple was destroyed by War. That Phrisphantes a sacred Scribe, told the King, that if he would be freed from Terrors in the Night, he must purge Egypt from polluted Men: he therefore gathered out 25000 diseased Persons, cast them out of his Borders: That the two Scribes Moser and Joseph (the Egyptian Name of the former being Tisibeth, and of the latter Petephseph) became their Leaders, and, coming to Pelusijsus, found there 380000, which Amenophis having left behind would not convey into Egypt: with those they truck up a League, and undertook an Expedition against the Land. Amenophis not expecting the Issue of their Attempt, fled into Ethiopia, leaving his Wife big with Child, which lying hid in a Cave, brought forth a Son called Mesfenes. He, when he came to age expelled the Jews, to the number of 200000 into Syria, and received back his Father Amenophis out of Ethiopia.

malicious forgeries.

14. Isisachus an Historian, going beyond the other two in the maliciousness of his Lies, wrote, that when Bocchoris reigned in Egypt, the People of the Lies, infected with Leprosy, Scab, and other Diseases, resorted to the Temple to beg for their Living, and many being infected with this Disease, Barrenness fell upon the Land. Bocchoris, sending to the Oracle of Ammon about it, received this Answer, That the Temples were to be cleansed from impure and prophane Persons, who were to be cast out into the Desert: but the Scabby and Leprous should be drowned; the Sun not enduring they should live; which being done, and the Temples purified, fruitfulness would be restored to the Earth. Bocchoris accordingly ordered the Priests to gather all the prophane out of the Temples, and give them up to Souldiers, who were to carry them into the Wilderness; and the Leprous and Scabby to be wrapped in Lead, and cast into the Sea; which being drowned accordingly, the other were exposed to perish in the Desert. But those, consulting for their own Safety, kept Fires that Night, and strict Watch; then, the day following, a solemn Fast to God for their Preservation. On the next, Council was given them by a certain Man named Moser, that they should march on in one Body, till they arrived at some good Soil. Then commanded he them, to be kind to no man, to give bad Council rather than good, and overthrow the Temples of the Gods, as many as they should find; which being approved of, they travelled through the Desert, and after much Trouble, came to a fruitful Soil, where using the Inhabitants very injuriously, and rifling and burning the Temples, they arrived at length in that Country, since called Judea, and building a City seated themselves there. This City was at first called Hierosola, from the spoiling of the Temples; but afterwards, to shun the Disgrace of the Occasion, they changed it into Hierosolyms, and took the name of Hierosolymitans.

Apian his Lie.

15. Further than this; Apian a Grammarian of Alexandria, as he counterfeited himself, but born in Oasis, a Town of Egypt, amongst several other Lies against the Jews, wrote, that he had received from the eldest of the Egyptians, how Moser was a Helipolitan, and, being brought up according to the Customs of his Country, changed the Rites thereof at his own Pleasure: That he led the Leprous, Blind, and Lame, out of Egypt; but fairly saith, it was in the first year of the seventh

Olym-

Olympiad, the fame wherein Carthage was built by the Tyrians, which happened about 150 years after Pharo the King of Tyre (as appeareth out of the Phenician Annals) with whom Solomon was contemporary. He mentioned the same number of infirm Persons as Lyfsmachus, but addeth a Reason why the Sabbath was so called. Travelling fix days together, faith he, on the seventh day they rested in Judea, for that they were forely plagued with Ulcers in their privy parts, and named it Sabbath, from the Egyptian Word Sabbatofis, which significeth that Discease. Notwithstanding that he faith they finished their Journey in six days, yet he further writeth, that Moses hid himself for forty days upon the Mount Sinai (which lyeth betwixt Egypt and Arabia) whence coming down, he gave Laws unto the Jews. As for the Jewish Religion, he was not ashamed to write, that in their Temple was set the head of an Ass made of Gold, and of great Value, which being there worshipped, was taken thence when Antiochus Epiphanes spoiled the Place.

Reasons for these Lyes raised by the Egyptians, and others against the Jews.

16. Such Aburdities were delivered by the Egyptians, and those who out of desire to gratifie them, have, after their Example, endeavoured to conceal the Truth; to which Josephus in his two Books against Apion, hath abundantly answered. Several Reasons have moved them to corrupt their Original Records. The Israelites growing great in that Country, out of it they returned to the promised Land by the stretched out Arm of God, to the great Reproach of their cruel and imperious Lords. The Difference of Religion raised also betwixt the two Nations (as betwixt the Jews and the whole World) mortal Enmity, whilst the one worshipped the only true God, and the bafe and degenerate Spirit of the other fell down to things far inferior to themselves; which Difference some (though but few) Persons discerning, were ambitious to become Profelytes to the Jewish Doctrine: Hence againe arose such Envy, that some defended to that Indiscretion and Weakness, as to contradict their own most ancient and authentick Writers. The in-bred Blindness of men's Minds, increased by Education, hath so far prevailed, that the (a) greatest part of Heathen Writers have in this Contention sided with the Egyptians, (otherwise contemptible enough in their Eyes) and subscribed to what they have said concerning the Original of the Jewish Nations; though some (b) have not given Credit to such Reports.

Manetho his false Chronology.

17. As Manetho erreth in the Cause of the Departure of the Jews out of Egypt, so also in the time thereof, though not so grossly as his Friend Apion. Manetho nameth the King Themufis, by whom they were expelled: Who, if the same with Ampfi, he lived 230 years before their true Departure; and that he is the same appeareth by Manetho's Catalogue, taken out of Josephus. But (to go on with the Story of the Kings) Themufis reigned, according to Manetho, 25 years and four Moneths after their Expulsion. Chelron his Son succeeded him, and reigned thirteen years; next him, Amenophis 20 with seven Moneths; his Sister Ameffes two, and nine Moneths. Mephres followed her, and continued twelve years and nine Moneths; him Mephramutofis, who reigned 25, and ten Moneths; then Themofis nine, and eight Moneths; Amenophis thirty, and ten Moneths; Orus 26, and five Moneths. His Daughter Aencheres reigned ten years and one Moneth, Rathoris her Brother nine years; Aencheres twelve, and five Moneths; another of that Name twelve, and three Moneths; Armais four, and one Moneth; Arnefis one, and four Moneths; Arneffes Miamun sixty six, and two Moneths; and lastly Amenophis nineteen, and six Moneths. In whose time one who, forsaking Eusebius, followeth Manetho, in ranking those Kings holdeth the Israelites to have departed Egypt, and consequently will have this King drowned in the Sea. That Rameffes Miamun was he who first began to afflict the Israelites, the length of his Reign (as * one supposeth) maketh probable; whose Name also seemeth to him to have given Appellation to one of the Cities, in building of which they were employed.

Strabo's or other's.

18. After Amenophis reigned Setofis, who having great Forces both by Land and Sea, left his Brother Armais Deputy of Egypt, and forbidding him the Diadem and meddling with his Wife or Concubines, undertook an Expedition against Cyprus and Phenicia, and then against the Affrians and Medes, all which he brought under, either by the Sword or the Terror of his name, whereby, elevated in his mind, he confidently marched up and down the East Countries, overrunning the Cities and States thereof at his Pleasure. Much time being herein spent, his Brother in the mean while acted all things in Egypt contrary to his Injunctions, by the Advice of his Friends, assuming the Diadem and rebelling. Of this the Chief Priest secretly gave him Intelligence, so that having back to Pelufium, he recovered his Kingdom. Manetho addeth, that this Setofis was also called Egyptus, (from whence the Country took the Name of Egypt) and this his Brother Armais also also the Appellation of Danus. If so; then Amenophis, who was swallowed up of the Sea, must be taken for Belus, the Father of Egyptus and Danus according to the Greeks, who not being confounded with the Father of Ninus (as by Mythologists he is wont to be) is said to have lived 322 years before the Destruction of Troy, which account Learned Usher judgeth fitly to agree with the time of Amenophis. He also thinketh Rameffes Miamun to be Neptune, Mia coming near to, and therefore seemeth to be derived from, Moy; which in the ancient Egyptian Language, according to Josephus, significeth Water. Neptune is said also to be Father of Buphis, who at this time tyrannizing about the River Nile, cruelly flew such Strangers as came near him. Such a Son indeed was worthy of so cruel a Father as Rameffes Miamun; and it seemeth likely enough, that the Story of Buphis might be taken from him and his Sons Cruelty to the Israelites, and so the thing may well enough be applied to Amenophis. Further, if we observe what * another telleth us, that the Poets are wont to call cruel and bloody men by the name of Neptune, as born of the raging and troublesome Sea; then may we find more Reason for Rameffes Miamun his being so called, because of his Inhumanity towards the Israelites and their innocent Children.

* Gellius lib. 15. c. 21.

19. Now, to joyn this Story of the Egyptians with that of the Greeks, (whom yet the other complain of, as corrupting their Antiquities) Apollodorus writeth, how Neptune, on Lybia the Daughter of Epaphus (who being the Son of Telegonus, and so the second Daughter to Jafus King of Argos, built Memphis, as some say, and reigned in the lower part of Egypt) begat two Sons Belus and Agenor, whereof the latter went into Phenicia, and there reigned. Belus obtained Egypt, and of Archinoe the Daughter of Nilus begot Egyptus and Danus. He sent Danus to inhabit Affric or Lybia (so called from his Mother; and after Egyptus had subdued the Country of the Melampodi, or Black-fet, named it Egypt after himself, which according to Eusebius, was formerly called Aria, and, according to others, Potamitis. But he whom Manetho, in Josephus, calleth Setofis, seemeth to be the same with Diodorus: his Seffofis, and Seffofis of Herodotus, concerning whom both of them record (as Manetho hath done) very admirable things. Agreeable to what Manetho delivereth of Seffofis, Herodotus writeth, that Seffofis subdued many Nations. (a) Diodorus faith, that Seffofis conquered Arabia and Lybia before his Father's Death, and afterwards, having a great Ambition to do as much by all the World, first secured the Affections of his Subjects at home (to keep him in Obedience) by his Clemency and Bounty. Then with an Army of 600000 Foot, 24000 Horfe, and 27000 Chariots, he set upon the *Ethiopian*s, towards the South, whom having conquered, he compelled to pay a Tribute of Ebonie, Ivory, and Gold. With a Navy of 400 Ships sent into the Red Sea, he subdued all the maritime Coasts, as far as India; he himself with a Land-Army overrunning not only these parts of Asia which afterwards Alexander subdued, but beyond Ganges all as far as the Ocean it self.

Lib. 2. c. 102, Sec. (c) Lib. 1. p. 349, Sec.

20. After this, he conquered the Nations of Scythia as far as the River Tanais (which severeth Asia from Europe) and left some of his Egyptians to make a Plantation by the Lake Meotis, that gave origin to the Nation of the Colchis, which the Egyptians supposed they sufficiently proved to be their Colonie from the Ufe of Circumcision, imagining that the Jews had also this Rite from Them. Finally all Asia he subdued, with most of the Islands Cyclades; but then passing over into Europe, was in danger of losing his Army for want of Provisions, and by the Difficulty of Places: therefore in Thrace he put Bounds to his Expedition, having in all Places erected Pillars, wherein was written his Success; and where he found Courage, he caused a Member of a Man to be engraven, but where he met with Cowardice that of a Woman. At Length, after nine years, he returned home with much Spoil, where he refreshed, and rewarded his victorious Army. Here he was not idle, but set himself to such Works as he thought might eternize his Name, wherein he employed none of his natural Subjects, but the Captives he had brought with him. This the Babylonians not enduring, brake out into Rebellion, and, fortifying a place near the River, held it out in Despight of him, till at last by composition they enjoyed a Seat, which they called Babylon, in Remembrance of their own Country. He raised up great heaps of Stones and Earth, and to them removed such Cities, as by Reason of the Lowness of their Situation, were obnoxious to Inundations from the River: yet, lest there should be want of Water, and for Convenience of Trade, he caused Rivolets to be digged throughout the Land; he also fortified the Country by a Wall on the Ea ft, and otherwise provided against Invasions.

21. For an Ostentation of his Greatness, he caused such, as being subdued held their Kingdoms of him, or had received new Principalities at his hand, at certain times to come down with their Presents, whom he otherwise used with much Respect: but being to go to the Temple, or enter the City, he would loose his Horses out of his Chariot, and be drawn by four of these Princes. At Length, having excelled all men in Conquests, and other Royal Achievements, he fell blind, and killed himself when he had reigned 33 years; for which Act he was the more admired by the Egyptians. These amongst other things are reported of Sejofris, before whose Statue many years after Darius, the Son of Hystaspes causing his own to be erected, the chief Priest contradicted it, alleging that Darius had not yet excelled Sejofris in honourable Actions; with which Freedom the King was well pleased, and said, if he lived, he would labour to come no whit short of him. His Son succeeded him, of the same Name and Misfortune in the Loss of his Sight, which to recover, he was bid by an Oracle to wash his Eyes in the Urine of some Woman which never knew any other man than her own Husband. Beginning with that of his own Wife, he proceeded to make Tryal of the Honesty of many others, but found none effectual to the Cure, but the Wife of a certain Gardiner, which Woman he then married, and burnt all the rest. Many after him followed in Order till one Amphis came to the Government, who by his Tyranny made way for Atisanes, the King of Ethiopia. He using his Power with Moderation, put no Malefactor to Death, but, cutting off their Noses, sent them away into the Confiners of Egypt and Syria, where he built them a City, called from the Maimedness of the Inhabitants Rhinocolura, which was destitute of all sorts of Provisions through the Barrenness, and Unhealthfulness of the Place. The Soil he chose on Purpose, that they might be diverted from idle, and vicious Courses, by anxious and effectual Care for a Livelihood, which they got by a Trade of Fishing in the adjoining Sea.

22. After his Death the Egyptians recovered the Sovereignty, and created a King of their own Nation, called Mendes. He spent his Life in making Provision for Death by a Sepulchre inimitable for Art, which he made under the Notion of a Labyrinth; according to which Pattern they believed Dedalus to have framed that he made for Minos King of Crete, wherein to keep the Minotaure. After Mendes an Anarchy followed for a long time, till one of ignoble Extraction was made King; by the Egyptians named Cetes, but by the Greeks Protenus, who living in the time of the Trojan War, had great Skill in Astrology, and the Knowledge of Winds; whence, and because the Kings of Egypt were wont to have several kinds of living Creatures, Trees, Fire, and other things painted, and worn about their Heads, the Greeks took Occasion to invent that Fable of his Turning himself into all manner of Shapes. Remphis his Son, and Successor, spent his time in the Improvement of his Revenue and Customs, inasmuch that he died far richer than any of his Predecessors, having got together 400000 Talents of Gold and Silver. The next who was any thing considerable, was Nileus, who because he took great Care about bringing Water from the River to furnish the Country, changed the name of it from Egypt into Nile.

23. The 8th from Nileus was Chemmis, who being born at Memphis reigned fifty years, and built the greatest of the three Pyramids, counted amongst the seven Wonders of the World. Herodotus writeth that the first King who gave his Mind to this Work was Cheops, and that he prostituted his Daughter to raise Money for this Purpose: That the biggest was twenty years in building by no fewer than 100000 Work-men, towards the Diet of whom the Price of Onions and Garlic only, amounted to 1600 Talents of Silver: That his Daughter, of every one who had to do with her begged a Stone, and therewith built a little Pyramid near adjoining. Diodorus writeth that the Basis of the greatest, was on each side 700 Foot broad, the height above 600 Foot, and at the Top it was six Cubits broad, all of solid Stone very hard, and of an everlasting Substance, which he proveth, for that the whole Structure in his time remained unchanged and uncorrupted, though raised 1000 years before. But others which within this hundred years have travelled into Egypt relate how those monstrous Buildings which stand 13 Miles off from Memphis, and look like Mountains at a Distance, are on the North-side much eaten, and consumed with that Wind; the Etesian Winds being there as much putrifying as the Southern in other Parts. These Piles of Stone stand in a sandy Place which affordeth not any Quarries of Stone, some five Miles distant from the Nile, so that the Work may well seem right miraculous, though the Egyptians raised many Fables thereupon. But so many thousands of men were to be killed with this Toil that one might be fatally cured; which yet they say hapned not to him: For the People

People were so enraged hereat, that his Son durst not there bury him, but laid him in another obscure and ignoble place. And yet he could not contain himself, but to his Power must also imitate his Father's Madnes.

24. Cephren the Brother of Chemmis succeeded him, and reigned 56 years, though some would have his Son Chabrys immediately to have followed him. He spent his time the same way, building another Pyramid in Workmanship like to the former, but much inferior to it in Compals and Largeness; being also buried in an obscure place, for Fear of the Rage of the Multitude. After Cephren followed Mycherinus (or Mycerinus) the Son of Chemmis, or Cheops, of whom the Egyptians made great Account, because he reformed much amis in his Father's and Uncle's Days. He also built a Pyramid less than the other, but in Excellency of Workmanship far exceeding them. One Bocchoris succeeded next, according to Diodorus; in Body contemptible, but for Endowments of mind going beyond all his Predecessors. Then, after a long time came in Sabaton the Ethiopian, and reigned in Egypt. But Herodotus writeth that Ashke succeeded Mycerinus, and built a Pyramid of Brick; then followed Amphis, who being blind, in his time Sabacus, or Sabon, invaded Egypt, and drove him into the Fens, where he hid himself: but Africanus relateth that Sabon took Bocchoris alive, and burning him quick, reigned in his Stead eight years. This Cruelty is little agreeable to that Humanity which Herodotus ascribeth to him, viz. that he put no Malefactor to Death; but, according to the Degree of Guilt, imposed upon every one the Carriage of so much Earth to the Place where he dwelt; and hereby the Towns were made much higher, and less subject to Inundations at the time of the overflowing of the River. His Piety is much commended; for being told by one of the gods, that if he would reign quietly in Egypt he must cut off all the Priests by the Middle, he made Choice rather to quit his Interest in the Kingdom, and the Possession thereof, than to hazard, the Quiet of it, or commit such an Act of Cruelty. He is thought by some to be the same with Soc, King of Egypt, who combined with Holiba of Israel against Salmannasar.

25. After his Departure Herodotus brings the blind man out of his lurking Hole, where he had now lien fifty years, and maketh him to have recovered the Kingdom. More likely it is that Sabon the Priest of Vulcan succeeded him, thought to be Senachus his Son, whom Africanus placeth after him; and it may seem probable enough that if he forsook the Kingdom himself, yet he might leave his Son in the Government. This Sabon (or Setbon) wholly devoted to his Superstition neglected Military men, and therefore, when Senacherib King of Affria invaded Egypt, was quite forsaken by them; yet he is said, by his Impunity so far to have prevailed with his god, that pitching his Tents at Pelufium, the Mice did eat the Thongs of the Affrian Targets, and the Horse-Bridles, so that his Enemies were rendered incapable of fighting; and, confounded with Fear at so strange an Accident, retreated. But whatsoever was done at Pelufium, the * Prophecies against Egypt clearly shew that the Affrians pierced further into the Country, and led away a Multitude in Captivity. After Senachus, Africanus placeth Tiracus the Ethiopian, the same with Tirhake, who afflicted Senacherib back into his Country, A. M. 3288. and is said to have made an Expedition into Europe, and pierced as far as the Pillars of Hercules. Him followed an Anarchy of two years, and then happened the Government of twelve men together, which having continued fifteen years, Pisammeticus one of the twelve, assisted by the Ionians and Carians, got the Power wholly to himself. He reigned 54 years, 29 whereof he spent in the Siege of Azotus, or Affidod in Syria. By placing his Egyptian Souldiers in the left Wing of his Army, he gave them such Distaste, that disdainning Strangers should have the chief Place, 200000 forsook him, and do what he could, departing into Ethiopia, there feated themselves. He, first of all Egyptian Princes, invited the Greeks, and others to trade in his Dominions, from which they had been formerly discouraged, either by the severity of his Predecessors, or by giving Credit to the Fable of Bufris.

26. He left the Kingdom to his Son Necos, called in Scripture Pharob-Neco, who first undertook that Fruitless Task of cutting a Passage from the River Nile into the Red-Sea, and in that work spent the Lives of 120000 men. Undertaking a War at Gods Command against the Affrians, Josiah King of Judah opposed him in the Valley of Megiddo, where he was worsted, and so mortally wounded, that he died within a short Space. After his Return he disposed of the Kingdom of Judah to Abiakim, to whom he gave the name of Jehoiakim, and made him his Tributary: Him Nebuchadnejar King of Affria withdrawing from his Obedience, to his own Service; vice, Neco went up against the Assyrian to Carchemish, and there was slain, as is before (a) shewn from Scripture. Herodotus (b) writeth that he got a Victory over the Syrians in Magdalum, and took Cadytis in Syria, which may well be that Kadesh mentioned by (c) Moses. He reigned sixteen years, faith Herodotus, fix faith Eusebius, and was succeeded by his Son Psammetichus or Psammetichus, who after he had reigned fix years made an Expedition into Ethiopia and died. Him followed Apries his Son, called in Scripture Pharaoh Hophra and Vaphres, who invading Phoenicia, made War by Land upon Sidon. He fought a Battle at Sea with the Tyrans, whom overthrowing, and returning home with great Spoil, he was so far puffed up, as to pervert himself that no God could deprive him of his Kingdom; so strongly did he think he had established it. But making War upon the Cyreneans, he received from them a great Overthrow, and the Soldiers thereupon mutined against him, as having wilfully exposed them unto Danger. To appease them, he sent one Amasis, whom they presently chose for their King, and he after some Pause accepted their Offer. Apries fled, but after some time was taken, and by Amasis delivered up to his Subjects, who strangled him, having reigned fix years.

27. With this Report of Herodotus agreeeth Diodorus Siculus his Story, relating how Apries vanquished the Cyrians and Phoenicians in a Sea-fight, took by Force and demolished Sidon, won the other Towns of Phoenicia, with the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished, as is before rehearsed, when he had reigned 22 years. But others of late considering the move Year Testimony of Scripture, and how Apries was promised to Nebuchadnezzar * as Wages for the Service he had done against Tyre; how Pharaoh and his Army should be slain by the Sword, and the Jews in Aegypt, and Pharaoh Hophra delivered into the hands of his Enemies as Zedekiah had been; resolve that the Aegyptian Priests notably deluded those Historians, hiding the Disgrace and Bondage of their Nation. Therefore it is thought fit rather to believe the Report of Josephus, that Nebuchadnezzar in the 23th year of his Reign, and the fifth after the Destruction of Jerusalem conquered Aegypt; killed the King thereof, and appointed another in his Stead. Some think Amasis might be used as an Instrument by Nebuchadnezzar, and for that was made Governour by him; others, that the Deputy, or Vice-Roy, which he had set over the Land was slain by Amasis. Agreeable to this latter Opinion, the Army of Ionians and Carians are held to have been none other than the Garrisons of Mercenaries left by the Assyrians, for the Guard of his Viceroy, and Custody of this new subdued Province: as likewise the Company returning from Cyrene and Bacee, who, together with the Friends of such as were slain in that Expedition, deposed, and slew Apries, are conceived to have been the Aegyptian Fugitives, when they recovered their own Country, seeing that of the Prophet was verified: As the end of forty years will I gather the Aegyptians from the People where they were scattered, and I will bring again the Captivity of Aegypt, and will cause them to return into the Land of Pathros, into the Land of their Habitation, and they shall be there a small Kingdom.

28. Amasis being a man of mean Extraction, and perceiving himself upon that Account, despised of his People, took a Golden Vessel wherein he and his Guests had used to wash their Feet, and thereof made an Image of a God, which when the Aegyptians worshipped with great Reverence, he called them together, and comparing his Original with the former Use of the Gold, convinced them of that equal Reverence which the Change of both ought to beget in them. Under him the Aegyptians boasted that their Country was most happy, no fewer than 1020 Towns of good Note flourishing therein, in his days. He made a Law that all men should yearly give Account how they lived, which if they could not prove to be by some honest Calling, they were to be punished with Death; and this, Solon is said to have translated to Athena. He being the first of all others that took Cyprus, reigned 54 or 55 years. It seemeth probable enough that he revolted from Cyprus, being before tributary to the Babylonian Empire (though the Priests hid this amongst other things from Herodotus and others); and that this was the chief Cause, whatever is pretended, why Cambyses came down and conquered his Kingdom. This was not accomplished in his time, he dying in Preparation for the War. But his Son Psammetichus succeeding him lost all, and so Aegypt became a Province of the Persian Empire; which things involving much of the Affairs of Persia, and nearly relating to the Tragedy of Cambyses, are to be referred to a more proper Place.

29. The Aegyptians, accounting themselves the most ancient of all Nations, were not wanting indeed of many Reasons to witness their Antiquity, although their Pride transported them beyond the true Epoche of their Original. The Scripture it self witnesseth Aegypt to have been a mighty Kingdom, every way better replenished than than any other Country that we can read of, in so ancient times: in the days of Abraham it was a flourishing Kingdom, and the Israelites were not a People till such time as the Aegyptians were one of the most flourishing Nations upon Earth. The Ethiopians concluded themselves more ancient, because Aegypt, as they thought, was of old a Sea or Lake, ancient Writers being of Opinion, that it was the Gift of the River Nile, which having once contained within it self all the Compass of the Land; at length warped it up out of it's Bowels; so that from it's Mud, or Dirt, the firm ground proceeded; and became a Continent. They urge, that in the yearly Inundations of the Nile much Mud is left and sticks Immoveable; that in the Mountains of Aegypt the Shells of Fishes are found; that the Springs and Wells there digged, afford Water of a brackish Taste, as if the Reliques of Sea-water yet remained in the Earth. Lastly, they say, that the Island Pharus at this day, is scarce a Mile distant from Alexandria; whereas in the time of (a) Homer it was a Day and Nights Sail off from Aegypt. But Experience sheweth, that for some thousands of years there hath been no Accession by any such Mud, but that those Towns which anciently stood upon the Shore of the Sea, and River, still continue there. The Shells might come from the general Deluge, being found also in other Places as well as Aegypt. Many describe the Fountain of the Sun at Helipolis, and yet none observe any brackish Taste in the Water. And as for Pharus, in the Trojan times it was distant from Canoë, where Menelaus is thought to have arrived, but 120 Furlongs; and therefore could not be a Day and Nights Sail from Aegypt, as Homer wrote by Virtue of his Poetick Liberty, or rather his Ignorance in Geography.

30. Certainly they had Cause enough to charge the Greeks with Novelty, and to jeer (as they did) at their pedantic Pretence to Antiquity; the Lustre of any one of their Commonwealths being to that of theirs but as yesterday; their Laws and Policy, their Religion and Rites but new Upstarts, and (as the Aegyptians would go about to demonstrate) but Copies of their Original. There was Ripeness of Literature, civil Discipline, and Inventions of several sorts amongst them, before the like did as much as bud forth in Greece, Italy, or other Western Countries. Herod. l. 2. They stick not to instance wherein the Greeks have borrowed of them. All, or most of the Names of their Gods, with the Superstition belonging to them, were, they say, stolen out of their Country, the Rites being something altered and new Stories invented, to blind the World, as to their Original. Osiris they avow to have been the true Bacchus or Dionysus, in whose Mysteries Orpheus the Poet being initiated whilst he sojourned in Aegypt, when he was afterwards kindly entertained at Thebes in Boeotia, to gratify them of that Place, raised a Fable of his being born there, and begotten by Jupiter on Semele the Daughter of Cadmus, a certain Bastard having at that time been born of her, and fathered upon Jupiter. Isis the Sister and Wife of Osiris, they affirm to be the true Ceres. Heracles was an Aegyptian, not born immediately before the Trojan War, but in the most ancient time, even at the Beginning of Mankind, to which Season the Wearing of a Club and Lion's skin was most congruous, when Clothes were not as yet found out; as also his cleansing the Country of Monsters and wild Beasts, at that time, the Earth being but inhabited in a scattered manner. Apollo in like sort was no other than Orus, who was taught the Arts of Prophecy and Healing, by his Mother Isis. As to this Contrivance, is observable the Uncertainty of the names of those heathenish Vanities, the same being to some Isis, to others Ceres, and to others Themoporis, (or, the Inventor of Laws) to others Juno, to others the Moon, and to some all those Names are one. Osiris in like manner; is now taken for Serapis, then for Dionysus, otherwhiles for Pluto; sometimes for Ammon and Jupiter, and not seldom thought to be Pan, as Diodorus hath observed.

31. Several Colonies they glory to have sent forth. The first by Belus the Son of Libya and Neptune, into Babylon; where, upon Euphrates, he constituted Flaminius after the Custom of Aegypt, free from all Taxes and Impositions. These by the Phoenicians were called Chaldeans, who in Imitation of the Aegyptian Priests, and Philosophers, observed the Stars. Danau out of Aegypt peopled Argos the (almost) ancientest City of Greece. The Nation of the Colchi and the Jews they prove theirs by Original, from the Rite of Circumcision. Cadmus and Plautus his Brother they report to have been Natives of their Aegyptian Thebes, whence the former translated the name of that City into Greece; but Agnor his Father, as is believed, (being the Brother of Belus, and uncle to Aegyptus and Danau) came thence into Phoenicia, then have they further Occasion to possess of a Colony led by him into that maritime Tract. The Athenians they prove to have been a Colony, led by Cecrops from Sais in Aegypt, for that they alone called their City Atha, from a Place so named in their their Country, and because the Members of their Common-wealth were distinguished into three Ranks; of Noblemen, who only were capable of Honours as the Egyptian Priests; Country-men who bare Arms agreeable to that sort of People in Egypt, who being called Husbandmen, afforded Souldiers for the Wars; lastly, Artificers, exercising manual and common Arts, which fitly answereth to the Custom of that place. Besides Cecrops, Petes the Father of Menephem and Eriphem were of the Egyptian Extractions; of whom the latter carrying great Store of Corn out of Egypt to Athens, thereby obtained the Kingdom, and gave Occasion to the Story that Ceres at that time came into Greece.

32. Although it may not pass for current, that the whole World is beholding to them for the Use of Letters, the Knowledge of the Stars, Geometrical Speculations, the best Laws, and most of the Liberal Arts, as they have bragged; yet most ancient have several of these things been among them. Besides the common and usual way of writing, they had certain Notes, called * Hieroglyphicks, wherein each Letter served for a Word, and single Words expressed whole Sentences. As by the Image of a Vulture they expressed the Word Nature, because in that kind of Bird no Male can be found. By the Picture of a Bee making Honey they understood a King; hinting, that in a Governour, a sting or sharpness ought to be mixed with Sweetness. They also used enigmatical Compositions or Mixtures of Images; as, by a Scepter with an Eye, and an Ear at the Top thereof, they signified the Sovereign and all-knowing Majesty of God. As for Astronomy, though the Babylonians, for the Antiquity of their Knowledge therein, had no Need to give them place, yet were the Egyptians furthered in the due Observation of the Stars, by the Plainness and Evenness of their Ground, and the Serenity of the Air; it never raining in Egypt in ordinary Course of Nature, which Defect is supplied by the yearly overflowing of the River. If the World be bounden to them for Geometry, it's to be ascribed also to their River, as another Fruit of its Inundation, whereby washing away the Marks, and removing the Fences of their particular Lands, they were forced every year to measure them over again, and thence, through Necessity, driven to Mathematical Speculations. Now that the best Laws, and most ingenious Arts were from them conveyed into Greece, they evidence by a Particular of the Bearers.

33. The Priests, pretending in their Sacred Records to find the Register of their Names, and to demonstrate the Truth thereof by other Tokens, have made mention of Orpheus, who out of Egypt fetched the Mysteries of Ceres, with the Fable of the Isfri, or those in Hell; the several Places whereof, with the Ferry-man Charon, are taken out of the Fens of Acherusa, and the passing over this Lake by Boat to bury their Dead there. Besides him, they make mention of Moson, Me lampus, Dedalus, and Homer, who travelled into Egypt to get Knowledge. To these they add, of Law-givers, Lycurgus the Spartan, and Solon the Athenian, who borrowed many of their Laws, and Plato the choicest of his Notions. Pythagoras of Samos from them received his Sacred Speech, as it's called; his Principles of Geometry, Arithmetic, and The Doctrine of the Transmigration of Souls. Democritus of Aldera they take for granted, to have lived amongst them five years, in which time he proved an excellent Astrologer. Oenopis of Chius, by his Conversation with their Priests and Astrologers, amongst other things, learnt the particular Oblique Course of the Sun. And, to add no more, Eudoxus the Mathematician is beholding to Egypt (where he studied) for those Instructions which much profited Greece, and thereby procured him no small Honour.

34. The Invention of Philosophy and Laws, with all the rest of the Egyptian Wisdom, wherein Moses was learned, is ascribed by divers unto Hermes, or Mercurius Trijmgistius; of whom yet, either as to his Person or time, nothing certainly can be affirmed. Cotta in Cicero, reckoneth up five, who have born the name of Mercury. The first, begotten by the Heaven, or the Day; the second, Son to Valens and Pheron, who liveth under the Earth, called also Triphoni; the third, begotten by Jupiter, on Maia; the fourth, Son to the Nile, whom the Egyptians feared to name for Reverence sake; the fifth and last, whom the Phoenicians worship, who flew Argus, and flying thereupon, was set over Egypt; to the Inhabitants whereof he gave Laws and Literature, and was by them named Theut. But others attribute the Finding out of Letters, not to the last, but the first Mercury truly called Theut, Thoyoth, Thor, and Tautus; it being utterly against all Antiquity, that any should out of Greece transport Learning into Egypt. Others account two of this name natural Egyptians, of whom the latter was Nephew, or Grand-son, to the former. Some think Joseph, some think Moses the true Mercury. Whatever he was, his Works loft and * those yet extant, shew him to have been a man very well well skilled in true Divinity, and have gained him the Credit to be numbered amongst the Prophets, and Sibyls, for that he wrote many things of God, worthy of Admiration; may also, it's believed, of the coming of Christ, of the Trinity, and the last Judgment. Of the Learning of the Egyptians he is said to have written 36525 Books, if Pages be not rather meant hereby: And one telleth us, that in his time were extant 36 of his Books, viz. of the Wisdom of the Egyptians sixteen, of Physics six, of the Orders of Priests ten, and four of Astrology.

35. The most ancient Government of Egypt, though Monarchical, yet left not Princes to the Liberty of their own Wills, which were restrained by the Laws and Customs that had such Authority over their private and domestick Actions, that they could not exceed the Bounds of Temperance and Moderation prescribed to them thereby. For no Slaves were they suffered to entertain, which might prove Instruments for Debauchery, but were attended by the Sons of the most noble Priests, excellently educated. Their Hours, both Night and Day, were defined and set over to particular Business. In the Morning when first awake, Letters were brought in to them; that, having perfect Intelligence, they might be better able to provide for the publick Safety. When washed and royally apparelled they sacrificed; during which Devotion the chief Priests prayed for them, and their Subjects extolled their Virtues, cursing at last their Sins of Ignorance, committed without their Faults, and reflecting upon their Advisors and Councillors. Then did the Priests read out of the Records, famous Precedents of Council, or Action performed by their most illustrious Predecessors, which were to them propoed as Copies to take out. Their time was prescribed, not only of speaking to the People, and distributing Justice, but also of walking, walling, and other more secret Employments. Their Diet was very moderate: usually Veal and Goose, with a moderate Quantity of Wine, as if ordered by an exact Physician. No Liberty was there of punishing any man in Passion, or choler, either of acting any otherwise unjustly; every Case being determined by the Laws. Yet neither did they hereby account themselves straitened of true Liberty, but rather happy in that they indulged not their Appetites like other men. Hereby obtained they the Love of their Subjects, who held them more dear, alive, or dead, than their own Relations, and the Government continued for many Generations, as long as they submitted to those Rules and Orders.

36. Sesothis, or Sesothris, divided Egypt into 36 Nomoi, which word, whether Greek or Egyptian, signified several Cities with certain Villages and Grounds thereof to belonging. Of these, 10 belonged to the Province of Thebes, or to Thebais, other ten to Delta, and the rest to the Midland Countries lying betwixt them; all which had their several Nomarches, or Governours, who ruled them, and took Care of the Kings Tributes. The Lands were divided into three Portions, whereof the first belonged to the Priests, who were in great Authority, and high Esteem with the People. Of their Revenues they maintained Sacrifices throughout the Land, and their own Families; being exempted from all Burthens and Impositions. They were chief Councillors to the Kings, always assisting with their Advice, judging of things out of their deep Skill in Astrology, and suggesting useful matter out of the Records; their Function hereditarily descended upon their Children. The second Portion of Land belonged to the Kings, by which they maintained their State, waged War, rewarded deserving Persons, and which affording them sufficient Treasure, they burdened not their Subjects by any Taxes. The third Portion belonged to the Souldiers, who were at all Occasions ready for the War; it seeming reasonable that such as ventured their Lives for the Safety of their Country should be well rewarded; and good Policy not to commit the Safeguard thereof to any that had nothing dear, or precious in it: and hereby they were encouraged to be careful in Behoof of their Posterity, which succeeded them in their Possessions. As for the rest of the People, they were divided into three Ranks, or Orders, viz. Shepherds, Husbandmen, (that farmed the Grounds,) and Artificers; who all attending their Business, and not meddling with State-Affairs, neither having any Right to Offices, thereby the more improved their Arts, and saved the Commonwealth harmless from such Distempers, as are bred by the Violence of an heady, and ignorant Multitude.

37. Their Courts of Justice were furnished with the most upright; and able men that could be procured. Thirty Judges were chosen from Heliopolis (or On), Thebes and Memphis, each of them 10. Which Assembly would not give place, either to that of the Areopagites at Athens, or the Senate at Lacedaemon. One of these thirty being chosen President, the City for which he served made choice of another to sit in his Place. All had Maintenance from the King; but the President in larger Proportion; portion: who also wore about his neck, in a Chain of Gold, an image of Truth made of precious stones, as a badge of his Office. When they were fate, and the Codes, wherein the Laws were contained, laid before them; then the Plaintiff exhibited his Bill of the Crime, the Manner of it, and the Estimate of the damage. The Defendant having a Copy of the Bill, answered particularly to it, either that he did not the thing, committed no Crime in doing it, or else had not deserved to great a Punishment. The Plaintiff had liberty to reply, and the other to rejoin his Answer; but after this, the 30 proceeded to Judgment, and the President set the Image of Truth towards one of the Parties. No Lawyers were suffered to plead, as being thought rather to cast a mist upon the Cause, and darken the Evidence.

38. As for particular Laws; Perjury was punished with Death, as a great Offence, both against God and man. If one man suffered another to be murdered in the High-way, or undergo any other Violence, without giving his Assistance, he was to dye for it; and if he could give him no help, he was bound to discover the Robber, and follow the Law against him, under pain of enduring a certain number of strokes, and being deprived of all sustenance for three days. False Accusers underwent the Punishment due to that Fault they accused of. Every one was bound to give in an account to the Magistrate how he lived, under pain of Death; which Law was made by Amasis. Wilful Murder, either of Bond or Free, was Death; and only this Law took no hold on Parents; but such were constrained to continue three days embracing the Carkasses. Against Children who killed their Parents, most exquisite Punishment was devised: For, having first their Flesh all cut and flayed, and then being laid upon Thorns, they were burnt quick. Women condemned were not executed before their Delivery. For other Laws not-Capital, it was enacted that Souldiers running away from their Colours, or disobeying their Officers, should not dye, but be branded with Infamy, as a means to excite them to regain their former credit. If any held Intelligence with the Enemy, his Tongue was to be cut out of his head. They that imbased the Coin, used new weights, counterfeited Seals; Clerks that falsified and forged Records, were to lose their hands. Ravishment of a Free-woman was punished with the loss of the Members. Adultery of the man, with a thousand strokes with a Rod; of the Woman, with the loss of her Nose.

39. Bocchoris enacted, that he who denied the borrowing of any money, should be absolved upon his Oath; which was accounted as a sufficient Purgation; a mans Credit being so much therein concerned. Usury upon Bond was not to exceed the double of the Principal; for which it was lawful to distrain the Goods, but in no wise to meddle with the Person of the Debtor, that was owing to his Countrey, and not due to his Creditor; especially if a Souldier, the common Safety suffering in him. Upon this account, they were wont to scoff at the Law-givers of Greece, who forbade the seizing upon Plows, Weapons, and other things, but suffered those that should use them to be carried away, and imprisoned. For stealing, they had a peculiar Law: Every Thief entred his name with the Chief of that Mystery; and when he had stolen any thing, carried it straight to him, where, if any one could tell the time and place, and prove it by certain tokens to be his, he was to pay the fourth part of the value, and receive it again; the Law-giver thinking this the best remedy against what otherwise could not be prevented.

40. The first man that gave Laws to the Egyptians, was Mnevis, persuading the people to receive them, because they were communicated to him by Mercury. The second was Sesychus, who, amongst other Laws, instituted those concerning Religion; and, being a man of great Learning, taught Geometry and Astronomy. 3. Sesoftris, who, as he excelled all others in Military glory, he made Laws for the Discipline of War. 4. Bocchoris, a wife and prudent man, several of whose Apophegms were a long time preferred in the memories of men. 5. Amasis, who much amended the whole Policy of Egypt, his rare Wisdom having preferred him to that high Dignity, for which also being admired abroad as well as at home, he was referred to by some out of Greece, as an Oracle. Lastly, Darius, the Son of Hystaspes, King of Persia.

41. As for particular Customs. The Egyptians married as many Wives as they pleased (Posterity being with them a thing of great effect) except the Priests, who were allowed but one apiece. Children born of Bond-women, and Free, were alike respected, and equally legitimate, the Father by them being only accounted the Author of Generation, the Mother affording but Place and Nourishment to the Child; in which respect also, contrary to the Custom of other Nations, those Trees that bare Fruit they accounted Males, and the barren ones Females. Children they educated exceeding hardly, the Expence of bringing one up not exceeding twenty Drachms. Each Child succeeded his Father in his Trade, or Course of Life. All sorts had some kind of Learning, especially such as conducted to their Callings. Musick was neglected by them, as rendering men effeminate. Once a Month they used to purge, or use some medicinal Course for their Health. With them no Physician was found (as Hierodotus writeth) who professed the Art of curing the whole Body; but one was for the Head alone, another for the Eyes, and so for the other Parts: all which yet, as Diadorus hath it, were maintained of the publick, and bound to observe Methods, and Medicines prescribed them in Books; which if they altered or changed, upon the Mis carriage of the Patient they forfeited their Lives, together with their Credit.

42. Such was the Constitution of the Egyptian Commonwealth, as they themselves related, which from some gaineth little Credit, this Constitution of Policy hardly agreeing with the manners of those Kings that built the Pyramids; so that to them this excellent Model of Government seemeth to be of the same Nature, and Credit with the * Cyropædia of Xenophon. This is observable, that according to this Constitution the Propriety in Land was varied from that Form wherein it was left by Joseph, who purchased all the Land (except that of the Priests) for Pharaoh, and made the King absolute Lord thereof. The fond and ridiculous Superstition, which possessed this People above others taketh off much from its Reputation. The fardid and degenerate Humour of confecting, with such blind Earnestness, Bulls, Sheep, Dogs, Cats, Ichneumon, Ibis, Goshawks, Eagles, Goats, Wolves, Crocodiles, * Plants; that grew in their Gardens, and other things, is so abominable at the first Sight, as none of their Preences can give thereto the least Shew of Reason, in the Opinion of a man but ordinarily qualified with the Light of Nature.

The most ancient State, and Condition of Greece, during the Babylonian Empire, with a Description of its Kingdoms and Commonwealth.

SECT. I.

The State of Greece in General.

THE most ancient common name of the Inhabitants of this Country is more agreeable to the Roman Appellations of Græci, Græci, and Græci-gene, than that whereby they have rather chosen to call themselves, vinc. Hellenes. For, till * such time as Hellen, the Son of Deucalion reigned in Thessaly, which hapned some years after the Deucalionian Deluge, no such name as the latter was known. From him his Subjects, who inhabited that part of Thessaly, lying betwixt the two Rivers * Peneus and Alopus, were first called Hellenes, being formerly known by the name of Græci; and the Country it self Hellæ, afterwards named Pthiotis. Homer owneth none by the name of Hellæ, but those, who with the Myrmidones, amongst others, followed Achilles to the Siege of Troy, neither any Place calleth he Hellæ, but only one in Thessaly, mentioned by Strabo, who knoweth not whether it be a Town or Country, though he would gladly prove, that, by Hellæ, Homer understood the whole Nation. Strabo is in no wise to be heard against Thucydides, and Apollodorus, whereof the former witnesseth, that the Poet no where mentioneth the Barbarians, because all the Hellenes were not yet known by one common Name, whom he might oppose against them; and the latter expressly saith, that he only called those in Thessaly by the name of

Hellenes. But though in Homer's time the whole Nation might begin to be called Hellenes, and the Country Hellas; yet clear it is from many Witnesses, that these names came out of Theſſalie, and were thence transferred to ſignifie the whole Nation, and their Colonies placed elſewhere; inſomuch, that priding themſelves, as it were, in it, they wholly rejected the other of Greece (which, ſignifying ancient, as ſometimes, they had alſo out of Theſſalie from the ſame People) who were afterwards called Hellenes; though the Poets deſpite it not, as Callimachus, Sophocles, and others; and the Latins ſtill retain it, taking no notice of the other in their Language, whence theſe words Greece and Grecians are derived.

The moſt ancient Greek lived in an unſettled Condition, preying one upon another.

2. Greece was not anciently inhabited in any ſettled or eſtabliſhed way, though in after Ages it became ſo famous in it's flouriſhing Commonwealths. Seats and Habitations were often changed, according to the Power and Strength of ſuch as were not ſatisfied with their own Fortune. No Commerce was there amongst them, being in continual Fear one of another: they lived only from Hand to Mouth, not regarding Money, or the Improvement of their Grounds, knowing not how long they ſhould enjoy any thing in preſent Poſſeſſions; ſo that no conſiderable City was there, or any Fortifications of Value. Attica indeed was ſomething privileged by its Barrenneſs, and ſecured from ſuch violent Attempts as other parts were obnoxious to; whence ſuch as were diſturbed elſewhere, flock'd thither, and it grew ſo populous, that not able to maintain the great Numbers, under which it groan'd, it pour'd out Colonies into Aſia the leſs, which made up the Body of Ionians. Before the Trojan War, nothing conſiderable was done abroad by the Grecians; but at that time having got ſome Power at Sea, they were rendered capable of that Expedition. For Minos King of Crete, (whom Thucydides would make to have had the firſt and moſt ancient Fleet of all others) had not long before obtained the Dominion of the greateſt part of the Greek Sea, and making himſelf Maſter of the Iſlands Cyclades, caſt them the Carians, and placed Colonies of his own therein, over which he made his Sons Princes. And to increaſe his Cuſtoms, he ſcour'd the Seas of Pyrates; it being then the Trade of thoſe that lived upon the Coaſts, to paſs over and make Prey one of another; which to the laſt could not be left by ſome, as the Ætolians and Acarnanians amongst others.

3. The Sea being cleared, Cities began to be built upon the Coaſt both for Trade and Security, whereas the moſt ancient Towns ſtood at a good Diſtance from the Sea, both in the Continent and Iſlands. Then came it to paſs, that the weaker ſubmitting themſelves to the more powerful for matter of Profit, or the ſtrong hand procuring it from them, ſome new and conſiderable Principalities were erected, which rendered them fit for the Expedition againſt Troy; wherein Agamemnon preſided, as the moſt powerful Prince then reigning, eſpecially at Sea. Yet was there ſtill ſuch Scarcity of Money and of Proviſions, that only ſo many Forces did they carry over, as they hoped the War might maintain, and uſed thoſe not all together, and at the ſame time, but employed them in tilling the Cherroneuſus, and in Depredations; whereby being thus diſperſed, the Trojans were the longer able to reſiſt them; which they could not have done, had they been ſufficiently furniſhed with Neceſſaries, and inconſtantly with all their Strength, fallen upon the City. Ten years being conſumed in this War, great Alterations were thereby produced in Greece. For through their Abſence ſo long abroad, Seditions and Tumults aroſe at Home; whence many at their Return, or afterwards, were forced to ſeek out new Habitations. A long time it was, ere the Country returned to Quietenſs and Settlement; but at Length, it was enabled to ſend out Colonies, as the Athenians into Ionian and the Iſlands of the Greek Sea, the Peloponneſians, and ſome other Cities into Italy, and Sicily. The Nation now growing ſtronger and wealthier daily, Tyrannies or petty Kingdoms were erected in every place, there being now a Poſſibility of raiſing Revenues; and as any exceeded others in Power and Cunning, they invaded the Governments of others, which they made arbitrary; whereas before Kingdoms were hereditary, with a conſtant limited Power, that they ſeldom exceeded.

4. The Corinthians firſt began to be famous at Sea, being the firſt that uſed that ſort of Gallies named Triremes, and fought a Battle with the Corycraens, 220 years before the beginning of the Peloponneſian War. For being ſeated in the Iſthmus, they enjoyed thereby a conſtant Market which filled them with Wealth, eſpecially after the Sea was cleared of Pyrates, and Traffick increaſed. Long after, the Ionians got the Start of the reſt in Naval Glory, making good Progreſs therein, and had gone ſtill further, but that Cyrus having broken in pieces the Power of Cresus, and ſubdued alſo as far as the River Hælus, forced them alſo, after ſome ſtruggling, to ſubmit themſelves unto the Yoke: After them, Polycrates the Tyrant of Samos, the Mæſſians

Mæſſians and Corycraens obtained the greateſt Power at Sea; the Æginetans and Athenians, with the reſt, being inconfiderable therein, till theſe two States falling out, Themifocles procured the Athenians to apply themſelves more to Sea-matters, when they now alſo expected the Coming of the Perſian King. Great Commodity all theſe obtained by the Power of their Navies, either in getting Money, or new Poſſeſſions; for they ſubdued the Iſlands, ſuch eſpecially labouring herein, whoſe native Soils afforded leaſt Advantage. By Land no War aroſe that gave any ſufficient Advantage of enlarging their Dominions further, than to the Diſturbance of their next Neighbours; they ſtirred not abroad nor gave their Minds to any new Conqueſts. Thoſe that were Subjects, were patient under the Yoke, and Equals in Power made no conſiderable Quarrels, till all Greece came to be divided in the old War, betwixt the Inhabitants of Chalcis and Eretria. Then, to hinder them from growing great, the Affairs of the Grecians were advanced; till having caſt out their Tyrants, (who all this while contenting themſelves with the private Power they had over particular Places, ſtirred not) they got Ground by little and little of the Eaſtern Empire. Almoſt during this whole Period had they no written Laws, Homer being witness, who never uſeth the word Law throughout his Writings. They were not generally governed but by indefinite Sentences and Precepts of their Kings, remaining a long time without any written Precepts, and referring all to the Event, according to which Judgment inſued. Such was the moſt ancient Condition of Greece in General. Now a particular Account is to be given of the ſeveral Kingdoms and States, that were moſt conſiderable and contemporary with the Babylonian Empire.

SECT. II.

The Sicyonian Kingdom.

THE Affairs of the Sicyonian have the firſt place allotted to them in Antiquity, who inhabited a City ſituated upon the Bay of Corinth, and the Conſines of Achaia. Here Ægialeus began a Kingdom about 270 years after the univerſal Deluge, 232 before the beginning of Inachus, 1313 before the firſt Olympiad, the year of the World 1915, according to the Vulgar way of Computation, without taking in the 100 years formerly mentioned in the Hiſtory of the Judges, and 859 year of Noah which Ninus reigned in Aſſyria. From him the City was firſt called Ægialia, and part of the Peninſula it ſelf, according to ſome; which afterwards was from Pelopon named Peloponneſus. He left his Kingdom to Europus his Son, after he had reigned 52 years, and Europus having reigned 45, was ſucceeded by Thelchines. He governed 20, and was followed by Apis, who was ſo great, that all within the Iſthmus was from him called Apion. When he had continued 25 years, his Son Thelchion ſucceeded him; during whoſe Reign, all things were ſo proſperous and happy, that being dead, they worſhipped him for a God by Sacrifices, and ſolemnizing Games, which (as they ſay) were firſt invented for his Sake. Him followed Ægysus, after he had reigned 52 years. Ægysus or Ægydrus, reigned 33; Thurimachus 54; Leucippus 43; who had only a Daughter named Calchion, on which Neptune (or rather Meſapus) begat Peratus, who was heir to his Grand-father, and governed forty ſeven years. After Peratus followed Plemonius, whoſe Children all died as ſoon as they were born, till Ceres came, in the Likeneſs of a Woman, and brought up Orthopolis, who ſucceeded his Father, having reigned 48 years.

2. Orthopolis the twelfth King of Ægialia, had a Daughter named Chryſorthe, on which Apollo is ſuppoſed to have begot Coronus his Succellor. Coronus left two Sons Corax and Lamedon. Corax after he had reigned 20 years, died without Iſſue, and Epopeus a Theſſalian ſeiſed on his Kingdom, Epopeus ſtole Antiope the Daughter of Nycteus King of Thebes; for which Injury he was proſecuted with War by the Thebans. A Battle being fought, he had the better, but both the Kings were mortally wounded. Nycteus preſently died after he was carried Home; but left the Tuition of Leonatus the Son of Polydorus and Nephew to Cadmus, (whoſe Guardian he had been) to his Brother Lycus, requeſting of him to lead down another Army into Ægialia, to revenge him upon Epopeus, and to puniſh Antiope, if he could take her; but in the mean time Epopeus died alſo of his Wounds.

Wounds, being neglected, and Lamedon the Son of Coronus obtained his Fathers Kingdom, gave up Antiope to Lycus, as Pausanias writeth, though Apollodorus saith, that Lycus took Hegialea and slew Epopeus. Antiope in the way to Thebes fell in Travel, and brought forth Amphion and Zeubus, who being found and nourished by an Herdman, the former gave himself to Musick, and the latter to nourishing of Cattel, and both afterwards revenged their Mother upon Lycus and his Wife Diree, from whose hard Usage she had escaped, and came to them.

3. Lamedon married Phenon the Daughter of Chytius an Athenian, and undertaking War against Archeander and Architeles the Acheans, sent for Sicyon the Son of Metion and Nephew of Erechtheus, out of Attica to assist him, to whom giving his Daughter Zeuxippe in Marriage, he left him also his Successor. From Sicyon the City was named Sicyon, and the Country Sicyonia. He had a Daughter named Chthonophyle, on which Mercury begat Polybus; after whose Birth she was married to Phibius the Son of Dionysus, and to him bore Androdamos. Polybus succeeding his Grand-father, left also his Grand-Son Adrastus (by his Daughter, married to Talaus King of Argos) his Heir, who being expelled his own City, had fled to him. But he making his Peace at home returned, and after his Departure Janisus or Inachus the Nephew of that Chytis whose Daughter married with Lamedon, came out of Attica and obtained the Kingdom. After Janisus had reigned 42 years, he gave way by Death to Phelus, one vulgarly accounted the Son of Hercules, who after eight years, by the Direction of an Oracle, went over into Crete, where he built a City of his own Name.

4. After his Departure Zeuxippus the Son of Apollo by the Nymph Syllis, was King of Sicyon; but reigned not long. Hippolytus Nephew to Phelus by his Son Rhopalus, obtained his Grand-fathers Seat. Against him Agamemnon King of Mycenæ made War, till he forced him to submit. After four years succeeded Polyphides, and continued 31, then Pelagus 20, and after this * Eusebius would have Zeuxippus to have begun his Reign, which after 32 years ended with the Kingdom. It having now continued the space of 962 years, the Priests of Apollo Carinus obtained the Sovereignty, and held it 32. But Pausanias writeth, that when Lacedæmon, the Son of Hippolytus reigned at Sicyon, Phelus the Son of Temenus (who had been King of Argos) seized upon it with the Dores in the Night time; but, for that both of them were descended of Hercules, dealt not roughly with him, but admitted him to Partnership in the Kingdom. So, from thenceforth the Sicyonians became Dores, and were reckoned amongst the Argives. This fell out 87 years after the Destruction of Troy, 120 before the first Olympiad, A. M. 2908.

SECT. III.

The Kingdom of Argos.

The Kingdom of Argos hath the second place, if not the first.

Inachus.
Phoroneus.

THE (a) second Place in Antiquity belongeth to this Kingdom, for which (b) some have not been wanting to challenge the first, affirming that many years after the Establishment of this, Hegialea began that of the Sicyonians; and certainly though Argos missed something of Sicyon in years; yet in Fame, Dignity, Power, and Riches, it exceeded it. Inachus first here began a Kingdom, about 244 years after the Beginning of the Sicyonian, the 142 of the Life of Abraham, 676 before the Destruction of Troy, and 1082 before the Beginning of the Olympiads. From the Antiquity of Inachus came that Proverb of Inachus antiquior, concerning which Erysmaus is to be consulted in his Adages. On his Sister Melissa he begat Phoroneus and a Daughter named Io, which must not be confounded with the Daughter of Jasus of a later Date, as she is wont to be by Mythologists. After fifty years Reign, he left his Kingdom to his Son Phoroneus, who by some was thought the first man, as the Son of a River in that Place, called Inachus, and consequently the Father of Mortals, and Author of Mankind. He is said to have built the first Altar unto Juno. Against him and the Parrhasians, the Telchines and Caryates made War, but being overcome brook themselves to the Mercy of Wind and Sea, and at length arrived in Crete, as some, or Rhodes, as others lay. He obtained the Dominion of the whole Peninsula, and of the Nymph Laodice begot a Son called Apis, and a Daughter named Niobe, which Jupiter loved the first of all women, and on her begat Argus, Phoroneus, after he had reigned sixty years, died, and left his Kingdom to his Son Apis.

2. Apis turning Tyrant, commanded the Peninsula to be called after himself, Apis, and being circumvented by the wiles of Telecion, and Telchin, died without Issue, after he had reigned 34 years. Apollodorus saith, he was killed for his Tyranny in Greece, though some make him to have gone into Egypt, and there dying to have been taken for a God, and called Serapis; but there being two Kings of this name besides him, viz. one of Sicyon, and another of Egypt, most Mythologists confound them, and attribute what was done by all unto one; which thing is usual with the Greeks. Apis dying after he had reigned 34 years, left for his Successor Argus, his Sisters Son by Jupiter the King of Crete, who lived about this time. In that Island first reigned Cretes, who gave name to it, and was one of those Cretes that were said to have hid Jupiter from his Father Saturnus, who would have devoured his youngest Son after the other, and nourished him; as also to have built the City Cnosus, and the Temple of Cybele. With this man, many others are confounded, according to the custom of Poets, who have observed no distinction in ascribing to one what many did, and fathering things of their own Invention upon the common name of Jupiter.

3. The first man known to have had this name, was Ham, the youngest Son of Noah, who was worshipped for a God, under the title of Jupiter Hammon. His Nephew Nimrod, the first King of Babylon and Assyria, was surnamed Belus, and often called Jupiter Belus. In Crete lived (a) one very ancient, that hath gone under this name; although as many places have challenged him for their Native, as (b) contended for the Birth of Homer. Some think, that he who is reported to have been preferred, and nourished by the Curetes, or the Idæi Daedylis, was more ancient than Niobe, and therefore make a second Jupiter to have lived in Crete about 150 years after; who because he was the first of this name known to have been extravagant towards Women; thence arose that saying, That Niobe was the first Woman beloved by Jupiter. Rholus the Son of Hellen, and Nephew of Deucalion, who lived about Thesaly, and gave name to the Rholæ, became so famous with Posterity, that they gave him the name of (c) Jupiter and Neptune. Picus, King of the Aborigines in Italy, Father to Faunus, and supposed to be begotten by Saturnus, after he had fled into Latium from his Son Jupiter, is also called Jupiter by (d) one, and Æneas Jupiter by (e) Apud Sæd the Romans. These are such particular men as are known to have had this name, which hath been so far advanced as to signify the best, and chiefest Being, whilst such as at first were revered for their Virtue or Power, at length were forgotten to have been Mortals.

4. Each Nation of old had its Native Jupiter, who was either the Founder thereof, or, living in remote times, was by that Veneration, which attributeth immortality to Antiquity, elevated into a Deity. Here is to be considered what Annius his Xenophon wrote in his Treatise of Æquivocalis, as he calleth them. The most ancient King of any Great and Illustrious Family, was wont to be called Saturnus, the eldest Son Jupiter, and the most Valiant amongst the Nephews, or Grand-sons, Hercules. Jupiter the ancient King of Crete, or some other, by his great Exploits, and well-deserving of that Age, might gain this credit to his Name; or the word Zent in the Greek Tongue signifying what Ham doth import in the other Language, the Original of this name may better agree with the Name, Place, and Condition of the Son of Noah. As for Jupiter the younger, who is supposed to have begotten Hercules on Alcmena, the Wife of Amphitrua, appeareth a meer Fiction; so Valiant a Person as that Child proved, enhancing the repute of his Generation; or if this Hercules was not the Son of Amphitrua, but begotten by some other man, then was the name of Jupiter given to his Father, to take away the Odium of Baltardus; it being an ordinary thing for such as were Base-begotten to be fathered upon Jupiter, Mars, or Apollo.

5. From Argos the City was named (e) Argos, before called Phoroneicum, from Phoroneus, who first gathered the People into it, being before that dispersed; and then made them Laws for Government. From him also his Subjects took the name of Argi and Argivæ, and the whole * Peninsula, named Apia before; he would have called after himself, Argos. In (f) his time Greece began to be full of Corn, which being ascribed to his Care and Industry, he was honoured after his death with a Temple and Sacrifice, which Worship was before given to one Homogrus, killed by a Thunder-bolt, for that he had first yoked Oxen in the Plow. His Brother was (g) Pelagus, (said also to have been begotten by Jupiter on Niobe) the Father of Lycæon, and who gave name to the Pelagæi, a People that first

Two of his Brothers are added by Pausanias, viz. Pirafus the same with Peiranthus, and Phorbas. Peiranthus first built a Temple to Juno at Argos, wherein he placed her Image made of a wild Pear-Tree, and made his Daughter Callithya called also Callitroë and Io, a Priest thereof: which Superstition being continued for many Ages, all Instruments public and private were dated from such or such a year of her Successors, as the Custom hath been from those of the Kings, or Magistrates in other Places.

6. That this Peiranthus reigned, appeareth no where but in Pausanias, who seemeth to make him the immediate Successor of Argos, by the name, of Pirafus. But Phorbas succeeded Criafus, and reigned 35 years; after him Triopas 46. whose Son Xanthus being Prince of some of the Pelagis, who went out from Argos, seized first upon part of Lycia, and there seated himself: afterwards he passed over into the Island Ifa, then void of Inhabitants, which dividing amongst his Followers he named Pelagias, in Process of time called Lesbos. Pausanias maketh Jafus and Agenor the Sons of Triopas, and Jafus to have reigned at Argos, though by Eusebius he be not reckoned amongst the Kings. His Daughter was the famous Io, which being got with Child by Jupiter, and thereupon, through the Displeasure of Juno turned out of her Wits, or into a Cow, as the Poets sing, passed over the Straits of Thrace, to which, upon this Occasion of her Metamorphosis, was given the name of Bosphorus. Then went she down into Egypt, where, restored to humane Shape, she brought forth her Son Epaphus, the Builder of Memphis, and was afterwards taken for a Goddess, and called Isis. Hecdotus leading us out of the Labyrinth of Fables, relateth that the Platonicians, after their Removal from the Red-Sea in the thought them once to have inhabited) to the Mediterranean, applied themselves unto Sailing, and Traffick from Affrica and Egypt unto other places. On a time coming to Argos (which then excelled all Greek Cities,) on the fifth or sixth day after they had exposed their Merchandize to Sale, many Women came to their Ships to buy what liked them, and amongst the rest this Io, the Kings Daughter. The Platonicians encouraging one another laid hands on those they could catch, and taking her with some others, carried them into Egypt. This by Hecdotus is made one of the first Grounds of Envy, betwixt the Affaticks and Greeks; though he confoundeth her with the Daughter of Inachus, (which is usual;) and the Greeks, as Pausanias hinteth, gave another Account of her Deportation.

7. As Pausanias reckoneth Jafus amongst the Kings of Argos (which after him was, without Doubt, called Jafus and the Citizens Jafus;) so he nameth Crotopus, Stephanus. his Brother Agenor's Son, for his Successor, whom Eusebius will have to have succeeded his Grand-father Triopas. His Daughter Plamathe being with Child by Apollo, after her Delivery exposed the Infant, which he named Linus. It chanced to be devoured by wild Beasts; whereat she was so troubled, that her Father perceiving it, got out the matter, and put her to Death, for which Apollo brought a Plague upon the Argives, who, to pacify him, made great and solemn Lamentation for the Child, which is not to be confounded with the Poet Linus, as some fo order the matter. Crotopus having reigned 21 years was followed by Stenelas his Son, who held the Kingdom for 11. and then left it to his Son Galenor. In his time, Danaus, the Brother of Egyptus, King of that Country, having 50 Daughters, refused to marry them to his Brother's 50 Sons, because he was bidden by an Oracle Apollodorus to beware of a Son in Law, and therefore taking them away with him, failed to Rhodes, wherein he built a Temple to Minerva Lindia; and thence came to Argos, where he moved a Contest with Galenor for the Kingdom, as descended of Epaphus, the Son of Io. Both pleading hard before the People, the Cause, as doubtful, was put A. M. 2531. off till the day following; at what time there came a Wolf and killed an Ox, which was feeding by the Walls. The People took the Wolf to signify Danaus, because a Stranger; and, making this Contest of the Beasts a leading Case, decreed the Kingdom to the Egyptian.

8. Danaus having obtained the Kingdom; his Brother Egyptus feared left by the Marriage of his Daughters he might get too great Alliance and Strength, and therefore sent down his 50 Sons to Argos with an Army, and command, either to marry them, or destroy him. They persuaded their Uncle by fair Means to receive them as Sons in Law; but he commanded his Daughters that each of them should the first Night

Night kill her Bridegroom, and gave them Poniards for that Purpose. They all obeyed him, except Hypemestras, (and some add Bebrico;) which diffusing Lyneceus, with advice to shift for himself, was by her Father accused, and brought to Judgment; but acquitted by the Argives, and afterwards had Leave from him, to receive again Lyneceus, now reconciled to him. As for the rest of the Sisters, they were bestowed upon such, as in trial of Malteries got the better; and became so infamous, that it was believed they were condemned in Hell, to fill with Water a Barrel, which having an hole in it, let out as much as it received in.

9. From Danaus, those who had formerly had the name of Pelagiotæ, were called Danaï. He built the Castle, and his Daughters are said to have supplied the City with Water, by digging of Wells; although (a) Strabo proveth, that by reason of its Situation, it could never want the commodity of that Element. Having reigned (b) 50 years, he died, and was succeeded by Lyneceus, who governed 41. and on Hypemestras begat Ahas his Successor. Ahas ruled 23 years, and begat on his Wife Ocalea, the Daughter of Mantineus, Acritus and Prætus, Twins. They are said to have strugled in the Womb, and did it to purpose afterwards for the Kingdom. Prætus first obtained, and held it seventeen years, but then was driven from Argos by Acritus, and forced to fly into Lycia, to Iobas his Father-in-law, King of that Country. From him he returned with armed hand, seized upon Trynthe, and afterwards joynd Battel with his Brother, wherein they two are reported, first of all others, to have used Targets. The Battel ending with equal success, they came to an accommodation, and divided the Kingdom. Acritus was to stay at Argos, and Prætus to enjoy Heræus, Midea, Trynthe, and the Maritime Parts. Prætus had by his Wife Sthenobæa, a Son named Megapenthes, and three Daughters, which being taken with the Fury of Bacchus, Melampus the Poet is said to have cured. Acritus on Euridice begat a Daughter named Danae, and consulting the Oracle about Issue Male, was answered, that he should have no Son, but a Nephew, by his Daughter, that should procure his Death. Hereupon, he shut up Danae with her Nurse in the Ground; but Jupiter turning himself into a Golden shower, thereby got to her, and begat Perseus. Both Mother and Son were put into an Ark, and cast into the Sea, which drove them ashore on the Island Seriphus, where Dictys, Brother to Polydectes the King, educated the Boy. Being grown up, he made an Expedition into Affrica, where he slew the Gorgon Medusa, being sent, as the Fable goeth, by Polydectes, who sought to be revenged on him, for hindering him from the Marriage of his Mother; but Pausanias, not at all regarding the Fable, writeth, that this Medusa was the Daughter of Phorbus, and succeeded him in his Kingdom, which lay upon the Lake Trionike; that she was wont to go out and fight with the Affricans, over which she reigned; but Perseus coming against her with choice Forces out of Peloponnesus (so that this Voyage must have been after his Return thither, and his Grand-Father's death) she was entrapped by him, and slain in the Night. He admiring her Beauty, cut off her Head, and carried it into Greece for a Spectacle.

10. Perseus, after this, married Andromeda, (Daughter to Cepheus, by Calistoëia, who reigned at Joppa, a Maritime Town of Phœnicia;) having first lived her by being devoured by a Whale. This by one is thus interpreted; That Phœnix, by her Father's consent, took her away by Force, and carrying her in a Ship called the Whale, Perseus sailing that way, and hearing her Lamentations, boarded the Ship, and delivering her out of his hands, married her. After this, he returned to Siphos, where he revenged upon Polydectes, the Violence offered to his Mother; and then, with her and his Wife, went to Argos to see his Grand-Father, who being afraid because of the Oracle, departed into Pelagias (or Theffaly) so called from the Pelagis, who were now removed thither out of Peloponnesus, being a vagabond People, and staying in no place;) where, when Tentamias, King of the Larissæans, made Games in honour of his deceased Father, thither also came Perseus, amongst other lufy and active young Men, and slew his Grand-Father at unawares in the Game, by a stroke of a Quoits upon his Foot, after he had reigned thirty years.

11. Some (c) think, that rather to Acritus, than to Amphyzion the Son of Democalion (who 182 years before began his Reign at Athenis;) the Founding of the Famous Council of the Amphyzionians is to be ascribed. It seemeth probable, that Amphyzion first of all assembled it in Theffaly, near the Straights of Therionippe, (Pausanias writeth to have been the common opinion) and that Acritus thence transferred it to Delphos in Phœcia, where it for the most part assembled; this Place being the middle of Greece, and, as the Greeks thought, of the World: it self, where was also the famed Oracle of Apollo Pythius. For, these Cities, which at first had only Right to send their Deputies to the Council, were such as either were seated in Theffaly, or or near unto it. This was the chief Tribunal of all Greece, for deciding of Publick and most weighty Causes, betwixt the several Cities, and Common-wealths. The authority thereof was very great; inasmuch as its Decrees have sometimes been executed by the Sword, with the great Motions of several States, some or other scarce ever being wanting to undertake the work. It used to meet twice a year, (and oftener if necessity required) in the beginning of Spring and Autumn; the Cities sending their Deputies, three, two, or one, according to their bigness. These were called Pylagore, because they met at Pyle, a place near to the Temple, of which they also had the oversight, and presided over the Games made in honour of Apollo Pythius every other year. This Court continued for many Ages without change, until the time of Philip King of Macedon, and Father of Alexander the Great, who overthrowing the Phocians in the Sacred War, for their Sacrilege outed them, and the Lacedaemonians their Assiliants, of their Privileges of Voting therein, and transferred the Right to his own Kingdom. Long after, Augustus Cæsar innovated again, by removing the Magnesian Maleans, and others, from their Interest herein, and making Nicopolis (a City built by him in memory of his Victory at Actium) free of that Society, as Paulinus telleth us, who hath also recorded, that in his time, (which fell in with the Reign of Antoninus Pius the Roman Emperor) this Council was still maintained and kept up, consisting of thirty Persons.

lived but one Age before the Trojan War; but rather happened at the Original of Mankind.

14. Hercules the Tyrian is believed to have been the Captain of that Expedition which the Phœnicians made into Spain and Gader, which, though the Greeks attribute to theirs, yet this convinceth their assertion of Falshood, That in the Island Gader, was a most ancient Temple, wherein Hercules was worshipped, not after the Grecian manner, but according to the Rites of Phœnicia. This was he, who erected his Pillars at the Bound or utmost Limit of the World, and that over-ran Spain, Italy, and Gaul. Sanchoiathon a Phœnician Author of great Antiquity, wrote, that he was the Son of Damascus, and that his Proper Name was Melcarthus (which signified the King of the City) by the Greeks called Meliceretes and Palemon. He was also called Diodas * by Eusebius (for which Desjaneus is thought to be corrupted written in Hierem's Translation) which Phœnician name he seemeth to have had, because he was invoked by Lovers; their happy Success being supposed to depend on him. Some think this Tyrian Hercules was the same with the Ægyptian or Libian, by Paulinus named Maceris, who undertook a Journey to Delphos, and whose Son Sardus leading a Colony into the Island Ichnusa, changed its name into Sardinia. Tacitus * writeth, that the Libians would have the most ancient Hercules * a Native of their Country, and that such as came near him in Valour and Renown were named after him. Dionodorus Siculus, and Eusebius mention three of this name; (though the former attributeth all their Actions to the youngest, or the Son of Alcmena) Serrius 4, and Varro 44. And here must be remembered what was before noted; that it was the Custom of old, to call the most ancient Kings by the name of Saturn, their Sons by that of Jupiter, and their most Valiant and active Nephews, by this of Hercules.

The Story of Hercules the Son of Alcmena.

The Argonauts.

15. This Heroe being so much written and talked of, it concerneth Beginners to have some account of his Actions, and the reason, because they include the Labours of many. Amphytrion, his Father, as it seemeth, was Prince of Tyrimbos, but thence was forced to fly to Thebes, having at unawares killed Electryon his Uncle and Father-in-Law, where Hercules being educated, slew Linus his Mulick-Master with an Harp as he taught him. His Father seeing his Disposition, and fearing some such like Accident might fall out again, sent him amongst the Herdsmen, where, not yet eighteen years old, he slew a Lyon. For his extraordinary Strength and Courage he was taken notice of by Telesphus, (or Thestius) Prince of the Thebians, who made him lye with his fifty Daughters, of which begetting so many Sons, these afterwards passed over into the Island Sardinia, with the name of Thestiadæ. A little after this, he delivered Thebes from the Tyranny of Erginus, King of the Minyans, who exacted an Annual Tribute of 100 Oxen. He destroyed Ochlopeus, with his Palace therein, and for this was rewarded with Megara, Daughter to Creon Prince of Thebes. When he was about twenty years old, he sailed with Jafon, amongst others to Colchos, to fetch thence the Golden Fleece, so much celebrated by Poets, and variously interpreted by Expositors of Mythology.

16. This Jafon was the Son of Æolon, and the fourth in Descent from Æolus, being born at Ioleus, which Place, Pelias, King thereof, unjustly detained from his Father. He considering with himself what glory Perseus and others of late had gotten, fought how he might accomplish some notable Enterprize for the eternizing of his Name; and having at length resolved on this Design, published his intentions throughout Greece, by a Crier. The young and active Spirits of that time were much taken therewith, and fifty three of the Flower of Greece gave their Names to the Expedition, of whom the most Eminent, besides Hercules, were Orpheus, (Scholar to Linus) Oileus, Telamon, and Peleus, the Sons of Æacus, Pollux and Cæstor, Sons to Tindareus King of Sparta, Meleager and Argus, who built the Ship, named after Argo, wherein they sailed, and thence were afterwards called Argonautæ. Having all things in readines, (Pelias supplying Jafon with all Necessaries, to be rid of him, fearing he should call him to account for the Kingdom) they set sail from Ioleus, and came to Lemnos, an Island in the Ægean Sea, whence they failed to the Country of the Doliones, by whose King Cyzicus they were honourably received; but thence lanching out by Night, were driven back by Tempest, and being taken by him for the Pelægi, with whom he was at feud, he fell upon them, and lost his Life in the Fight, with many of his Followers; but his Error once understood, was magnificently buried by them. From Cyzicus they came into Mysia, where Hercules, for want of skill in rowing, brake his Oar, and going into the Woods to provide another, whilst his Companions rested themselves on the Shoar, it happened that Hylas his Boy drinking at a Fountain, was intercepted by the Nymphs, as the Story goeth. Crying

17. Jafon with the rest failed to Colchus, and by the treachery of Medea, Daughter to Heter the King, that fell in love with him, became Master of the Golden Fleece, and returned home with her, having finished his Journey in four Months. They lived happily at Corinth for ten years, till Creon, King of that City, betrothing his Daughter Glauce to him, Medea was commanded to quit the Place; whereupon, mad with anger, she set the Palace on fire, and slew her own three Sons which she had by Jafon, as Euripides relateth the Story; who, as it's probable, too much indulgent his Poetick liberty, the Corinthians having corrupted him with five Talents; as an ancient (a) Historian hath discovered. (b) Herodotus writeth, that a Messenger was sent from Colchus to demand Medea, but he was put off with this Answer, that they of Affa had formerly stoln away Io from Argos. As the Argonautæ failed by Athos and Samothracia, they were driven by Tempest upon Sigeum, a Promontory of Troas, (c) where they found Hefione, Daughter to Laomedon King of Troy, bound upon the Shoar, that she might become a Prey to a Whale. This Whale had been sent by Neptune to devour Passengers upon the Coast, because (d) Laomedon, with Money taken out of the Temple of Neptune, and Apollo, had built the Walls of the City, and made no Restitution. Apollo had answered, that no way could they be quit of the Whale, but by the devouring of some one chosen out by lot, which fell upon the King's own Daughter. But Hercules moved with pity, upon promise to have the Maid, and certain Horses that never were handled, undertook to kill the Whale, which readily performing, he trusted Laomedon with his Wages, till his return from Colchus. Then he demanded them (e) by Iphicles, his Brother, and Tela- (f) mon, whom he sent into the City, but the King, instead of restoring what he formerly detained, imprisoned the Messengers, and plotted the destruction of the whole Company. Priamus, of all his Sons, was only against this Treachery, and when he could not otherwise prevail, sent in two Swords to the Prisoners, where-with they dispatching their Keepers, got out to their Companions. In revenge for this afterward, Hercules took the City, slew Laomedon, and preferred Priamus for his Integrity to the Kingdom.

18. The Argonautæ being returned into Greece, Hercules (f) took an Oath of them mutually to aid one another, as also to chuse out some certain place, wherein to meet and celebrate Games in honour of Jupiter Olympius. This matter being left to his Care and Management, he pitched on the Plains of the Eleaps, lying upon the River Alpheus, where he ordained Exercises, both to be performed on Foot, and Horse-back, appointed Rewards to the Victors, and sent abroad to give notice thereof to the several Cities, which were all hereby wonderfully affectionated towards him. But after Euryftheus had succeeded Sthenelus his Father, in the Kingdom of Mycene, he began to grow jealous of the Strength and Prosperity of Hercules, and ceased not to press him forwards into dangerous, though glorious Attempts. He at first refusing, went and consulted the Oracle at Delphos, which is said to have acquainted him with the Pleasure of the Gods, that at the appointment of Euryftheus, he should finish twelve Labours, and so attain to Immortality. Hereat he grew exceeding melancholy, taking it in great Disdain to be commanded by him, which Discontent arose to a Phrensie, and in this Distemper he killed the Children that he had by Megara, and put her away; but afterwards coming to his right mind, resolved to venture himself, and returned to Euryftheus for his Orders.

The first Task imposed on him, was to kill a Lion in Nemea, a Wood of Achaia, whom no Sword nor any other Weapon could pierce; being only to be mastered by the Hand, he caught and strangled him, then taking off his skin, thenceforth wore it as a Garment. The second thing enjoyned him, was to kill an Hydra with an hundred Heads, like Snakes, whereof when one was cut off, two others sprung up in its room. The third was, to bring home alive the Erymanthian Boar, at the sight of which Beast upon his shoulders, Euryftheus was so frightened, that he ran for fear into a brazen Hoghead; and in this Expedition he also overcame the Centaure. The next thing commanded him, was to catch an Hart of marvellous swiftness, with Golden Horns, which he effected, but in what manner is not agreed on. After this, he drave away innumerable companies of Birds from the Stymphalian Fens, which there, and in other places devoured the Corn. Then cleansed he Angus his Stable; not by carrying the Dung out upon his shoulders, (which Indignity was intended him by Euryftheus) but by the Current of the River Peneus, which he brought brought down thither for that purpose. The seventh thing commanded him, was to fetch a wild Bull out of the Island Crete, with which Pasiphaë is said to have lain in love; and bewixt this and the next Labour, he helped the Gods against the Giants, and pacifying Jupiter towards Prometheus, loosed this man from the place, where an Eagle continually fed upon his Liver, for his communicating to men the knowledge of Fire. The eighth Task was to fetch the Mares of Diomedes out of Thrace, which had brazen Mangers, were tied with Iron chains, and fed not on any other Fodder but the flesh of Strangers coming that way: But Hercules first gave them their Master's flesh, and then brought them to Euryftheus, who dedicated them to Juno, and their Breed is said to have continued to the time of Alexander the Great.

20. After this it is, that Diodorus maketh him to have failed amongst the Argonautæ to Colchus. Then, at the Command of Euryftheus he warred against the Amazons in Africa, and brought to him the Girdle of Hippolyta their Queen. The tenth Labour was to fetch the Oxen of Geryon out of Iberia, or Spain, as the Fable goeth; whereas Geryon reigned not there, but in that part of Epirus which lieth about Ambracia and Amphilochus, as (a) Arrianus witnesseth, from the Pen of Hecateus, a most ancient Historian, (b) and others do testifie. There were afterwards in Epirus a very large sort of Oxen, called Larini, thought to be of that Kind which Hercules drove away, and to have had this name from Larinus his Herdman. Seeing then that this occasion of invading Spain, Italy, and Gaul, is taken away from this Hercules, that Expedition is to be left to the Phoenician, to whom formerly we ascribed it. But Hercules is farther said in this Journey to have slain Anteus, to have gone down into Egypt, and made an end there of Bustri that cruel Tyrant, and erected his Pillars in the utmost Bounds of the World. Within eight years and one month he finished these his ten Labours. After his return, he was enjoyned to fetch Cerberus out of Hell; which having accomplished, the twelfth was the fetching of the golden Hesperian Apples; which, whether they were such, and were kept by a terrible Dragon, or by them were to be understood Herds of Cattel, defended by some strong and valiant man, he also brought out of Africa to Euryftheus. These are his twelve Labours, as Diodorus describeth, and ranketh them.

His other Acts.

21. Having served Euryftheus twelve years, he returned to Teles, and there gave Megara, whom he had put away, to Iolauus, the Son of his Brother Iphicles. He had now no Legitimate Issue, and therefore married Dejanira, Daughter to Oeneus, King of the Calydonians, to pleasure whom, he derived the River Archelous into another Channel, and thereby rendered the Countrey more fertile; whence the Fable arose, that he fought with Archelous, turned into a Bull, and cutting off one of his Horns, gave it to the Ætolians, (part of whom the Calydonians were) called the Horn of Amalthea, wherein was plenty of all Fruits. Before this, he had won Iole, the Daughter of Eurytus, Prince of Oechalia, by shooting, which Exercise his Father had proposed to all Comers, against himself and his Son. Yet was he denied her; whereupon, to be revenged on Eurytus, he drove away his Horses, and carrying his Son Iphitus, who was sent to seek them, up into a Tower, to see if he could make any discovery of them, when he could not espie them, as if he had wrongfully accused them of Theft, he threw him down headlong. For this, he was struck with a Disease, and had answer from the Oracle at Delphos, that if he would be freed from it, he must be sold, and the price given to the Children of Iphitus. He then passing over into Affa, willingly permitted one of his Friends to sell him, and was bought by Omphale, Queen of the Meonians, to whom her Husband Imolus had left the Kingdom. Being freed from his Disease, he did his Mistress great Service, killing many of the famous Robbers, called Cercopæ, and bringing some of them alive unto her. Omphale admiring his Acts, after the knew who he was, gave him his liberty, and took him to her Bed. Of her he begat Laonon, having already a Son by his fellow slave, named Cholous: he served her three years, and then returning into Peloponnesus, went against Laomedon King of Ilium, as some rank the Series of his Actions.

22. Some years after, having subdued several Persons, and Cities in Greece, he joynd the Arcadians and others to him, and went with an Army against Eurytus, whom he slew, with his three Sons, and taking away Iole, came to Cenaeum, a Promontory of Euboea. Here, being about to sacrifice, he sent Lichas his Servant to Trachine for his Shirt and Coat, wherein he was wont to perform that Religious Work. From Lichas Dejanira learning how Iole was taken, and saying to be robbed by her of her Husband's Affections, anointed his Shirt with a Poyson given her by Nessus the Centaure, as he was dying (who would have ravished her, and for that was killed by Hercules perfwading her, that it was an Ointment Efficacious to procure Love. As ſoon as the Shirt touched his Body, the Venom alſo ſeized on it, wherewith being grievouſly tormented, he diſmiſſed his Army, and returned to Trachines, where the Diſeaſe increaſing, he ſent to enquire of Apollo about a Remedy. It was answered, he ſhould be carried up to the Mountain Oeta, where a great pile of Wood being reared, Jupiter would take care for the reſt. This done, and all hope of Recovery paſt, Hercules, in his Warlike Habit, caſt himſelf upon the pile, and deſired the Standers by to put Fire to it; which, when all his Relations reſuſed to do, Peas, who ſeeking his Catel came that way, as Apollodorus writeth, or his Son Philoctetes, as moſt deliver, (to whom Hercules gave for a reward his Bow and Arrows) ſet fire to it, which alſo being kindled with Lightning, was preſently reduced to aſhes, with the Body, into Aſhes. Iolaus finding one of his Bones, a perſwaſion aroſe, that he paſſed from amongst Mortals to the Gods, as the Oracle had formerly ſhewed. He commanded, that Hyllus his Son, when he came at Age, ſhould marry Iole. As for Dejanaira, ſhe, ſeeing what was brought upon her Husband, out of vexation hanged her ſelf. Thus perished Alceus, ſirnamed Hercules, the Son of Amphytrion and Alcmena, at the Age of 52 years, having in a fit of Phrenſie, as it's thought, burnt himſelf. And theſe are the moſt remarkable things that are written of him, who lived (according to the Chronology, which taketh not in the hundred years formerly mentioned) in the days of Tholab the Judge of Iſrael.

What happened to his Children.

23. Hercules being dead, his Children for ſome time ſtayed at Trachine, with Ceycees the King, till Hyllus and others of them were grown up. Then Euryſtheus began to fear them, and therefore reſolving to baniſh them all out of (a) Greece (or rather Peloponneſus) ſent to Ceycees, commanding him, upon pain of his Diſpleaſure, to remove them together with Iolaus, and the reſt of their Friends. They being unable to make reſiſtance, voluntarily quitted the Place, and ſent about to the Principal Cities to beg harbour, which none would afford them except the Athenians, who placed them in Tricorinth, one of the four Parts of their City. After ſome time, when they were come to ripeneſs of Age, and now bare themſelves high upon the glory of their Father, Euryſtheus much more ſuſpecting their growth, led down a great Army againſt them; but, aſſiſted by the Athenians, under Conduct of their Couſin Iolaus and Theſeus, they overthrew and ſlew (b) him with all his Sons, and then invaded Peloponneſus. Now a Plague ſeized on the Country, and the Oracle answered, that it was, becauſe they returned thither before their time; whereupon Hyllus returned, as ſome ſay, and went to Epalius, King of the Dorians about Oeta, by whom he was (c) adopted, becauſe, by Hercules his means, Ægeus (d) ſon likewiſe had formerly recovered his Kingdom; and thenceforth the Heracleidae became embodied with the Dorians. Diodorus writeth, that Hyllus, provoking ſome one of his Enemies to a ſingle Combat, upon this condition, that if he overcame, then was the Heracleidae to be Maſters of Mycene, if not, they ſhould depart for fifty years, was ſlain; and ſo they accordingly returned, and kept themſelves quiet for that time.

Atreus the Son of Pelops.

24. Euryſtheus being ſlain, after he had reigned at Mycene forty three years, (a) Atreus the Son of Pelops ſucceeded him, who alſo at this time had the Sovereignty of Argos. This Pelops, above an hundred years before (or fo famous a Man muſt not be omitted) being the Son of Tantalus Prince of Phrygia, had made War upon Ilium, where, after he was put to the worſt by Ilus the King, he was forced to fly into Greece, and coming to Piſa, fell in love with (c) Hippodamia, Daughter of Oenomaus, Prince of that City, who, being warned by the Oracle to take reſolution to himſelf when he ſhould take an Husband, had condemned her in his Reſolutions, to perpetual Virginity. Therefore he admitted no Suitor, but on this condition, to run a Race with him in the Chariot, and if he won her not, to ſuffer Death, to which he brought many, through the ſwiftness of his Horſes, till Pelops (or Hippodamia for him) corrupting the Chariot-driver, obtained the Prize, for grief of which, the old man thinking now the Oracle to be fulfilled, hanged himſelf. Pelops then obtained Hippodamia, and Piſa with her, after which, by little and little, he got moſt of the Peninſula into his poſſeſſion, called after him Peloponneſus, wherein he reigned fifty eight years. Of Hippodamia he begot many children, by which he promoted his Affairs more than Power; for by the marriage of them, he ſinuated into the Principalities of moſt of the Cities. Amongſt his Sons the moſt eminent were, Atreus, Thyſtes, and Pleſthenes. The two former he left his Succeſſors, and Pleſthenes dying young, left two Boyes to Atreus, to be brought up, called Agamemnon and Menelaus. Atreus married their Mother, by name Aerope, the Daughter of Minos King of Crete, with whom his Brother Thyſtes com-

25. Some will have Atreus to have out-lived Thyſtes; others ſay, he died before him, and, being reconciled, left him the Kingdom at his Death, on this condition, to reſtore it to Agamemnon when he ſhould come to Age. After Euryſtheus his death, it ſeemeth, that he became Maſter of all Peloponneſus, and oppoſed Hyllus, who challenging any in his Army, as was ſaid, to a ſingle Combat, Euryſtheus King of the Tegoea in Arcadia, accepted the Challenge, and ſlew him. He was very ſkillful in Aſtrology, being by ſome reputed the firſt that diſcovered the Motion of the Sun to be contrary to that of the Starry Heaven, (a) and that obſerved the Eclypſe of that Luminary. He adopted his two Nephews Agamemnon and Menelaus, who ſucceeded him (b) ſeventeen years before the beginning of the Trojan War. Agamemnon, a Man of Prudence and Courage, obtained not only Myſtace, ſcene, but Argos alſo, with all as far as (c) Sicyon and Corinth, and that Country then called Ionis and Regalea, afterwards Achaia. Menelaus got Lacedaemon, and there reigned at Lacedaemon. For Caſtor and Pollux, the Sons of Tyndareus the King (d) dying before their Father, he ſent for him to Sparta, and delivered up his Kingdom to him, having firſt given him his Daughter Helena, whom Paris the ſecond Son of Priamus King of Troy (by his Wiſe Heſuba) ſtealing away, gave occaſion to the famous ten years War, and the ruine of that City; concerning which ſomething is to be ſpoken.

26. The firſt (e) Man reported to have reigned in Arcadia, was Atys, who inhabited about the Mountain of Caucasus, and had ſeven Daughters, which made up the Pleiades, whereof, on Eleſtra, Jupiter her Husband begot Jafus and Dardanius. Jafus lived unmarried, but Dardanius had by his Wiſe Chryſis, the Daughter of Palaeus, two Sons, Idaeus and Dimas, who ſucceeded Atys in his Kingdom. Afterwards great Inundations happening in this Country, they were forced to divide the People into two parts, whereof, leaving one with Dimas in Arcadia, with the other Jafus, Dardanius and Idaeus left Peloponneſus, and coaſting by Europe, at length came into the Bay of Melanus, and arrived at a certain Iſland of Thrace, called Samo-thracia, from the Country, and a Man's Name who inhabited it; one Samon the Son of Mercury, by the Nymph Rhene. Here finding no convenient Habitation, the greater part under the Conduct of Dardanius (for Jafus died in the Iſland, being ſtruck with a Thunder-bolt, becauſe he attempted the Chafſity of Ceres) paſſed into Aſia, and landing in the Helleſpont, ſeaſed themſelves in Phrygia. Idaeus with part of the Army, ſetled upon the Mountains, which bore his Name, and Dardanius in that part of the Country ſince named Troas, built a City of his own Name, having ſome Grounds given him by Teucer the King of the place, the Son of Scamander, from whom the Country was called Teucris, and whoſe Daughter Bateia he married. He ſucceeded him in his Kingdom, and changed the name of his Subjects from Teucris to Dardani, and built the City upon the Sea-ſide, about the 230th year of the World, in the days of Silenus King of Argos. On Bateia he begot his Son and Succeſſor, called Erichonius, reported by (f) Homer and others, to have been exceeding Rich and Fortunate, who on Callisto the Daughter of Scamander, begot Troas, from whom the Country was named. Troas ſucceeding him, begot Ilus, Affarachus, and Ganymedes. Ilus ſucceeded him. From Affarachus deſcended Phrygius, Ganymedes for his Beauty was ſtolen by Tantalus King of Phrygia, and Father to Pelops, whence aroſe a War, in which many loſt their Lives, and Tantalus (though the Son of Jupiter by the Nymph Plota) was beaten out of Paphlagonia, Ilus built the chief City on the Plain, which, though the Latinus called it Troia, and we Troy (which Names moſt properly belong to the Country) yet the Greeks conſtantly Ilium from him. Againſt him and il Pelops made an Expedition, and miſcarried in the Succels, as was ſaid before. Lacedaemon the Son ſucceeded him, who ſeeking to defraud Hercules of his wages for killing the Whale, which ſhould have devoured his Daughter Heſione, was outed of his Kingdom and Life; and Priamus his Son, for his love to Juſtice, was placed in his Throne.

27. Podareus (ſirnamed Priamus, as Apollodorus writeth) was exceeding rich, and had a large Dominion, extending from Leſbus and Tenedos to the upper Phrygia, containing (g) nine Diviſions, and many Towns beſides. He had fifty Sons, (h) whereof ſeventeen were lawfully begotten. His firſt Wiſe was Archea the Daughter of Metopis, on which he begot Heſachus. Diſmiſſing her, he married Heſuba, the Daughter of Dymas, Ciffens, or Sangarius (all which are mentioned) and by her he had Heſtor, Paris, Heleus, Deiphobus, and others. Before he was brought to bed of Paris, ſhe dreamed that ſhe was delivered of a Fire-brand, which ſhould con-

(a) Priamus hereupon caused the Child to be exposed on the Mountain Ida, but by the procurement of his Mother, he was educated amongst the Shepherds, whom, because he afflicted against the Robbers, he rewarded himself very courageous, he obtained the name of Alexander. He (whether out of Design or no, is uncertain) came to Sparta, to the House of Menelaus the King, and thence stole his Wife Helena, which some (b) report he took away by force, and that after the taking of the City; but (c) others affirm of her, as of all others thus taken away, that it was not without her own liking. Fearing he might be pursued, he carried her first to Sidon in Phœnicia, where he married her, and thence to Troy; at which City they were scarce arrived, before all Greece was in an uproar, as if the whole Country had been over-run. Agamemnon, who was much concerned for his Brother, possessing almost all Peloponnesus, by his Authority easily persuaded other Princes to engage in the Quarrel. He first assembled them at (d) Egium, a City of Achaia, to consult about the management of the War, where being chosen General, they afterwards met at Aulis, a Sea-Town of Boetia, with their Ships, and there swore never to return home, till Troy should be taken.

The Names of the chief amongst the Grec. Warriors.

28. The chiefest of these renowned Warriors were Nestor, who reigned in Messenia, Ajax the Son of Telamon Prince of the Island Salamis, Ajax the younger, or the Son of Oileus King of Laconia, over against Eubœa, Achilles the Son of Pelus by the Goddess Thetis, whose Principality was Phthiotia, part of that Country afterwards called Thessaly, Ulysses the Son of Laertes King of Cephalonia, Thoas the Ætolian, Podalirius and Machaon, Sons of the third Æsculapius, and Telemachus the Son of Hercules, who now inhabited the Island Rhodes. They made up amongst them a Navy of about 1000 Ships, and therein transported an Army of 120000 men. From Aulis they sailed to Lemnos, and thence, missing of Troy, into Mysia, which mistaking for their Enemies Country, they began to make Incurfions into it, and were beaten back by Telephus Prince thereof; all but Achilles and Patroclus, the former whereof sore wounded him: and Thersander General of the Boetians here lost his Life, into whose Room, because his Son Tisamenus was but young, they elected Penelus. A Conflict presently ensued their Arrival at Troy, wherein Proteus was slain by a Dardanian, as Homer calleth him, (either Hector or Æneas) and then the Greeks sent Menelaus and Ulysses Ambassadors, to demand Helena. Priamus calling a Council to deliberate about the Matter, Antenor was for delivering her up, and so were the rest of the grave and ancient Men, though they attributed much to the Beauty of the Woman; but Antimachus being corrupted by the Gold of Paris, urged the contrary, and not only moved to have the Message rejected, but the Messengers killed.

29. Priamus, though otherwise prudent enough, rejected the Counsel of the old men, and out of Indulgence to his Son, sent away the Ambassadors without any Satisfaction. Then both Parties prepared for the War, and another Engagement followed, wherein the Greeks had the better, who then dividing their Forces, left part to continue the Siege, and with the other, Achilles (who took with him Palamedes) was sent to harass the Country, and cut off Provisions from the City. This he so well performed, as he took 23 Towns, and therein got much Booty, which was divided. Whilst Palamedes was with him carrying on the War in the Island Lesbos, Ulysses envying him for his great Wisdom, wherein he seemed to overtop him, circumvented him by Treachery, and by false Suggestions procured him to be sent for to the Camp, and stoned as a Traitor, though he had exceedingly well deserved of the Army, being a Person of great Courage (which he also expressed at his Death) and yet so moderate and wise, that he thereby allayed the too much Heat of Achilles. To him some attribute the Invention of 16 Letters in the Greek Alphabet, others only 4, but withal, the Ordering and ranking of an Army, the watch word, Guards, and Dice to divert the Soldiers. His Death was grievously taken by Ajax, the Son of Telamon, who for some time absented himself, but especially by Achilles, who took it so heinously, that for a great while he would not be reconciled, nor brought to Fight, having much more Cause to be offended for this thing, than the detaining of a Woman from him by Agamemnon, as the Poets sing, who indolently omitteeth whatsoever reflecteth upon Ulysses.

30. Achilles determined not to fight till the Trojans should pierce as far as his own Ships, which at length happening, he first sent out Patroclus in his Armour, who had defired it. Patroclus with the Myrmidones (Achilles his Subjects) put the Trojans to flight, who now had begun to cast Fire into the Ships, flew Pyrræus with his own hand, pursued Hector, and smote Sarpedon King of Lycia about the Heart Heart so that he died; but being wounded by Euphorbus, who came behind him, he was slain by Hector, Euphorbus endeavoured to get his Body, but was killed by Menelaus; and the Soul of this Euphorbus Pythagoras affirmed (according to his Principle of Commigration) to have passed into his own Body. After this, Achilles (whose Preference formerly had kept the Trojans within their Walls) went out to fight, and taking twelve young men alive, flew them at the Funeral of Patroclus. By the River Scamander (or Xanthus) he killed Astropæus, Captain of the Pæones, from whom, though he received a Wound in the Arm, yet went he to fight with Hector, who expected him without the Walls, and would not be persuaded to decline his Fury, though it proved his Ruine, being slain in this single Combat about the 30th year of his Age. His Body tied to a Chariot, the Conquerour drew in. Triumph about the Walls, but afterwards it was ransomed by Priamus. After this he flew Memnon the Nephew of Priamus by his Brother Tithonus, who was sent out of Persia by the Assyrian King Tautamus to his Aid; then Troilus his Son by Hecuba, and lastly Penthesilea one of the Amazons, who for Murder had fled her Country, and coming to Troy after Hector's Death, did good Service against the Greeks. When dead, Achilles is said to have been enamoured of her Body, and with her also the Valour of this sort of Women is believed to have been extinct.

31. Achilles, whom no Art nor Valour of the Trojans could overcome, was taken by the Love of a Woman, and slain by Treachery. For having a View of Polyxena, the Daughter of Priamus, from the Wall, he became so inflamed to her in Affections, that he proceeded to a Treaty of Marriage, wherein he was shot with a Dart by Paris, who hid himself behind the Image of Apollo, which Idol is therefore feigned an Assistant in the Work. Afterwards the Greeks hid it revealed to them, that except they could take the Palladium, or Image of Pallas out of the City, all they should get Hercules his Arrows, and provide a wooden Horse. Troy could never be taken. Ulysses therefore, and Diomedes, as Virgil singeth, stole away the Image; Philoctetes, who had the Arrows, was sent for from the Island Lemnos, and with them flew Paris the Incendiary, after whose Death Deiphobus the Son of Priamus obtained Helena, as being of best Account for Valour, next to his Brother Hector. Then was a wooden Horse prepared by the hands of Egeus, which pretending to dedicate to Minerva, they left before the City, having industriously made it higher than the Gates, hoping the Trojans would pull down part of the Wall to take it in. They left also some of their choicest men in the Horse's Belly, and Sinon with his hands bound behind him, who under Notion of a Fugitive that had been ill used, should persuade them to receive it into the City; and then giving out that they would raise the Siege for some time, they withdrew into the Island Tenedos. The Trojans with great Resolution break down the Wall, and taking in the Horse placed him in the Castle; but in the Night Sinon giving Warning by Fire, the Greeks came from Tenedos, and being easily let in by their Companions, by reason the Trojans had drunk themselves fast asleep, the City was taken, sacked and burnt. Menelaus killing Deiphobus in his Bed, took away Helena, and Priamus was slain in his own House by Pyrrhus (or Neoptolemus) the Son of Achilles. Of the Trojans which escaped, Antenor, being spared by the Greeks, came with the Heceti into the Adriatick Sea, where he built Padua, and Æneæ the Son of Anchises at length reached Italy. This Destruction of Troy happened in the 10th year of the Siege, 408 before the first Olympiad, 1182 before the Æra of Christ, of the World 2821. in the days of Jephthah, who judged Israel.

32. Of the Greek Captains which escaped, Ajax the Son of Telamon striving with Ulysses for the Armour of Achilles, and overcome by the Judgment of the Army, killed himself, or else was circumvented by his Adversary. Ajax the younger, the Son of Oileus, having taken Prisoner Cassandra, the Daughter of Priamus, unwilling to part with her, was driven by the Plots of Agamemnon to flit for himself, and putting out to Sea in an unreasonable time, misadvised by Shipwreck. Of those that returned home, most encountered with many Difficulties; Ulysses especially, who for many years wandered about, as it is poetically described by Homer. Menelaus in 9th. after the Work was done, presently commanded the Greeks to prepare for their Return; but Agamemnon being unwilling to depart before he had sacrificed to Minerva, the Fleet was divided, and a Contention arose betwixt the Followers of Menelaus when they came to Tenedos, because some would have stayed for Agamemnon there; inasmuch as Ulysses then returned back to him. Nestor let Sail thence before Menelaus, but was overtaken by him about the Island Lesbos, whence they sailed together as far as Attica, where Menelaus staying to bury Phronoe, the other left him, and came safe Home to Pylus. Menelaus his Ships were most of them overwhelmed whelmed in a Tempest about the Promontory of Malea, and the rest with him and Helen driven into Ægypt, where and in other places he continued till the eighth year. Agamemnon, after he had sacrificed, and erected an Altar to the twelve Gods in the Promontory of Troas, came home, and was presently murdered by Ægisthus, the Son of his Uncle Thyestes, with whom Clytemnestra his Wife (the Daughter also of Tyndareus had lived in Adultery, and now conspired to make him away.

Orpheus.

33. He left a Son named Orestes, and three Daughters begotten on this Woman. The Boy (for he was but young) was by his Sister Electra, and his Nurse, when they perceived his Life was laid at by Ægisthus before his Fathers Return, conveyed into Phocis, unto Strophius, who had married his Father's Sister, whence returning the eighth year after his Death, he killed Ægisthus together with his Mother, and recovered the Kingdom. Because of his Mothers Death he was vexed by the Furies, and found some Difficulty in mastering his Fathers Dominions, though Menelaus his Uncle, either for that he disapproved of his Mother, or for private Respects, bare him no good Will, and neglected him, which he shewed further in taking from him his Daughter Hermione (who had brought him a Son) and giving her to Pyrhus, the Son of Achilles. Tormented with the Furies he went into Arcadia, and thence to Athens, where he was acquitted in the Court of Areopagus about his Mother, the Suffrages, for, and against him being equal, in which Case Judgment always passed on the Defendants side. A little after this he is thought to have killed Pyrhus as he was sacrificing to his Father at the Temple of Delphos, and then resumed his Wife. When Menelaus was dead he obtained the Kingdom of Sparta, the Lacedæmonians being more willing to receive him as the Grand-son of Tyndareus by Clytemnestra, than the base Sons of Menelaus Nicostratus and Megapenthus begotten on a Slave. It is probable that he, as his Father before him, was Supreme Lord of Argos, and that the Successor of Melampus and Bias, ever since the Division of the Kingdom, or for a good Space, held their Principalities of his Predecessors and himself. But now being King of Lacedæmon, and the greatest part of Arcadia lying near to Argos, after the Death of Cylababes, the Son of Sthenelus (who left no Children) and that Amphilochus was departed thence to the Amphilochians (to whom he gave name) having the Phocians constant Friends to him, he easily made himself sole Master of Argos, and so this Kingdom was re-united about 140 years after the threefold Division of it. Divers years after, he placed a Colony of the Æolians in Asia (four Ages before that of the Ionians) and shortly after died in Arcadia, when he had reigned 70 years.

Tisamenus.

34. He left two Sons: One Legitimate, and named Tisamenus (from his revenging his Fathers Death) begotten on Hermione; and another born of Frigone the Daughter of Ægisthus. Tisamenus succeeded him according to Pausanias, though Paterculus writeth that both of them reigned after their Fathers Death. Scarce was Tisamenus warm in his Seat, when he was displaced by the Heracleide, or Posterity of Hercules. They had several times attempted their Return into Poloponnesus, but were ever frustrated till now; Hyllus the Son of Hercules once or twice, Cleodæus his Son after him, and Aristomachus left three Sons, Temennus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus, which being grown up consulted the Oracle of Apollo, concerning their Return, and had the same Answer their Father formerly had, that they should attain their Desire, if they went by the way Stenygrus, which Word in the Greek being of an ambiguous Signification, Aristomachus thinking by it to be meant the Isthmus, as a narrow way, led down his Forces through it, and miscarried. Temennus objecting this, the Pythia, or woman that delivered the Oracles, answered, that their Ancestors by their Misunderstanding had been Authors of their own Infelicity; for whereas Hyllus was told that the third Fruit was to be expected, the third Generation was meant, and not the third Crop or Summer, as he expounded it, and accordingly perished: And as for Stenygrus, by it they were to understand the Deep Sea on the right hand as one entrench Poloponnesus, and not the narrow Isthmus. Having received this Answer, and conceiving all things now to be fulfilled and ripe for their effectual Return, they built Ships in Ætolia upon that Sea, the Place wherein they were made thenceforth keeping the name of Naupactus from that Occasion. Whilst they were about this Work, a certain Prophet appeared to them, and foretold them several things; but Hippotes taking him for a Magician sent on Purpose to delude the Army, killed him. For this a Pestilence was sent amongst them, about which consulting the Oracle they were bidden to banish Hippotes for ten years, and use the Conduct of a Captain with three Eyes, for two years space.

The Return of the Isthmide.

35. Seeking out such a man, they met one Oxylus, an Ætolian, Son to Thous that went to the Siege of Troy; who being on Horse-back had but one Eye, now returning into his own Country from Eles in Poloponnesus, whither he had been banished for killing a man. Him they made Captain of the Expedition, bargaining to procure him the Possession of Elis as Pausanias witnesseth, who reporteth him to have ridden on a Mule that had but one Eye, and therefore to have been taken for the man meant by the Oracle, through the Persuasion of Cresphontes. Being ready, they gave out they would march again through the Isthmus, and by that Means the Poloponnesians attending their Motions there, easily passed over the Sea, and landed at Molycrium. Three parts of Poloponnesus especially they challenged as their Due: Argos, because defended of Perseus, whereas Tisamenus the present King was of the Posterity of Pelops, who had no Right to that Kingdom. Lacedæmon, for that Hercules killed Hippocoon, who had expelled Tyndareus thence, and restored the latter to the Kingdom on this Condition, to keep it for his Children. Messenia, because having also conquered it, when he destroyed the City Pilus, and slew all the Brothers of Nestor, he gave it to him of meer Goodness and Compassion, but on the same Condition, as Lacedæmon to Tyndareus. The Dominion of Argos without much ado they got into their hands; after that, taking a certain Village in the Confines thereof, Temennus fortified it, and used it for a Place of Retreat for carrying on the War. One Philonomus betrayed Sparta into their Hands, which they entered with found of Pipes instead of Trumpets, as most effectual by the Tune, to make the Souldier attentive, and keep his Ranks, which Use was constantly observed by the Lacedæmonians, together with that of the Harp.

All Regal Power taken from his Successors.

The Kingdom of the Isthmide moderate.

36. Tisamenus and the Achaens thus expelled their parts, and out of Messenia by the Heracleide and Dorienes their Associates, sent to the Ionians then inhabiting Poloponnesus, their Neighbours, desiring Leave to live amongst them. But they being jealous of him, left for his high Birth and Valour, he should be chosen King of the Country, denied their Request. The Achaens then, driven by Necessity and Desperation, attempted to get by Force, what they could not by Intreaty, and though they lost Tisamenus in the Fight, drove the Ionians out of their Seats, and constrained them to pass into Attica, where they were received by the Athenians, through the Persuasion of Melanthus the King. As for the Heracleide, when they came to divide what they had won, Argos fell to Temennus; Cresphontes, by Fraud used in the Lot, obtained Messene; and Lacedæmon became the Portion of Procles and Eurystenes, the Sons of Aristodemus, who was slain by the Sons of Pylas, Kinsmen to Tisamenus, before they entered Poloponnesus: they also, according to their Engagement possessed Oxylus of Elis.

37. Temennus being settled in Argos, after some years incurred the Displeasure of his Sons; for marrying his Daughter Hyrnetho to Deiphontes his Kinsman, he so affected them two above his other Children, that he made him his only Counsellor in all Affairs; inasmuch that his Sons fearing he would transfer the Kingdom from themselves to him, made their Father away by one Means or other. And Cresphontes his Brother, who had used too much Cunning in getting Messene, not long after, seeming to be too Gracious with the People, incurred the Displeasure of the Nobility, and was murdered together with two of his Sons; only Epitus, then but young, escaped, and killing Polyphontes the Usurper, revenged his Father's Death. Recovering thus the Kingdom, he had Successors, Glaucus, Istimus, Doradas, Sylotas, Phintias, Antiochus, and Euphaes, who dying of a Wound, received in a Battle fought with the Lacedæmonians, without Issue, Aristodemus was elected in his Room, and continued as long as the Kingdom it self lasted, being overturned by Means of the Spartans, as will be seen in their Story. Cisus the eldest Son of Temennus succeeded him, though the People generally inclined to Deiphontes, by whose party they were so stirred up and animated, that Cisus being dead, they took away from his Successors all Regal Power and Authority, left them nothing but a meer empty Title, and so in Reality, this Kingdom fell, being in Effect turned into a Free-State. Which Change happened about forty years after the Return of the Heracleide, 690 after the Beginning of Inachus. A. M. 2940.

38. One (and he a great one) there is, who would gather out of an old Tragedian, that the ancient Government of this Kingdom of the Inachide was merely absolute, the King being by the Poet called both People and City, not subject to any Laws, but sustained by the Power of his Throne, and advis all things according to his will and Pleasure. But if Credit may be given to the exprets words of Pausanias, rather than the Liberty of a Poet, Emmias thence concludeth, their Power was but moderate; for the Argives (saith Pausanias, from the most ancient times were exceeding studious of Liberty. Out of this Principle (being stirred up as it seemeth by the Party of Demophontes) they abated the Power of Cisus his Successors, leaving them nothing but an empty Name. And this they further shewed, when Melissus the Son of Lacidamus, one of their Kings, not enduring this Abatement, grew as they thought, Diffolute and Imperious in the Government. For, impatient hereof, they deprived him of all Power, took upon them to condemn him to Death, and plucked up all Supremacy by the roots, not suffering any afterwards to reign amongst them. For, though we meet with one afterwards, called King of Argos, in Herodotus; yet that Name signified no more than it did in the Common-wealths of Athens, Carthage, and Rome, where this Title was wont to be given to some sorts of Officers, as this work will shew. The Government was now Democratical, the chief Power lying in the People, divided into three Tribes, to which the Senate was subordinate, chosen every year for the preparing of matters for the whole Body, and the management of the Executive Power, with Authority to Enact things of lesser consequence. There was also a Council of State, consisting of 80 Persons, besides Inferiour Magistrates of the City, and Judges for determining of Causes, all which are mentioned in the League, made betwixt the Argives, Athenians, and others, described by Thucydides in his fifth Book of the Peloponnesian War. No further Intelligence have we concerning the constitution of this Common-wealth, which yet flourished downwards for many Ages, and had great Contests with the Lacedaemonians, especially about the Territories of Thyrea, to which both laid claim. Sometimes they fell out about their Confederates, being moved with much emulation and dislike at each others Government (the one being a Democracie, and the other an Oligarchy) which once especially brought the State of Argos into great danger. But these things belong to another place.

SECT. IV.

The most ancient Kingdom and Commonwealth of Athens.

Cecrops.

1. THE Founding of the Athenian Kingdom is ascribed to (a) Cecrops, who first reigned in Attica (then Aide) in the days of Triopas King of Argos, 373 years before the destruction of Troy, 780 before the first Olympiad, A.M. 2449. The (b) Egyptians said he was their Countryman, and brought hither a Colony of the Saites, who inhabited upon one of the Mouths of Nile. He was fabled to be double-natured, consisting both of a Serpentine and Humane shape, because, coming into Greece, he shook off Barbarism, and turned Civil. Besides this Colony, he gathered the People of these Parts into twelve Towns, whereas before that, they lived dispersedly, according to the most ancient custom of Greece, and called them Athens, after the name of Minerva in the Greek Language. The Story is (c) told, that when the name came to be given, on a sudden an Olive-tree, and a Fountain of Water appeared, wherewith Cecrops moved with wonder, sent to enquire of the Oracle what they should mean. It was answered, that the Olive signified Minerva, the Water Neptune, and that they might name that City from which of these two they pleased. Hereupon, all the Men and Women were gathered together to make the choice: the Men were for Neptune, but the Women, being the greater number, carried the name for Minerva. Neptune angry hereat, drowned their Territories, whom to pacify, they punished the Women several ways. They decreed, that thenceforth they should not have a Voice in any Publick matter; that no Child should bear the Mother's name, and that they should not be called Athenas, but Attica. Some Women, known by the name of Minerva, there have been, though impure Spirits, ambitious to blind men with Superstition and Idolatry, might well act in this matter, as Augustine telleth us, under the name of Neptune.

Several Mises-

The first was the Mother of Apollo by Vulcan. The second born of the River Nile, and worshipped by the Saites. The third Daughter to Jupiter Calvus. The fourth Virginity. Of these the second must be the that was thus honoured by Cecrops, having founded the City Sais, near to Delta, being by the Egyptians called Nephthys. To her he had formerly erected a Statue in Aegypt, and he, as they say, first gave the name of Zeus to him whom the Latins called Jupiter. As there were several Minervaes, so also more (a) than one City known by the name of Athens. From this in Attica, the Citizens were by the Romans called Athenienses; but another there was in Euboea, built by Cecrops the Son of Erechtheus, the Inhabitants of it went by the name of Athenai: and a City in Narbone, a Province of Gaul, near to Marseille, called Athenopolis, and the Citizens Athenopolitae. There was also in Laconia a Town called by the name of Athens.

3. In the days of (b) Cecrops, Deucalion the Son of Prometheus reigned in Thessaly, whose History being remarkable, must be briefly touched. Lapetus had three Sons, Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. For (c) the first, One telleth us, there were three that bore the name of Atlas. One a Moor, and the greatest of all; another an Italian, Father to Elefira; the third an Arcadian, Father of Maia, the Mother of Mercury; all which the Antients confound according to their Custom. The first (d) lived near to Mount Atlas; to which, for his great Skill in Astrology, is attributed the bearing up of the Heavens; and he is also counted the Father of Bellerophon. Prometheus found out the instrument to strike fire, and thereupon is said to have stolen fire from the Gods. Deucalion his Son married Pyrria the Daughter of his Uncle Epimetheus, and in his time (e) happened that great Deluge in part of Greece, which is known by the addition of his name; that Country called most antiently and truly Hellas, his Seat near to the Mountain Parnassus being chiefly afflicted with it, on which Hill he is thought to have saved many men by Boats, and thence the Fable to have risen of his re-peopleing the Earth. But (that we may note it altogether) there are three particular Floods which we read to have happened to this Country of Greece. The first, under Ogyges (called the Ogygian Deluge) concerning whom we shall speak in the History of Thebes. This fell 248 years before either of the other, and overwhelmed Attica, especially so, that as Periclerus will have it, it remained waste 200 years after. The next was this of Deucalion, which happened 737 years before the first Olympiad: and the (f) third fell 86 years after it, in the days of Dardanus and Cadmus.

4. Deucalion of Pyrria his Wife begat Hellen and Amphition. Hellen gave the name of Hellenes to his Subjects before called Graci, and of Hellas to the Country formerly named Pelagias, from the Pelagi (who there inhabited) as Elemonia from Hemon, the Son of Pelagus, and Pyrria from Pyrria. He had three Sons, Xuthus, Iolus, and Dorus. To Iolus he left his Kingdom, and sent the other two abroad to seek out Seats elsewhere. Iolus grew so famous, that the name of Jupiter at Neptune came to be given him. Dorus inhabited the Country Hylleotis, about the Mountains Offa and Olympus. Xuthus after his Father's death, was banished Thessaly by his other Brothers, for stealing away a great part of his Father's Treasure, and came to Athens, where he married the Daughter of Erechtheus, on which he begat Achaeus and Ion. Achaeus getting aid from Athens and Regulus, went into Thessaly, and recovered his Grand-father's Kingdom; but afterwards killing a man by chance, he fled into Laconia, where his Posterity continued till expelled by the Heracleidae and Dorians, as we shewed in the History of Tismenus. Ion being exceeding famous at Athens, had a numerous Progeny, which, for that Attica was now grown too full, was sent out as a Colony into Peloponnesus, whence they were thrust out by their Brethren the *Achaean*s, after they had denied them harbour (as is formerly said) and returned to Athens, from which City they were afterwards led out into Asia, by the Sons of Codrus. But these things happened in after-times.

5. In Cecrops his time (g) one maketh the Council, or Senate of Areopagus to have had its Original, though no clear light can we discover concerning the true beginning of it. (h) Some write that it began under Solon, but (i) another of a more ancient date signifieth, that it was a Court of Judicature before. (k) One deriveth the word from Mars, (in Greek Ares) making him to have been first tried there for killing Halirrhodius, the Son of Neptune, who offered Violence to his Daughter Alcippa. Others would fetch a reason from the erecting his Spear there, or from this, that the Court of Areopagus took Cognizance of Slaughters, which are usually committed with Swords or other Weapons of Mars. Lastly, some think it thence to have been named, for that the Amazons, when they fought against Thebes, made Mars his Hill their Fortrefs, and there offered Sacrifice to him. * Cecrops died after he had reigned fifty years, and because Erythron his Son died before him, Craneus the most powerful man then at Athens, succeeded him in the Kingdom. He, after ter he had reigned some seven years, was thrust out by Amphytion, the Son of Dencalion, and his Son-in-law, the Founder, as some have thought, of the National Council of the Amphytionians, of which we have already spoken. He is reported to have given entertainment to Dionysus, or Bacchus, who, at this time, as they say, came into Attica, and when he had reigned ten years, was also expelled by Erichthonius.

6. The Father of Erichthonius was said to be Vulcan, and his Mother, the Earth; because he was found in Vulcan's Temple upon the Earth, with a Snake wound about his feet, whence also they feigned that he had feet like Snakes, and invented a Chariot wherein he might ride and hide them. He instituted Games to Apollo and Minerva, and having reigned fifty years, left his Kingdom to his Son Pandion, who also, after forty, gave way to his Son Erechtheus. He became a man of great account; and whereas the Subjects of Athen were before his time called Cecropidae, thenceforth they were named after the Place it self. He made War upon the Inhabitants of Eleusine, Ion the Son of Xuthus, and his own Grand-son, by his Daughter, being his chief Commander, wherein, after he had slain Immarthus, the Son of Pascan, in Attica. He left three Sons, Cecrops, Metion, and Pandorus, who falling into contention about the Succession, put it to the Arbitration of Xuthus. He adjudged it to the eldest, but yet would they not rest satisfied, which made him leave Athen, and go into Egiale, where he died. This Cecrops the second, some think to have gathered the People into twelve Towns, for that living dispersedly abroad, the Carians by Sea, and the Baotians (called Beone) by Land, harassed the Country, as Strabo writeth. At the end of forty years, his Son, named Pandion, succeeded him, who was expelled the Kingdom by the Sons of Metion his Uncle, and fled to Pyla, the King of Megara, his Father-in-law, who left him his Successor. Will't he here reigned, he begat four Sons, Aegus, Lycus, Pallas, and Nisus, who after his death went against the Metionidae, and expelled them Athen, the Dominions whereof they divided into four parts, according to their Father's injunctions, Megara falling to Nisus, who reigned there a long time.

7. Though this division was made, yet was Aegus Sovereign in effect, for fear of whom, Lycus fled to Athen. Pallas the other Brother had fifty Sons, which growing up, gave cause enough to Aegus to be jealous of them, having him in contempt because he was childless. For though he married two Wives, yet had he Issue by neither of them, which made him go to Delphos to enquire of the Oracle about Posterity. The answer being obscure, in his return he was entertained by Pittheus, the Son of Pelops, a man famous for Learning, at Trezena, who, either understanding the Oracle, or otherwise induced, made his Daughter Helira to lye with him, after he had caused him to drink good store of Wine. At his departure he put a Sword, and a Knife under a great Stone, bidding her, if she brought forth a Boy, as soon as he could remove the stone, and take those things from under it, to send him with them as Tokens, unto Athen, and he would own him for his Son. She accordingly brought forth a Son (called Thefus, from putting the marks under the stone) whom Pittheus brought up; and for that he proved exceeding Prudent and Courageous, his Mother at sixteen years of Age brought him to the Stone, acquainting him with his Original, and his Father's Injunctions. He easily removing it, and taking away the Tokens, prepared for his Journey; but they were unwilling to let him go by Land, because all the ways were full of Robbers, since Hercules (who went up and down destroying them) after his killing of Iphitus, had quitted these Parts, and was gone into Lycia, where for some years he served Omphale the Queen. But Thefus, burning with emulation upon hearing continually the Praise of Hercules his Kinman (for their Mothers were next Cousins) resolved to take that way to obtain some Renown in killing those Robbers; and effected his Design upon several of them.

8. Being arrived at Athen, he was in danger to be poisoned by his Father, through the perfavation of Medea, (who now was fled to him from Corinth, and filled his jealous Head with suspicions of this Stranger) till thinking it wisdom to make himself known, rather than let another do it, he shewed him the Tokens, which he presently acknowledged, and owning him for his Son, made his Subjects, as such, to take notice of him. But the Sons of Pallas, who before had been Seditious, now seeing all hopes of the Kingdom taken from them by him, and disdaining that Aegus should first reign himself, being not of the Blood Royal, but adopted only by Pandion (as Plutarch writeth) and then leave for his Successor a Stranger, and a Bastard, they took Arms; and the better to accomplish their Design, divided themselves sefves into two Parties, whereof the one came openly with their Father against Secf. 4. Athen, and the other lay in ambush. Thefus having notice of the latter fort, surprized, and cut them all off, which fo discouraged the other, as they separated themselves and fled. Thefus after this, to employ himself, and gain the Favour of the People, went, and took the Marathonian Bull, fetch'd out of Crete by Hercules, and brought him quick into the City, after he had infested the Countrey very much. Then failed he to Crete, where, as the Fable goeth, he flew the Minotaur, a Monster kept by Minos, King of that Island.

9. Minos, (a) Rhadamantus, and Sarpedon were the children of Jupiter by Euro- (a) Diodorus pa, and all adopted by Asterius (the Grand-son of Hellen, by his Son Tentamus) (a) p. 183. King of that Island, who married their Mother, and was childless. Minos was the Law-giver of the Cretians; this honour being ascribed to him by the most Authentick of ancient (b) Authors. Yet (c) Ephorus in his Book of European Common- (b) Plato in Legibus, Arifto. Polit. wealths, wrote, that he was but an Imitator of one Rhadamantus (of the same name with his Brother, who by others is also said to have been employed by Minos (c) l. 2. cap. 8. in this work, but more ancient) who first cultivated the Island by Laws, Cities, (c) Apud Strab. l. 10. lib. 10. and Commonwealths, feigning that he had from Jupiter all the Ordinances which he published. In (d) imitation of him, Minos having continued in the Cave of Ju- (d) Enseque- piter nine years, produced Laws in Writing, and ascribed them to the fame Author, as Homer also hinteth; which (e) word of Homer, though Strabo taketh to signifie (e) Odif. a continuance for ten years, yet Plato, and from him (f) Valerius Maximus, inter- (f) l. 1. lib. 1. c. 2. pret it not of nine years continuance, but every ninth year, wherein, as it seemeth, he amended his Laws. Although Minos was a King, yet he directed (according to * Ephorus) the whole Model of his Laws to the Freedom of his Subjects. This Li- * Apud Strab. l. 10. lib. 10. berty he thought to be preserved best by Concord, which would be most establish'd by the prevention of Avarice and Luxury, the great causes of Disagreement. He would therefore have them all live soberly and frugally, to which purpose he ordained, that Boyes should live together in Companies, called Agelae, when they were grown up, and men, in others, called Syllitia, from eating together, (which they also named Andria from their Manhood) that taking their Meat all in publick, the Poor might live in equal condition with the Rich.

10. After the abdication of Regal Power, the chief Magistracy was exercised by ten Cofmi, in Power, though not in Number, like to the Spartan Ephori, being chosen out of the lowest fort of People as those; yet not out of the whole Body, but of particular Families, which Custom Aristotle accounteth worse than the other of Lacedaemon. Those Cofmi at home Governed the Common-wealth; in War commanded the Army with absolute Authority. There was also a Senate chosen out of those who in this Office had well demeaned themselves, being for life, and not liable to be called to account. There was an Order of Horse-men, who were bound to keep Horses for the service of the State, whereas they at Lacedaemon had no such tie upon them. In the Concio, or great Assembly, all Members of the Common-wealth had equal Votes, but its Power was not great, confirming only what was propounded by the Senate and Cofmi. They had publick Slaves, called Periæci, from their inhabiting up and down the Countrey, who tilled the Grounds, and paid in a constant Revenue. All, when ripe of Age, were commanded to marry, for the propagation of legitimate Issue: Yet did they not lead their Wives to their Houses, when newly married, but let them stay till they were fit to govern a Family. The Boyes took their meat altogether on the ground, serving themselves and the elder fort. They were clothed meanly, and alike both Winter and Summer; they used bickerings with one another, and alike both Winter and Summer, on certain days, and had those who exercised them also in Shooting, and a warlike kind of leaping, invented by Cnæus; moreover, in certain Rhythms, called properly * Rythmi Cretici. The Cretians had several commendable Laws, as that which severely restrained Drunkennells; another, commanded by Plato, that required an account how publick Corn was distributed and spent. The younger fort were utterly forbidden to make any enquiry into the Equity of the Laws, and if the elder were unsatisfied, without their knowledge, they were to have recourse to the Magiftrates, and their own Equals. But, that the Laws might be engraven in their memories, the Boyes were wont when they were taught to read, to get some of them by heart, being put into Verse, together with some Musical Notes.

11. Lycurgus, the Spartan Law-giver, made this Model the Pattern of his new Common-wealth, having travelled into the Island, where he had converse with Thales, a man ennobled for his Laws, and Lyrick Poems; for we must not suppose Minos the sole Author of the Cretian Customs. As the Cretians had their Cofmi, so the the Spartans their Ephori, though most probable it is, that these were brought in after the death of Lycurgus. As they a Senate, so these also endowed with the like Immunities. The Concio, or Assembly of the People in Crete, resolved nothing but what was propounded by the Cosmi and Senate, which was followed by the first Constitution of Lycurgus, the Senate propounding at Sparta. The Periæti, and Holoti sily agreed, though the Cretians received less damage from the former, because, being in an Island, there were no Neighbours to hold correspondence with the Slaves. The Syllistæ of the Lacedæmonians were fetched, as Aristotle proveth, from Crete, and their Phiditia taken from the Andria of that Place, as also their Education of Children was agreeable to the Cretian. Plato commendeth much the Commonwealth of Crete, and the Legislator for his Wisdom and Prudence, though he abominateth the immodest love of Boyes, and rejecteth his reason for it, which yet Lycurgus so approved, as to put it in his Model. Aristotle condemneth it, as also, amongst some other things, the Election of the Cosmi, and their too great advantage they had of raising Seditions in the State, when they came to be punished. But Polybius affirmeth, the two Commonwealths of Crete and Sparta to have vastly differed, not fearing to blame Ephorus, Xenophon, Calisthenes, and Plato, for saying they were very like; because with the Cretians it was usual to ingross Land and Money, whence they were avaricious, contentious, seditious, and what not? Moreover, they had annual Magistrates, whereas the other had two Kings for life. They were, he saith, fraudulent and crafty in their private Demeanour, and most unjust in their public Councils. Though some publick Abuses taxed by Polybius, might have crept in at after times, y yet it appeareth from the testimony of that Verse of Epimenides a Cretian, which St. Paul citeth and confirmeth,

That the Disposition even of the old Cretians (for Epimenides is found contemporary with Solon) was very naughty.

12. Minos succeeding his Step-father, begat Lycastes, and left him his Successor, who, on Ida the Daughter of Corcyas, begat Minos the second, fathered also on Jupiter. He had Issue by Pasiphaæ, (Daughter to Sol and Crete) Education Afrea, Androgeos, Ariadne, and other Children. Androgeos going to the Solemn Feast of the Panathenææ, instituted by Theseus, at Athens, excelled all men in the Exercises then performed, whereby he became familiarly acquainted with the Sons of Pallas. This, when Ægeus perceived, fearing they might by his means receive some aid and assistance, he procured him to be made away, at which Minos sore aggrieved, came to Athens to demand satisfaction, but obtaining none, is said to have procured from Jupiter a Famine to fall upon all Greece, and especially Attica, which could not be abated, till he received satisfaction. A yearly Tribute then he imposed on the Athenians, of seven Boyes, and as many Girls, which being unwillingly willing to submit to, they were sore displeased when they came to part with their Children, and repining at Ægeus, as the Author of their Calamity, at the third time of sending, Theseus offered himself to go amongst the rest. The Fable is, that they were to be devoured of the Minotauræ, a Monster, whose upper Parts were like to those of a Man, but resembled a Bull in the other. Some thought there might be such a Monster indeed, but most account it fabulous, and it is interpreted to be meant of one Taurus, the Captain of Minos, who might have custody of these Children, whom Aristotle will not have killed, but made Slaves till their death. Theseus promising to kill this Minotauræ, Ægeus with much ado yielded he should go, and commanded the Master of the Ship, that, whereas for the sacredness of the occasion they used black Sails, if his Son came back alive, he should change them for white ones, as soon as they came within kenning of Attica.

He killeth the Minotauræ.

13. Theseus coming into Crete, by the help of Ariadne the Daughter of Minos, (which fell in love with him) got into the Labyrinth where the Minotauræ was kept (and which was made by Dædalus, who having killed his Sisters Son at Athens, fled into this Island) and slew him. It is thought, that when he landed, he offered the Combat to whomsoever would accept of it, and that this Taurus, who bore himself high upon his Valour, and was hated by all for his ill manners, was forced by Minos to accept of it. Theseus having killed him, was so admired by the King, that he gave him back the Children, and remitted the Tribute. Ariadne fell in love with him, whom, some say, he carried away with him, but others, that he left her behind, and the hanged her self; several things, one contrary to another, being reported of her. Peace now being made, and Theseus returning homewards, they were so transported with Joy, that they forgot to set up the white Sails; whereupon Ægeus, despairing of his Son's safety, threw himself headlong from a Rock and and perished. From this Ægeus some would fetch the name of the Ægeus Sea. But others think it was so called from Æge, the Island near Eubœa; others from Æge a Town of Eubœa; some from Æga, a Promontory of Hælis, and others from the Rock Æge, lying betwixt Tenedos and Chios; Again some from Ægeus, the Name of Neptune in Phœrydes; and others from Ægeon, the fame with Briareus, and others from a Goat, because by it's Turbulency it leapeth like that Creature. Festus, who deriveth the Name also from Ægeus, mentioneth other two Originals as probable, viz. the many Islands, which to one looking at them afar off, appear as Goats, in the Greek Language called Ægæ; and the perishing of Æge the Queen of the Amazons in it. Concerning Ægeus, Suidas telleth a long Story out of Nicostratus, which is refuted by the Scholiast of Apollonius, who concerning this, is to be consulted, together with Strabo and Pliny.

Theseus gathereth the Athenians into one City.

14. Theseus succeeding his Father, set himself all manner of ways to deserve well of his Subjects; Whereas before they were dispersed in twelve Towns or more, he gathered them into one City, as being more convenient for Strength, Concord, and Dispatch of publick Buisness. This being hard to effect, by reason that the People were unwilling to quit their present Possessions for new Hopes, he went from Place to Place, shewing them the Convenience of the thing; and that he might effectually persuade, he promised them Liberty, offering to lay down all Power except that of the Generalship, and of keeping the Laws; in all other things to be like them, and the Power to rest in the People. The Multitude being allured by this Promise, he made the chief City, called Cecropia, his Regal Seat, and built another about it for the People, which he divided into three Ranks, of Nobility, Husbandmen, and Artificers, all under the same equality of Liberty and Law. But the former sort he appointed to be the Fountain of Magistracy; yet so, as elective by the Suffrages of the other two. He abolished the several Courts of Judicature belonging to the twelve Towns, and constituted one general Prytanæum in the City. Thus did he divest himself of all Royalty in a manner, and brought Popular-government into the State.

His Exploit.

15. As Hercules had instituted the Olympick Games in Honour of Jupiter, so he ordained the Isthmian, and dedicated them to Neptune. He failed with Hercules into the Euxine Sea (some say, by himself) against the Amazons, from amongst whom he got Antiope his Wife, which gave Occasion to that sort of Women to come against Athens. They sore distressed it by a Siege, till Peace was made by Antiope or Hippolyta, as others called her. Some have affirmed, that he was not Partaker in any Exploit with any of the Heroes of his time, except in that he helped the Lapithæ against the Centauræ. Others again contend, that he failed to Colchus with Jason, and assisted Meleager in killing the Boar; whence came the Proverb, Non sine Theseo: he also performed many brave things by himself, without the Assistance of any, hence he came to be counted Alter Hercules. Having contracted near Friendship and Alliance with Perithous the Son of Ixion, being now 50 years old, he joyned with him in stealing away Helena the Daughter of Tyndareus from Sparta, and when they cast Lots who should have her, she fell to him. He carried her to his Mother living at Aphidna, there to be kept till she were ripe for Marriage: But having agreed that he who obtained her, should help the other to procure him a Wife elsewhere, they both travelled into Epirus, to steal thence the Daughter of Aidonæus King of the Molossians, whose Wife was called Proserpina, and his Dog Cerberus, he himself by the Fable being named Pluto. When he understood their Errand, that they came not to woo but to steal, he laid hands on them both, and caused his Dog to devour Perithous, kept Theseus in Prison, till Hercules desired he should be set at Liberty.

His Exile.

16. Whilst Theseus was absent, one Menestheus the Son of Peleus, (who was Grand-Son to Erechtheus by his Son Orneus) incensed the People against him, and that upon the Account of that Change he had made in the State, which he would have them believe was intended to enslave them under Pretence of Liberty: and at this time came down the Tyndaridæ, Cæstor and Pollux, (some think by his Procurement) against Athens in Behalf of their Sister. Finding that he was not there, and discovering the place of her Retirement, they went to Aphidna, and taking it by Force recovered her, and took Ethra the Mother of Theseus, which afterwards accompanied her as her Servant to Troy, and at the taking of that Town was set at Liberty by her Grand-son Demophon. By Means of Menestheus, the Tyndaridæ were received into Athens, and great Honour was done unto them, which thing contributed to his Design. For when Theseus returned, the Citizens were so wrought upon, that in no wife would they be reconciled, and so was he forced to banish him.

Sec<sup>t</sup>. 4. himself into the Island Seyrus, having sent away his Children privately to Elpenor the Son of Chalcodon into Eubœa. One writeth, that sailing towards Crete to Deucalion the Son of Minos (whose Sister Phœdra he had married after the Death of Anaxiopo) he was driven by Tempest upon Seyrus, the Inhabitants whereof receiving him with great Honour for Reverence of his Name, Lycomedes their King, out of Jealousie, made him away, having led him up to a Rock, as though to throw him the Country, and thence tumbled him down headlong.

17. Menestheus then began his Reign at Athens, in the days of Atreus King of Argos and Mycene, and some years after accompanied Agamemnon and Menelaus to the Siege of Troy, with fifty Ships. During the War, we hear little or nothing of him, but after the City was taken, he honoured the Funerals of Ajax the Son of Telamon with a Funeral Oration, which work belonged to the Athenians to perform for those that died in the Wars; but within a while he himself afforded Matter for that Office, dying in the Isle Melos at his Return Homewards. After his Death Demophon the Son of Thesus, (who together with his Brother Achæus, (both begotten on Phœdra) followed Elpenor to Troy) went to Athens and obtained the Kingdom. As he returned, Phyllis Daughter to Sichon and Queen of Thrace, fell in Love with him, and woo'd him for Marriage. He told her he would first go to settle his Affairs at Athens, and then come and marry her; but staying somewhat long, she had no Patience to wait, and thinking she was slighted, hanged her self. He stole the Palladium or Image of Pallas, from the Argives, who brought it from Troy, and in their Return with Diomedes made Encursions unwittingly into Attica, being driven by Night upon Phalerus, and not knowing where they were. He reigned about thirty four years, and then left his Kingdom to his Son Oxyntes, who after twelve was succeeded by Apollon his Son, who reigned but one year. Then followed Thymetes the fifteenth King, who being a Bastard, is reported to have murdered Apollon his Brother, and after eight years lost the Kingdom. He was the last of the Erechthides that reigned at Athens.

18. It hapned that the State of Athens had War with the Boeotians about Celœne, a Place siting in the Confines of both Countries, and it pleased the Parties that their Kings should decide the Quarrel in their own Persons. Thymetes declined the Combat, and for that was depol'd. Melanthius a Messenian, who was then driven from Home by the Heraclide, accepted it, and overcame Xanthus the Boeotian King by a Stratagem; for when they came to fight he cried out: Thou dost not justly Xanthus, but contrary to our Agreement, who accompanied with another Person, comest to fight against me a single man, at which he wondering, and looking back to see who should follow him, Melanthius ran him through with his Lance. He then reigned in the room of Thymetes, and at his Death left Cædus his Son his Successor; who willingly offered himself to Death for the Safety of his Athenians. There were now Distasts arisen betwixt the Heraclide, who held Peloponnesus, and them, for that they harboured the Iones, and other Fugitives out of that Country; and at length the Heraclide intending to make War upon them, consulted the Oracle beforehand concerning their Success, which answered, that they should have the better, if they kept off their Hands from the Athenian King, and not otherwise. They gave Order to their Men to beware of hurting him; but he getting Knowledge of the Matter, disguised himself, and going into their Army, by blows provoked them to kill him. This being known, they raised the Siege, though some of them had already got into the City, on whom then the Athenians had Mercy, and dismissed them without any Harm. This happened 486 years after Cærops, 114 after the Destruction of Troy, 35 after the Return of the Heraclide, 293 before the first Olympiad, A. M. 2935.

19. After Cædus his Death, the People took away the Title of King, and gave the Name of Archon with a diminished Power to his Successor, who might be called to an Account for what he did, though he kept the Principality during Life. This was Medon the Son of Cædus, whom the rest of his Brothers despising, as weak, and lame, led out Colonies of the Ionians, and some others (Attica being now full) into Asia, and there founded the 12 Famous Cities of the Ionians, viz. Ephesus, Miletus, Priene, Colophon, Myus, Teos, Lebedus, Claromene, Erythre, Phocæa, Chius in the Island Cbios, and Samos in an Isle of the same Name over against Ephesus, which at first being subjected to several petty Princes, at length joyn'd in one Body politick, and became very famous in After-Ages. Twelve other Archons succeeded Medon, named from him Medontide, and in this Condition the State remained unaltered for 315 years, during which time there is little remarkable, either concerning Princes, or Commonwealth; only the time of Arifbron the 19th Archon fell in with that of Sardanapalus, and Alcmeon the Son of Ælchyus was the last, who dying when he had scarce reigned two years, the People took another Occasion to alter the Government; for being weary of this perpetual Power of their Princes, they confined it to the Space of ten years. This Change being made about the Beginning of the first Olympiad, Charops was the first that underwent it, in whose time Dionysius of Halycarnassus will have Rome built. Six others succeeded him in the Power thus qualified, whereof Hippomenes the fourth in Order was the last of the Politerity of Cædus, being depol'd for his Cruelty to his Daughter, whom being deflowred, he shut up with an Horle that had no Meat given him, and so caused to be devoured quick. The last of all the six was Eryxias, who after he had governed six years, either died, or being depol'd for some Crime, opened the Door to a new and greater Innovation, after 70 years Continuance of the Decennial Government.

20. The People still burning with a Desire of greater Liberty, abolished quite the Power of a single Person, and instead of him made nine Archons, to be but annual, a new Election being to be made every year out of those who for Birth, Wealth or Favour were most considerable in this City. The first in Order was properly called Archon, as Principal of the Colledge, and Eponymus, because he signed the Calendar, and all things that fell out in that year, were said to be done he being Archon. He had the Care of their Superstition; to him it belonged to take Cognisance of Differences arising about Inheritances, as also betwixt Husband and Wife, Parents and their Children, and Kinsfolks one amongst another; Moreover, he took Care of Orphans, and assigned them Guardians. The second in Order had the name of King, who taking Care also of another part of their Superstition, determined Causes both Civil and Criminal, or referred them to the greater Courts of Judicature. The third was called Polemarchus, who besides the Charge of some religious Customs, had that of War committed to him (whence he had his name) was General of the Armies abroad, and at home the Judge of Strangers. The other fix were termed Thesmothetæ, being keepers of the Laws or Customs, Judges in several Cases, and had Power to commit to Prison all suspicious Persons. These were their distinct Offices. Altogether they had Authority to assemble the People as the Kings, and other Archons in former times, and to resolve with them about publick Buifness.

21. Such were the Improvements of that Liberty, which Thesus bestowed on the People: but though they seem'd great, yet were they not arrived at that height as to satisfy the heady Multitude offended with the too great Power of the Nobler and Richer sort; and which finding it self aggrieved with the many Inconveniences that arose for want of Laws (the Sentence of the Magistrate, or Judge, being the only Law) many Grudges and Discords thence arose, which so far prevailed, as that after 50 years, Power was given to one Draco, a man honest and wife, but of austere Severity, to make Laws. Many he framed, reformed the Court of the Ephete, which he made to consist of 51 persons, not under 50 years of Age, who were to judge of Murders, and such like Crimes. But so severe were his Constitutions concerning Manners (judging no less than Death to the least Offence) that as they were by Demas said to be written in Blood, so in Process of time they grew intolerable, and little or no Relief had the poorer sort against the Power of the great ones, with the Usury of whom they were even exhausted: Hence grew great Disturbances in the Commonwealth, the Commons hated the Nobility, and the Nobility feared the Commons; nothing but Desolation seem'd to attend the State; some being earnest for a Popular Government, others for an Oligarchy, and others for a middle way. These tempered, and poised the other two parties; but nothing at length seem'd to avail, except all the whole Power should be put into the hands of one, and a plain Tyranny erected as the only sufficient Remedy for these desperate Distempers. The common sort were hot for an equal Division of the publick Grounds now in the hands of the rich, and fit to make themselves an head, and do it by Force; but the most prudent sort taking notice of Solon, now very eminent, a man of unblameable Life, and unbiass'd by the Interest of either Party; him they besought, having sufficient Wisdom, to compose these Differences of the distracted Commonwealth; offering him the Power and Command of all.

22. A year or two before those great Disturbances, hapned that which gave a Rise to the Eminency of Solon, and as well out of Respect to the Commonwealth, as in Relation to him, must be recited briefly. The Island Salamine lying not far from Athens, had of late time revolted to the Inhabitants of Megara, and for the Recovery of it several Attempts had been made with such bad Success, that a Law was preferred whereby whereby it was ordained Capital for any man thenceforth to move about it. Solon considering the Consequence hereof, counterfeited himself mad; and going into the Place of public Meeting, began, as the People came about him, to lay a Company of odd conceited Verses, whereby he so moved them, that they repealed the Law, and decreed another Expedition against the Megarians, ordaining him their Captain therein. Solon sailing towards Colias, where the Athenian Women were keeping the Feast of Ceres, sent one to the Megarians, who counterfeiting himself a Fugitive should tell them, that now at this Place they might easily surprize the Women. This being done, he sends them away, and in their Rooms and Cloaths, left there a Company of beardless young men, who being provided of Daggers, stabbed the Megarians when they came to seize on their Prey, and so by this Plot (which several Authors say was executed by Pisistratus, though devised by Solon) the Athenians again recovered the Island. Solon proved it to be belong to Athens, for that Phileus the Son of Euryface, and Grand-son to Atax Telamonius, being made free of the City, gave it unto the Athenians; and because that such as were buried there, lay with their Faces to the West, according to the Athenian Custom, whereas the Megarians buried their Dead in a careless manner, not regarding any such Position.

23. Solon having got much Credit by the Success of this Enterprize, procured such to be called to an Account, as had been guilty of the Death of Cylon. This man being famous for his Victory at the Olympick Games affected the Tyranny of man being famous for his Victory at the Olympick Games affected the Tyranny of Athens, and endeavouring to seize on the Castle, failed therein, and fled for Refuge to the Image of Minerva, whence the Magistrates giving him Hopes of Life, took him and his Companions, and notwithstanding put them to Death. This now was accounted a great Injury offer'd to the Goddels, and such, as both the Actors thereof, their Posterity and Country were esteemed as contaminate, and liable to heavy Punishment. Solon perswaded them to submit to Tryal, and 300 Judges were appointed out of the chiefest Persons, who condemned them to Banishment. Whilst this was a doing the Megarians fell upon the Athenians, took Nisæa, and recovered Salamis: strange Sights also appeared, whereat the City was affrighted, and their Prophets told them that certain Crimes were committed, which must be expiated. For this Cause Epinemides a famous Philosopher (whom some reckon amongst the Number of the seven wise-men in the Room of Periander) was sent for out of Crete to cleanse the City; a Plague having also fallen upon it at this time, as Diogenes Laertius writeth in his Life. Several Altars upon this Occasion he caused to be made, as amongst the rest one to Contumelie (or Reproach) and another to Impudence. At this time also it is thought that the Altar was erected to the unknown God, they having received no Benefit by making Addresses to their known ones, but present Ease as soon as this Altar and a Temple of the same Dedication were made and used. One faith this was the Inscription: To the Gods of Asia, Europe, and Africk, to Gods unknown and strange; another that it ran after this Manner: To the Gods of Asia, Europe, and Africk, to the unknown and strange God, in the singular Number. But these Calamities increasing publick Discontents, made the Affluence of Solon the more desirable.

24. He feared much to undertake so difficult a Task as a Settlement; and as for the Tyranny (so then it was termed) he refused it absolutely; though his Friends perswaded him that by his Moderation and good Demeanour he might easily change this odious name into that of a Kingdom. But being elected Archon after Phileus brotus, in the third year of the 46 Olympiad, some 23 years after the last Change of Government, and in the days of Neuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, he set himself about the Work of Reformation, and first of all eased the People of the great Burthen of their Debts, whereby they redeemed their Bodies and Estates; which Act was in Greek called Sisachthea. Some have thought that it was only of the Interest, but others of the Principal too, alledging him to have forgiven 5 (some have said 15) Talents that were owing to himself. However, he made them more able to satisfy their Creditors by raising the Value of Money, as of the Attick Mina from 75 Drachms to 100. Then for the settling of the Commonwealth; in way thereto, and in the first place he abrogated all Draco's Laws, except that against Murder, as too severe. The four Tribes of the People he left as they were ordered by Erechtheus, distinguished into Souldiers, Crafts-men, Husbandmen, and Keepers of Goats; but for that there was no Distinction made according to Estates, and it concerned those that had most therein to take Care of the Commonwealth, he also divided the People into four Ranks, or Classes, according to their Substance, and out of the three first ordered all Magistrates to be chosen, the fourth and last having equal Votes in the great Council, or Assembly of the whole Body of the State, in which lay the Supreme Power. The first was called Pentacosa Medimni, the second was the Ordo Equester, the third called Zengite, and the fourth Thete. Hereby he gave a Right to the common sort to elect, and call to account the Magistrates, to have an hand in making, and repealing Laws, and in the highest Court of Judicature, by which equal Temper, he suppressed all these Factions that had lately risen. And yet, left the Multitude should be too much elevated, besides the Court of Areopagus he instituted a Senate of four hundred, (a hundred to be chosen out of each Tribe) through which all things should pass into the great Assembly, wherein nothing was to be debated, but what was offered from this Council, elected anew every year.

25. The College of the nine Archons he left Elective as he found it; but ordained that they should not be admitted to take their Oath, till they had first in the Senate made Proof of their Descent, and then been approved in the great Assembly, after which they were to take their Oath in the Kings Gate, to keep the Laws, and accept of no Bribes; or if they should be thereof detected, then to erect at Delphos a Statue of Gold of their own Bigness: and the same Oath they were again to take as they went up to the Castle, crowned with Myrtle. Unto them severally he assigned their Offices; for the most part as they were before, only more certain; for a Reward of their good Service, if after much and through Examination they were found Upright and Faithful, they were to be chosen unto the Senate of Areopagus, the College of the Archons being hereby constituted the Seminary of it. To this Council, consisting of most grave, experienced, and upright men, an Inspection was given into all Concernments of State, a Power of preserving the Laws and Customs, and also of reforming Manners, in which Particular they were so severe, that once they condemned a Boy, for a Custom of pulling out the Eyes of Quails, as hereby betraying a bad Disposition. They met ordinarily thrice a Month on Mars his Hill (whence the Council had its name) but extraordinarily as Occasion required, and then in the Place called the Kings Gallery. As for the Council of State consisting of 400, it had Power also to determine great Matters and Controversies of it self, and if it law it convenient, to report them to the People. If the Assent of the People was had, then passed it's Acts and Constitutions into firm Laws; if not, they continued in Force one year, and no longer. To this Council moreover it belonged, to provide for such as were grown poor, and were to be maintained by the Publick; to call all indebted to the State to an Account, and provide for the making of Gallies.

The Assembly of the People.

26. To the great Assembly of the People alone belonged the Power of making and nulling Laws, of Peace and War, sending Ambassadors, and giving the Freedom of the City. When they met together they took an Oath, with a bitter Execution, to consult the best they could for the Good of the Commonwealth. Those that were above fifty years of Age spake first, and after the Business was thoroughly debated, they signified their Pleasure by holding up their Hands. Solon ordained that all the Laws should be reviewed once a Year, being cited by the Thesmistes. But when any were to be abrogated, or new ones made, the whole Assembly took not that matter of Debate upon it self; but committed it to the Care of the most grave and prudent amongst them, chosen for that Purpose and called Nomothetes, amongst which none were admitted, but such as had dealt in the most important Affairs. Before them five Orators (called Syndics) pleaded concerning any Law that was to be abolished, which should not be done without mature Advice, left thereby an Occasion might be given to Sedition and Innovation; and what was concluded by the Nomothetes, the Body of the People always approved. The Assembly was had ordinarily thrice in 35 days, at the Pleasure of the Council of State or 400; but extraordinarily upon Occasion called together, either by the same Authority of the same Strategi or Generals for War, and sometimes of the nine Archons.

Courts of Judi-

27. For Courts of Judicature, besides the Areopagites formerly mentioned, there was that of the Ephetae, founded, as it's thought, by Demophon the Son of Theseus, consisting at first of 50 Judges chosen out of Attica, and as many from Argos; but Draco excluding the Strangers, made the Number only 51 Citizens, and after him Solon tempering the Rigor thereof, transferred thence the more weighty matters to Areopagus, leaving the Judgment of casual homicide, and lying in Wait for Life, in some Cases to it. The Causes brought in thither were reported ported by the King or second Archon. There was another Court most large and common, consisting of 500, 1000, or sometimes 1500 Persons, according to the Occasion, chosen by Lot out of all the Citizens of thirty years old and upwards. They judged of many, and often of the greatest Causes; and this was called the Heliaestick Council, because they sat in an open place where the Sun shone. A fourth Court there was of Arbitrators, consisting of two hundred and twenty, chosen out of the Tribes, and being equally divided according to the Number of them, heard and determined their Causes. A fifth and least Considerable there was yet, made up of thirty Persons at the first, afterwards increased to forty, going in Circuit to the several forts of People gathered by Theseus into one City, heard and judged lesser Matters. As for the Officers belonging to the several Courts, the twelve men for Imprisonment and Execution, with the Officers of the several Tribes, they are scarce to be mentioned by this Work.

Particular Laws.

28. For particular Laws. Solon knowing what a Multitude of People inhabited Athens, took such Care for the Prevention of Idleness, that he abolished any Son from the Duty of maintaining his Father fallen into Poverty, that had not procured him to be instructed in some Trade; and the same Liberty he gave unto such as were born of Strumpets. He made a Law whereby he gave Leave to the People to make Testaments, which they never could do before; all the Estates of deceased Persons going to the next Heir. He forbade Women to have any Portions, lest Marriages should be made for Gain; yet succeeded they in the Inheritances of their Fathers, in Default of Issue Male. Some things about Marriages and Adultery he decreed, which have been noted, and not unworthily, as absurd. He commanded the Court of Areopagus, to take an Account of all Persons how they lived, and punish those that could render none. He forbade all native Fruits, except that of the Olive, to be transported out of Attica. And nothing is more memorable than this, that he deprived of all Honour, and rendered infamous those, that, in a time of Faction and Sedition in the City, joyned themselves to neither Party, concluding, that such as were concerned for the Good of the Commonwealth, would according to their best Apprehensions, side with such as contended for it. His Laws he exposed to publick View, that none should pretend Ignorance in them. He swore the People, Magistrates, and Senate, to observe them for an hundred years, and the Archons, if they brake them, to set up a Statue at Delphos, of their own Bigness. Then to conclude his Work, he reformed the Calendar, much amiss at that time, and reduced the Year into such a Form as was agreeable to the Motion of the Sun.

Solon travelled.

29. The Work being over, there wanted not those who would both Praise and Discommend it. Some would be amending it by Addition, others by Subtraction or Change, so that plainly seeing what Stir would be about it, he got Leave to travel for ten years; in which time he went into Aegypt, where he conversed with Amesir, and into Lydia, where he had that notable Conference with Cresus before mentioned. But while he was abroad, the City never brake into Factions. There were the Pediaans headed by Lycurgus, the Paralians by Megacles, and the Diacrians by Pisistratus, one who was descended from Codrus the last King. To the latter, a Company of the poorer sort joyned themselves, such as were most inveterate against the Rich, and although they had not much to say against Solon's Laws, yet were they desirous of Innovation, hoping to be Gainers therein. Things were in this Posture when Solon returned home, who being received with much Honour, laboured by his Authority to take off the Ring-leaders of the several Factions, and reconcile them. Pisistratus seemed to give Ear to him, being a man of deep Dissimulation, and so much apter to deceive, in that no man appeared to great a Friend to Equality as he, and therefore a greater Enemy to the Change of the present Government. But Solon quickly found him out; yet prosecuted him not with any open Malice, but sought to draw him from his Designs by fair Means, often professing, that no man was more inclined to Virtue, or to make a good Commonwealths-man, if the Desire of Rule and Sovereignty were but taken from him.

30. For all this, Pisistratus proceeded, and by his seeming Readiness to patronize the poorer Sort against the rich, invaded the Tyranny. He wounded himself and his Chariot-Horses, and drove into the Forum, making Shew of an Pisistratus invades the Tyranny.

Escape from great Danger, and desired of the People that he might have a Guard assigned him to defend his Person. He so far prevailed, as to have fifty Persons allowed him, though Solon stepping to him, told him he did not well to act Ulysses in Homer, (who, as he counterfeited himself wounded to circumvent his Enemies, so did he the same, that he might cheat his Fellow Citizens) and opposed the thing as much as possible. Having obtained the Liberty of so many Followers, he took Leave to increase their Number, and thereby got the Cattle into his Hands, at which the City was much startled. Solon went into the Assembly of the People, where upbraiding them with their former Stupidity, he earnestly exhorted them yet now to pluck up that Tyranny by the Roots, which before they might have so easily prevented; but not at all prevailing, such Consternation had seized upon men's Spirits, he got him to his House, and laying his Weapons before his Court-gate, he had discharged his Duty towards his Country; and thenceforth kept himself quiet, continuing in the City, though his Friends moved him to flee for his Life. But such a Reverence bore Pisistratus not only to his Person, but also to his Laws, that he retained still the most of them in their former Vigour. A few he made himself, as one for Maintenance of Maimed Souldiers (though some attribute this also to Solon, and say, the Occasion was given by one Thespis) and another against Idleness, whereby he caused the Ground to be more diligently tilled, and the City more quiet than usual. By these two he effectually provided for his own Interest, obliging the Souldiers by the one, and by dispersing the People into the Country through the other (under Pretence of preventing Idleness, and keeping up Tillage) cutting off from them all Occasion of plotting any thing prejudicial to him. For he knew well, that as Theseus his gathering them all up into one Town, conduced to the Periwasion of that Liberty he meant to bestow on them, so this contrary way tended as much to the keeping of his arbitrary Power.

Expelled.

31. Being seized of the Sovereignty, he carried it exceeding well to People, Magistrates, and Laws, and much adorned the City, of which he held Possession about three years. Then Megacles and Lycurgus, with their Parties, fo prevailed, as they banished both him and his Tyranny, and being condemned, his Goods were set to Sale, of which none but Callias the Son of Phenippus would adventure to buy any. But not long it was, before those that cast him out, became the Means of his Restitution; for falling out amongst themselves, Megacles, upon Promise that he would marry his Daughter, covenanted to bring it about, and effected it by a strange and ridiculous Wile. There was a Woman in the City named Phya, almost four Cubits tall, but otherwise of tolerable Beauty: her being armed, curiously dressed and seated in a Chariot, they drove into the City, sending some before to proclaim, that the Athenians were to receive Pisistratus, whom their Goddess Minerva esteeming above all Mortals, now in her own Person reduced to her Cattle. This being acted with wonderful Confidence, the Citizens were so far befotened, as to adore this Woman for Minerva, and received Pisistratus as brought by her; whereby he recovered the Tyranny about five years after his Expulsion.

Restored.

Forced out again.

32. He married the Daughter of Megacles, according to Agreement; but having several Sons already in the Flower of their Age; and Megacles being supposed guilty of that heinous Crime about the Death of Cylon, not yet exiated, left he should put them beside their just Expectations, and his Family be attainted, he neglected to use her as his Wife. She concealing this for some time, at length revealed it to her Mother, who told it to Megacles. He took it in great Disdain, and reconciled himself to his Enemies, consulting again how he might out him; which Pisistratus understanding, departed of his own Accord out of Attica, and went to Eretria a City of Euboea in the third year of the 54th Olympiad, about ten years after his Restitution. Ten other years he continued in Exile, at the end whereof, by the Advice of his eldest Son Hippias, he laboured again for a Recovery of his Principality. Scraping together all the Money he could make, he drew the Thebans and Argives into Confederacy with him, and got Marathon a Town of Attica into his hands, whither flocked to him from Athens, and the Country round about, those of his Faction. He marched then against the City, and put such to flight as came out against him, but fearing they might rally again, he gave Order to his Sons to ride after, and bid them fear nothing, so they would but get them to their own Homes, and be quiet. Thus recovered he the Tyranny once more, which he laboured to establish, not by the shedding of Blood (from which he wholly abtained, and therefore hath the best Report of any of his Condition)

but by seeking Confederates, making himself a considerable Revenew, and taking the Sons of those his Enemies, that remained in the City, for Hostages, sending them into the Isle Naxos to be kept. Not long after his Restitution he died (for his whole Reign including the Exile, amounted but to thirty three years) about the time that Cæsus King of Lydia was overthrown by Cyrus, in the second Year of the fifty seventh Olympiad, and the 3460th Year of the World.

33. This only could be reprehended in Pisistratus, that he had cast the Yoke upon his Country. For such an one it was as had no great Weight in it, more than what lay in the Minds of the Athenians, not accustomed since the days of Theseus, to stoop to Sovereignty. Though he commanded them to apply themselves to Husbandry (contrary to what Theseus had done, who gathered them out of the Country into the City) that he might take them off from plotting against him, yet required he no other Tribute than the Tenth of their Profit, which had wont to be payed to the former Kings. He killed no man, neither banished any; he made Spoil of no mans Fortune or Estate, injured none by any contumelious Demeanour, abused neither the one Sex nor the other through any libidinous Carriage. The Laws of Solon with the Order of Magistrates he left as he found; and though he had most Cause to be averse to him, yet detained he him in Town when he would have been gone, desiring his Council and Advice for the better Government of the Commonwealth, contenting himself only in having a Power greater than the Laws, in which Respect Cicero was wont to call Julius Cæsar, who trode in his Steps, by the Name of Pisistratus. He was as Learned as any in his Time, and deferred very well of Learning, being the first that erected a publick Library. Whereas Homer's Verses before this were scattered abroad and confus'd, he purchas'd with Gold whatsoever of his Works he could come by, and setting on Work the ablest Grammarians, put them into that Order of Iliads and Odysseys, in which they are now found; to which work Solon is said to have contributed his Diligence. He had two Sons, Hippias and Hippiarchus, to whom he left the Principality of Athen. They for many Years reigned, as lovingly betwixt themselves, so with Moderation towards their Subjects, till the younger being slain by Harmodius and Aristogiton, upon Occasion of some Injury suppos'd to be offer'd by him to the Sister of Harmodius, the other exasperated heretofore grew severe towards the Athenians, and for that was expelled by them four years after his Brothers Death, and his Tyranny was utterly subverted. But these things falling in with the Reign of Darius, the Son of Hystaspes, belong properly to another Place.

The most antient Kingdom and Commonwealth of Lacedæmon.

The first inhabitants of Lacedæmon.

Sparta, whence it is called.

Tyndareus.

Menelaus.

1. This Country was most antiently inhabited by a people called (a) Leleges, so named from Lelex their King, said to be an Indigena, or a natural of the place, because it was uncertain from what Country he and his people came. From him this Region was called Lelegia, and Lelegis. He left two sons, Myler and Polycæon, whereof the former succeeded him in his Kingdom, and the latter marrying Mesene, the daughter of Triopas King of Argos, went and subdued that Country, which from her he named Mesenia. Myler was succeeded by his son Eurotas, who perceiving the water to stand in the grounds, drew a Ditch from it to the Sea, which draining the earth, continued to be a River, bearing his name. He, dying without issue-Male, left his Kingdom to Lacedæmon, the son of Jupiter and Taygeta, from which woman the Mount Taygetus took its name. For Lacedæmon married Sparta, the daughter of Eurotas, and when he came first to the Kingdom, named the Country from himself, and to the City which he built gave his wife's name; it being ever after most properly called Sparta, when any distinction was made betwixt Country and City; although it be also sometimes read Lacedæmon, as in (b) Thucydides, and Latine (c) Authors. As for the Inhabitants of both places, those of the City are by Herodotus, Xenophon and Diodorus called Spartians, in opposition to those that lived up and down in the Country, comprehended under the name of Lacedæmonians. The City was built in the days of Crotaphus, King of Argos, and Amphitryon of Athens, 303 years before the destruction of Troy, 711 before the first Olympiad, A. M. 2518.

2. Agelaus the son and successor of Lacedæmon (d) begat three sons, which are recorded, Argalus, Cynortas, and Hyacinthus: of which the latter, as Apollodorus writeth, being for his beauty the delight of Apollo, was killed by him at unawares, when they were at play. Argalus succeeded his Father, and left his Kingdom to his brother Cynortas, whose son and Successor was Oebalus, from whom the Country was also called * Oebalia, and thence Castor and Pollux, by Statius, Oebalide fratres. On his first Wife he begat Hippocoon, and Icarion, and on his second Gorgophone (the Daughter of Perseus by Andromeda, and Widow of Perieres) his Son Tyndareus. The former and latter, after his death, contented about the succession, and Tyndareus having the worst of it, was constrained to banish himself for many years, till at length he was restored by Hercules, (who slew Hippocoon and his ten Sons, with a great number of the Spartians; ) but on this condition delivered was the Kingdom to him, to keep it for Hercules his own Children, and restore it when it should be demanded. Tyndareus of Leda, the Daughter of Thetis an Ætolian, begat Castor and Pollux, (called Dioscuri, as the supposed off-spring of Jupiter) and on her, or some other, a Daughter named Helena. The two Sons being famous in their lives, grew more renowned after their death, having the esteem of Gods, and from them was named the Constellation of Gemini. Helena was the that made such a broil in the World, being first stoln by Theseus, afterwards married to Menelaus, and from him stoln again by Paris, who kept her till the destruction of Troy, as hath been shown. Her two Brothers dying before their Father, Menelaus with her obtained the Kingdom of Lacedæmon, through the special favour of Tyndareus, who, from amongst 29 Suitors, (all Princes of Greece) made choice of him. Left those great ones should fall out amongst themselves, he bound them all with an Oath to be Defendants to whomsoever he would give her; which he did by the advice of Ulysses, upon promise to assist him in his suit, being one of the number. This we do not find that he did; but in way of requital procured for him Penelope, the Daughter of Icarion.

3. Menelaus on a law begot two base Sons: but by Helena had onely a Daughter named Hermione, which he married first to Orestes, the Son of his Brother Agamemnon, and again taking her from him, gave her to Pyrrhus the Son of Achilles. It's thought that Orestes killed Pyrrhus; for after his death he presently resumed his Wife, and Menelaus once dead, he added the Kingdom of Lacedæmon to his other two of Mycene and Argos; for the Lacedæmonians were more willing to receive him as their Prince, than Nicostratus and Megapenthes the bastard Sons of Menelaus. Tisamenus his Son succeeded him in his Kingdoms, out of all which he was outed by the Heraclide, or posterity of Hercules, as before was shewed, by the help of the Dores; with him the Acheans being also banished, who were Originally of Phthiotis in Thessaly; for Acheus their Progenitor was the Son of Xuthus, Grand-son to Deucalion by his Son Hellen. Argos fell to Temenus by lot; Cressphantes got Messene; and Lacedæmon became the portion of Procles and Eurysthenes the Sons of Aristodemus, who was slain at Delphos (for Pausanias judgeth this the most probable opinion) by the fraud of Pylas, when they were preparing for the Expedition. Thenceforth the Lacedæmonians were accounted Dores; who if formerly they were part of the Acheans, and going to Troy, at their return were expelled by those that remained at home, and so forced to seek out new fates, and received the name of Dores from their Captain, as Plato writeth; then had they full as much right to the Country as the Heraclide themselves, the title of whom we have formerly shewn. This change happened 80 years after the destruction of Troy, as Thucydides gathereth; 327 before the first Olympiad, in the days of Melantheus, Father to Codrus the last King of Athens, in the year of the World 2901.

Both Kings with equal power.

4. The two Brothers Eurysthenes and Procles were Twins, and that so like, as their Mother, not knowing them asunder, was ignorant which was the eldest, and therefore the Lacedæmonians made them both Kings with equal power: only because Eurysthenes was first walked and fed, he was vulgarly accounted the elder; and though their Families were of the same dignity, yet was his accounted something the more honourable. In their minority Theras their Uncle by the Mother's side managed the Kingdom for them, in obeying whom they ever agreed; but in nothing else, though Twins, and so like one another. This difference was in a manner propagated to their posterity, which continued on both sides for many Generations downwards by the names of Eurysithide and Proclide; and being partakers in what is commonly accounted to bear no corivals, no wonder it is that Emulation should be continued, but much that for so long it kept within the bounds of civil concord. After these two followed their two Sons: Agis for Eurysithes, (from whom the Kings of this family were also called Agide) and Sois for Procles. In their time it happened that the Inhabitants of Helos (a Town built by Helius the youngest Son of Perseus) were made Slaves (both they and their posterity) to the Lacedæmonian State: for whereas they as well as others had formerly the freedom of the City, and were Members of the Commonwealth, Agis took away that privilege, and ordered them to pay Tribute to Sparta, which refusing to do, and standing out, they were thus punished; all other Slaves to that State, though of what Original forever, being called after them Helote. Agis dying, was succeeded by Echestratus his Son; and Sois some years after left for his Successor his Son Eurytion, (called otherwise Eurypion, and Euryphon) from whom the Kings of that family were also named Eurytionide. Echestratus was followed by Labotas his Son, and Eurytion by Prytanis, in whose reign the first quarrel arose betwixt the Lacedæmonians and Argives. Labotas being dead, Doryssus his Son succeeded him in the Kingdom; and in like manner after the death of Prytanis, Eumomus his Son continued the succession of that family.

Lycorgus.

5. After Doryssus followed Agelæus, Eumomus of the family of Procles still continuing, who of a former Wife begat Polydectes, and of a later Lycorgus, born 150 years before the first Olympiad. Archelæus the Son of Agelæus succeeded his Father, and was accompanied in the Government by Polydectes, who dying without issue left his inheritance to Lycorgus his Brother. Lycorgus then governed as King, but not long after his Brother's Wife proved to be with Child. She sent to acquaint him therewith, and to tell him, that if he would marry her she would make away the Infant. He detesting from his heart such Villany, yet returned her no denial, but desired her not to practise any thing upon her self whereby she might come in danger, for when the Child was once born he would take care for the destruction of it: and by this deceit he drew her on till the time of her Travel. When that came he sent some to observe her, with command, if it were a Girl, to deliver it to the Women, but if a Boy, to bring it straight unto him. As he was supping with the Magistrates, a Boy was born and brought to him, who taking him in his Arms, told the Spartans that there was their King, and presently put him in the Royal seat. And because all men wonderfully rejoiced at so strange a thing, admiring his Magnanimity and Justice, he gave to the Child the name of Charilæus.

6. Then as Tutor to this his young Nephew, he managed publick affairs for some eight moneths; but there wanted not those of the Queen's kindred (especially her her Brother) who reproached him to his face, as intending no good to the Child, which the also now stuck not to lay, incensed by his repulse in the matter of Marriage. He took this in very ill part, and fearing that some inconvenience might follow these suspicions that were begotten by his Adversaries in the breaths of several perfors, resolved to cut them off by Travel, wherein he purposed to continue so long, till his Brother's Son should come to maturity, and had begotten an Heir for his Kingdom. He went first into Crete, where he made Observations of the Laws and Customs of that Commonwealth instituted by Minos, (which afterwards he made his Pattern) and whence he sent Thaletas, an eminent Lyrick Poet of those times, by his charming Verses to stir up the Lacedæmonians to Love and Unity. From Crete he passed over into Africa, (that he might compare the Luxury thereof with the Cretian Severity, and as good Physick make up a temper out of both) where he found Homer's Verses, kept as it seemeth by the Sons of Creophylus, (the Poet being dead not above thirty years before) which he then copied out, and bringing them home, first made them publick in Greece, though in great disorder; in which they continued till the days of Pisistratus. The Egyptians reported that he came down into their Country, and there learnt the distinction of Military men from Artificers, and those of other Callings. But whilst he thus improved himself abroad, he was much wanted at home, and often earnestly solicited to return by all parties.

7. For great need there was of his Preference to heal the Distempers into which the State was now fallen, the heady Multitude having by its desire of loose liberty brought all things into confusion. The first Government, till the coming in of the Heraclide, for any thing that can be known, was merely absolute; and afterwards we do not find that the Regal power was diminished till Eurypion, or Eurytion, most imprudently let loose the reins of Government. This gave occasion to the Rabble to fly high in disobedience, and content with his Successors when they endeavoured the recovery of their old Authority. Many great tumults and seditions were hence raised, inasmuch that Eumomus, the Grand-son of Eurypion, Father of Lycorgus, and fifth from Procles, was murdered in one of them with a Butcher's knife. These Distempers increasing, and the Kings not being strong enough to rule the dissolute Rabble, nothing but absolute ruin and destruction was expected, when Lycorgus returning home (of whose prudence and integrity they had had formerly large demonstrations) alone seemed able to give any hope of better things.

At his return he new modelled the State.

8. He thought this opportunity was not to be neglected, now that all were in so good a mind, and resolved to use his utmost endeavour for an alteration. This was the scope he aimed at, to make provision for Equality, which he thought to be the best Nurse of Concord, and the Bulwark of all Societies; to accustom the People from their tender years to obey the Laws and Magistrates, and hereby to render them more inclinable to live justly and frugally, to bridle all corrupt affections, endure labour and hardship, refuse no danger for the public good, nor Death it self if the case required. Having therefore a design to make a full evacuation of all bad humours, as he accounted them, and knowing how full of difficulty and danger this might prove to the Body pollicke, the minds of men much loathing so violent a Purgation, he considered that they were apt to be led by a shew of Religion; and having learn'd how Minos pretended to have received his Laws from Jupiter, with whom he conversed in a Cave, he resolved to go to Delphos, and make use of that Oracle to the same advantage. There was he received with encouraging words, saluted, Beloved of the gods, a God rather than a Man, and received in an Oracle the frame of a Commonwealth, which bringing home, he called Rhetra, to gain the more Authority to it. At his return he first consulted with his intimate Friends, and drew others on by degrees, till having made a Party, he ordered thirty principal persons to go armed into the Market-place betimes in the morning, that they might thereby strike a terror into their Adversaries. Charilæus at this much affrighted, as thinking it some Plot against himself, fled to Chalcidæum, (the Temple of Minerva much spoken of) where he took Sanctuary; but understanding how things were, came forth and joyned himself to his Uncle, being of a most sweet and mild disposition.

A.M. 3122.

9. The Rhetra according to which he framed his Model was of this tenour. Let him build a Temple of Jupiter Syllanius and Minerva Syllania; let him divide the People into Phylæ and Obæ, ordain thirty Senators, with the Archgetæ: then let him call together the People betwixt Babyces and Cnacion, so let him propose concerning matters, or null them. Gamadan, Gorian, &c. In these words of the Oracle, faith Plutarch, Obe, and Phyle (that is, Tribes) signifie certain parts, into which the People was to be divided: the Kings are called Archagetæ, as Captains: and to assemble the People, is in Greek, expressed by apollazein, for that he attributed the beginning and cause of the Commonwealth to Apollo Pythius. Babyas and Cnacion is at this day called OEnnus. Aristotle writeth, that Cnacion is the name of the River, and Babyas of the Bridge. In the middle betwixt these the Concio was assembled, though there was neither Gallery nor any other accommodation; because he thought that those things conduced nothing to Council, but rather hindered; for that Statues, Pictures, the Attiring-rooms of Theatres, and Withdrawing-rooms of the Court, being too curiously adorned, made those that met light and vain, diverting them with toys and idle thoughts. The Multitude being assembled into one place, power was not granted to any of the People to propose: they could onely enact what the Senators and Kings had propounded. But in after-times, the common People perverting and wresting their Suffrages, Polydorus and Theopompus, then Kings, added this to the Rhetra: But if the People resolve upon any bad thing, let it be lawfull for the Senators and Kings to dissent; that is, faith Plutarch, let them not ratifie it, but forthwith dismiss the Assembly; seeing the People depraveth the Decree, and altereth what is best. As for Gamadan and Gorian, Plutarch doth not interpret them, and it cannot be understood what they mean. Another Rhetra was this; That they should use no written Laws. Another, concerning Expenses, commanded, That the roof of every house should be made with an Axe onely, and the doors with a Saw. And a Third ordained, That War should not be often made upon the same Enemies; left, learning to defend themselves, they should thereby be made warlike: which afterwards was laid to the charge of Agellus in behalf of the Thebans.

10. Having prepared all things for his purpose, he dissolved the Government of his Forefathers. For though he left two Kings as he found, with the same Right of Succession, yet took he away almost their whole Power, instituting a Senate to restrain them, and be an equal poize betwixt them and the People, to reduce both Parties into order. Without the Authority of this Senate the Kings could not decree nor undertake any thing of consequence. He ordered they should sit in the chieftest places as Members of the Senate, first speak their minds and give their Suffrages; but conclude nothing without consent of the major part. All Magistrates, till the impudent Ephori took so much upon themselves, rose up to, and did them reverence. Their employment was to take care of Sacrifices, to command the Pythii, whereof two constantly attended them, to be sent to consult the Oracle of Apollo Pythius at Delphos: they took care of Embassadors and other Strangers, of the causes of Women that were Heirs; Adoptions also they had charge of, so as none could be made without them. They gave answer to Embassadors, and looked to the Repairing of High-ways. This was their condition at home, which amounting to no more than titular Royalty, after that the present Kings had either given away their just Right, (as Plutarch telleth us, that Charilaus joynd with his Uncle) or were deprived of it by the Treason and Violence of Lycurgus and his Party; the attempt of some men is as ridiculous as seditious, who taking it for granted that the popular Villains, the Ephori, were 130 years after this set up by the People to restrain the Kings, (which yet cannot be granted, though most have so thought) thence would draw a Precedent to the disadvantage of true Royal Majesty. For these Kings were not real Kings as to Prerogatives of Majesty, being scarcely so much as a Duke of Venice.

11. Abroad they were the Generals of Armies, which were left to their ordering or disposal; so as no Council of War, or any in Commission could thwart their Commands; they onely receiving Orders from the State for their expeditions and returns. They had Judges to accompany them, a General of the Horse, four Polemarchi, besides Colonels, and other inferior Officers, whose advice, as well as help, in the War they might use, but were at their own disposal, and obnoxious to none of them. And what is here spoken of a King, is to be extended to his Protector, Guardian, or Tutor in his minority, by the Lacedæmonians called Prodicus. Such were chosen to this trust and charge as were nearest of kin by the Father's side to the Orphans, and consequently the next Heirs, that whole was the hope, his also might be the burthen. This appeareth by several examples of Lycurgus himself, Ariflodemus, and Panfanias, to be related in their due places. Which though it be not admitted in other Commonwealths, and perhaps with good reason, yet these Prodicus having all in their power, scarcely ever any of them was found to have plaid false, or, by treachery towards their Pupils, gone about to make way for their own preferment.

The Senate.

12. The Senate consisted of 28 persons, besides the Kings, not under 60 years of age. The first were such as had assisted Lycurgus, and been helpful to him in the Settlement, whom he ordered to continue for Life, except they committed any Offence worthy of seclusion; conceiving it not safe for this his Commonwealth, to have a frequent change of Senators, which the Kings might improve to their own interest. Into this second rank of dignity were none to be admitted, but such as had well deserved of the State by good service or eminent virtue; that so it might be a reward to old men, and an encouragement to the younger sort to be conformable to the Laws. They had in effect the whole executive power in their hands. They had the supreme power of Judicature, wherein they proceeded not rashly, but with great advice and delay, deferring Judgement most commonly for some days, till they had heard both parties, and received the testimonies of witnesses: yet it was lawfull afterwards to appeal from them to the People. They were not liable to be called to an account for whatsoever they did: which immunity, as exceeding the moderation of a Commonwealth, (together with their suing to the People for their Places, whereas able and honest men should be fought for,) amongst other things is taxed by Aristotle.

13. A Reverend and Learned man observeth, that whatever the Kings lost, the People got little by the alteration, being left out of all employment in affairs of State, and forced to yield obedience unto Thirty Masters, whereas before they had but Two. For the Kings and Senate assembled, and dismissed them when they pleased, and propounded to them what they thought convenient. For the People so assembled it was not lawfull to propound any thing to be debated or determined, nor to deliver their opinion in the Point propounded: there being nothing left to them, but to testify their assent to the Propositions made either by the Kings or Senate. But the cunning flattery of the Ephori in after-times much enlarged the power of the People. By the appointment of Lycurgus it met at the River Cnacion (afterwards called OEnnus): by the Bridge Babyas. Sometimes onely the Spartans, or Inhabitants of the City, met together, and then it was called the Lesser Assembly; but otherwhiles the whole Body of the Lacedæmonians gathered together out of all Laconia, that was free of the Commonwealth, which went by the name of the Greater Meeting or Assembly, called then simply * Ecclesia.

14. Having reduced the Government to this Antimonarchical pass, he rightly judged it could not subsist without levelling. He therefore attempted a thing most difficult, and even beyond all hope of attaining. Many that had got much wealth in the late turbulent times, he persuaded to part with most of it, and to an equal division of the grounds, urging, that no Inequality was to be amongst them, but what Vice and Virtue made; and what by arguments drawn from convenience, as others from necessity that lay upon them from the indigent and displeased Multitude, he brought his Design to perfection. Then divided he the grounds into 30000 Lots, or equal Portions, whereof 9000 he laid to the City of Sparta it self, (the number of Citizens amounting to so many,) and distributed the rest to the other Lacedæmonians inhabiting the Countrey. Each Portion contained so much as to maintain a family in a frugal way, and no more. To the Kings a larger quantity was assigned for the maintenance of their Degree, so much as might serve with moderation, and not make them abound in Riches.

15. That he might take away Covetousness, and the desire of hoarding up wealth, he forbade the use of Silver and Gold Coin, putting in the room thereof Iron money, of which a great quantity amounting but to a little value, no considerable payment could be made without the help of an Horse or Waggon. Hereby it came to pass that they were unfit to Traffick with other people, no Merchandize being imported, which he herein aimed at, as well as by another Law made expressly against the continuance of Strangers in the City; fearing more the Contagion of the mind in his People than that of the body. And otherways to prevent Luxury, he forbade that any man should eat at home by himself, or with his family, or to make any private Feasts, without some special occasion; but ordered them to sup together in common, without any distinction of Dignity or Fortune, by fifteen together. Each one sent in his Provision monthly; as Meat, Wine, Cheese, and Figs, with a little money to buy other Victuals. If any had killed Venison, or offered Sacrifice, whereby any Flesh was gotten, the ancient men left that to the younger sort, and contented themselves with Broaths, of which a black sort was most used, of no pleasant taste to such as were not accustomed to eat it. As for Fish, and all kind of delicate Cates, they were utterly forbidden. None were to eat or drink beyond such a proportion as sufficed Nature: the Kings indeed were allowed a double Measure, but this was, that they might have opportunity to pleasure and countenance others with part of it. All came to these public Meetings (which first were called Andria, after the name of those of the Cretians, from whom Lycurgus borrowed this Constitution, afterwards Phyditia and Syllitia) with their Arms, and after Supper were to go home without Torch or Candle, though never so dark, that they might learn, if need should be, to make the same light when they lay abroad in the field. All stately Buildings he forbid, and all Trades that tended any way to the maintenance of Luxury or Excess.

The Education of Boys.

16. But to have these Customs durable, it being highly necessary to breed up the youth in suitable Discipline, he also provided for that in ample manner. The first thing previous to education was very unnatural and cruel; for the Infant, as soon as born, was carried to the most ancient of that Tribe to be viewed; and if it was found any way deformed, weak, or sickly, whereby might be judged that it would rather prove burthenfome than beneficial to the Commonwealth, then was it to be expoled upon the craggy places of the Hill Taygetus, there to take such quarter as wild beasts, fowls, hunger and cold would afford it. But if it seemed strong, lusty, and worthy to live, then was it restored to its Parents to be nursed. And nursed it was very harshly, not used to any delicate or costly feeding, and so used to darkness and solitariness as not to be affrighted at them. When the Children were seven years old, they were not committed to any mercenary School-masters, after the custom of other people, but to the care of the Publick, being distributed into several Companies, over which some that were most fierce, hardy and prudent amongst them were set as Captains, who governed them in their sports and exercises, and to whose correction they submitted. There were also most commonly some men present at their exercises, who would rebuke and chastise them, observing which had the most notable spirits; Lycurgus leaving it in charge to the Lacedæmonians, to take care of other mens Children as of their own. All manner of ways were they inured to labour and pains. Their Hair was cut close to their heads, they went bare-footed from their Infancy, fought with one another naked with as much earnestness as might be, and after a certain barbarous and cruel manner were once a year whipped at the Altar of Diana Tauica, (to which goddess sacrifice could not be offered without man's blood) till the blood ran down in great abundance, their Parents beholding the sight. They would bear it with admirable patience and emulation, cheerfully (nay, many times, with great delight, which they took in excelling one another in patience) enduring the froaks unto Death it self.

Platarch, in

17. When they were past their Childhood, at twelve years of age, their labours and exercises were both increased, left vice together with years should grow upon them. They were to be content with one Coat both Winter and Summer, and slept by Companies together upon coarse and uneasy Beds. The ancient men also overfaw them upon occasion, but the Charge was committed to one of the principal, called thence Pædonomus, who had power to gather them together and correct them. Over several Companies certain young men of twenty years of age, called Irens, were set, who, if no man was present, had command over them, exercised them in watches, lying in ambush, and other crafts of War, wherein if any were caught, they were severely punished, to make them the more wary for the future; as also if they were taken in Theft, Stealing with them being lawful, and encouraged as an exercise for War, but to be surprized therein was punishable. The same Irens supping with them would make some sing, and others propose questions, in answering which they exercised their wits, accustoming them to make a short, clear and witty answer, in the dexterity whereof the Lacedæmonians excelled all others: Oratours with their long-winded speeches being utterly forbidden. When the Iren corrected them, there were men standing by to take notice of it; and if it was not rightly done, nor upon good grounds, he had the same punishment inflicted on him. Those Boys performed several sorts of exercises; but amongst the rest, those called Platanista (from the place thick set with Plane-trees) were most eminent, in which with hands and feet, teeth and nails, they fought in good earnest, to the putting out of eyes, and sometimes to the danger of Life it self, none giving over, or shrinking one jot, than which no disgrace was esteemed more hateful.

Lædonomus.

Such strict and constant discipline under-went they all their minority, till they arrived at 30 years of age, (before which time they married not, went not out to War, neither exercised any Office) so that the greatest trouble in the Field afterwards seemed much more easy to be undergone.

of Virgins.

18. The Education also of young Women was agreeable to this of the other Sex, that by Vigilancy, Industry, and enduring Labour, they might be furnished with Courage and Resolution against all evils, being married with more ease undergo the pains of Travel, and bring forth Children of the same constitution. According to their age they had Exercises of sundry sorts; most of which they performed in publick, naked, and that not only in the sight of Kings and Senate, but the young men also; which yet because of the Lacedæmonian modesty and temperance, with the custom of it, was not judged at all to contribute to Vice, but rather to an innocent and harmless emulation, and honest love. Their diet was such as might nourish them, and not any ill disposition in them. Such were their Cloaths, and all things else about them, as long as Lycurgus his Constitutions were in force; and therefore the too great power of the Women, their Luxury, and the many great inconveniences that thence arose to the State, objected so much by Aristotle, is to be ascribed to the married sort; and probable it is that this corruption crept in in after-times, it being well nigh as easie for him to reform the Women as to make this great alteration in the Commonwealth, though the contrary be asserted by the Philosopher, who as it seemeth was much satisfied in the wilfulness of that Sex. The set time for Marriage of Men was at 30, for Women at 20 years, before which it was unlawful; but if a man within some reasonable time after betook him not to that estate, he was publicly disgraced by command of the Law-giver. Women had no Portions; yet the Heirs carried with them their Father's Inheritance. No plurality of Wives did he allow; and yet as for Adultery it was not heard of in that City, against which neither did he make any Law, having already provided sufficiently against it by such strict Constitutions.

Travel forbidden.

19. As he provided against the flocking of Strangers to Sparta, so forbid he any Citizen or Member of the Commonwealth to Travel, (except in any expedition of War) lest he should bring home with him the dissolute and effeminate Customs of other places. Merchandizing was esteemed a base employment, as merely practised for getting of Wealth. Drunkenness they rendered more abominable to Children by making their Slaves drunk, that then they might behold them in that beastly condition. He that had been so unthrifty as not to be able to bear the charge of the Phiditia was excluded from all trust in the Commonwealth. To keep them vigilant, he commanded that the City should not be walled, they having sufficient leisure to look carefully to it; this being even their whole calling, with their heads and hands to attend publick affairs; the drudgery of Tilling their Grounds, and gathering their Fruits, being imposed upon the Helotes, or publick Slaves, with other servile and mechanic affairs. Those Slaves it was not lawful for any one privately to manumit, or sell out of Lacedæmonia; whereby increasing to so great a number, that they equalized, or exceeded that of their Masters, they sometimes afforded occasion of great dangers; upon which account this Constitution is taxed by the Philosopher. For the lessening of their numbers a course was taken not altogether clear from a note of cruelty, Certain young men being sent about into the Country, who lying hid in the day-time, (whence this practice was called Cryptia) by night killed as many of them as they could light on.

The Cryptia.

20. Such was the form of the Commonwealth instituted by Lycurgus, which saved him the labour of erecting any other Courts of Justice then what have been already mentioned. For Gold and Silver being taken away, and the use thereof forbidden upon pain of death, Controversies and Suits most commonly then arising naturally fell of themselves. He forbid his Laws to be written in Tables, because he would have them rooted in the Minds of the people, to which he thought the strict Discipline he erected might sufficiently conduce. After the thing was done, as it hath happened usually in this kind, he was but ill rewarded; for such as had parted with their Silver, Gold, or Luxury, were so enraged as to throw stones at him, which to shun he was glad to betake himself to his heels, and looking back had an Eye struck out by one Arander, who yet afterwards repented him of the deed, and was very observant of him. One telleth us he was cait out by publick rage; but * he who hath handled the subject of his Life with greatest industry, hath recorded, that when things began to be settled, and he saw the Commonwealth thus constituted able to support it self, he calling the People together, told them, that indeed all things were so already settled as to provide for vertue and happineſs, but one thing, and that of greateſt conſequence, was yet behind, which was not to be enacted before firſt he had conſulted the Oracle at Delphos. Therefore he deſired them to keep the Laws already made, and change nothing in them till his return with the Kings, Senate, and People, and began his Journey. At Delphos he enquired whether the Laws already made, and eſtabliſhed, were not ſufficient for the vertue and ſafety of the State. It was answered they were, and that it ſhould continue moſt glorious ſo long as it would ſtand to them. This Answer then he ſent to Sparta; but, reſolving never to looſe them from their Oath, he there made an end of himſelf by abſtaining from all ſiſtenance. Some have ſaid that he died in Crete, and that he ordered his Body to be burnt, and his aſhes thrown into the Sea, left his Reliques being brought back to Sparta, they ſhould account themſelves freed from the Oath. But * Tertullian writeth, that he famiſhed himſelf, becauſe the Lacedæmonians went about to alter his Laws.

His Death.

The War with the Argives.

The firſt Olympiad.

The renewing of the Olympic Games.

21. Lycurgus being dead, and the State ſettled, after this great change, it renewed the War formerly begun with the Argives; and afterwards deluded by the ambiguity of the Oracle, commenced another againſt the Tegæſe, a people of Arcadia, by whom they were worſted, and Charilaus the King was taken Priſoner, through the ſpecial valour of the Women: yet was he preſently ſet at liberty, upon his Oath never to fight more againſt them, which he ill performed. After this they overthrew divers Cities, on which the Acheans had ſeized, ſome whereof made their peace, as Panſanias telleth us, and departed out of Peloponneſus. The Colleague of Charilaus (or Charillus) for ſome time was Teſteſus, whoſe death gave one occaſion to the famous Meſſenian War. Charilaus was ſucceeded by Nicander his Son, and Teſteſus by Alcamenes. In * the 34th year of Nicander, was celebrated the firſt Olympiad, after the Reſtitution of thoſe Games by Iphitus, in which Coræbus a Cook of Elis got the Prize in the Courſe. Theſe Solemnities being of fo great conſequence to the knowledge of times, muſt not be paſſed over without ſome obſervation.

22. Theſe Exercices had in former times been held by divers others, as Hercules, (both the Idean and the Son of Amphiryon, as ſome think) Perſes, Endymion, Nelus, Pelias, Lycurgus, and others. After the deſcent of the Heracleide into Peloponneſus, Oxylus the Pelotian alſo (who, as we ſaid, was choſen their Guide, and according to agreement had the Countrey of Elis given to him) renewed the Games: but they were interrupted as formerly, or ſeldom obſerved, for about 300 years, till Iphitus the Son of Praxonidas, and Nephew of Hemon, deſcended from him, and one of his Succeſſors, again reſtored them; after which they never intermitted, but were kept up for many generations. But the occaſion of the laſt reſtitution was this. Greece being almoſt ruined by Seditions and Peſtilence, Iphitus inquired of the Oracle at Delphos, how thoſe evils might be redreſſed: and it was answered, that it was expedient for him and the Eleans to reſtore the Olympick Games; whereupon he proclaimed them, and for the better celebration of them, procured a Truce to be made. The place whence they had their name was Olympia, a City ſituated in the territories of the Piſæans, upon the River Alpheus, upon which account the Piſæans contended a long time with the Eleans about their intereſt in them. There was a Temple dedicated to Jupiter Olympius, and a place for Races and all ſorts of Exercices, filled with many goodly buildings, which reſembled another City. Near to the Town was alſo a place where the Eleans ſate and judged of the Controverſies ariſing about Victories, to which Crowns or Garlands were given. As long as the Eleans continued under a Monarchical Government, their Prince, of the poſterity of Oxylus, was ſole Judge; but afterwards there were Two, choſen by the Votes of the People, which where after increaſed to the number of Nine, then to Ten, and laſt of all to Twelve. This ſolemnity was held once every fifth year beginning, ſo that from the commencing of one to the beginning of another, paſſed four entire years, by ſome miſtaken for five, becauſe of the commencement of the Games. The time was at the full of the Moon, the change whereof immediately preceded the Summer Solſtice, in the Month by them called Hecatombæon.

23. Upon this occaſion meetings and conſultations were had concerning the affairs of all Greece, beſides the Inhabitants of which, many flockd from other Countries. Care was here taken concerning the form of the year, for the intercalation of a day at the end of every fourth. Change was given to the Priests of the Temple, to take notice of every new Moon, eſpecially of that wherewith the Moneth Hecatombæon began, and to proclaim it: they were alſo not only to reſtore the names of the Pictors in the ſeveral ſorts of Games, with other things that concerned them, but alſo whatever memorable thing occurred in the intervals. The account of years henceforth never failed, and the affairs of Greece, and other Countries, were known in a moſt certain order. And here the ſecond interval of time, amongſt three reckoned by * Varræ, received its period. The firſt began with the beginning of things, and ended at the Deluge, called by him Unknown: the ſecond began where the firſt ended, and concluded with this reſtitution of the Olympiads; which he termed Fabulous, becauſe the Story thereof is mixed with Fables: and the third, commencing with the firſt Olympiad, reached to his own time, which he named Hiſtoricall, for that things done therein were truly and clearly related. This happened 408 years after the deſtruction of Troy, 774 before the Æra of Chriſt, A. M. 3229.

The bringing in of the Ephori into Sparta.

24. Towards the latter end of the ſeventh Olympiad, a great change was made in the Government of Lacedæmon, by the bringing in of the Ephori, who, according to Plutarch, had their beginning 130 years after Lycurgus. It ſeemeth that for all the means uſed by him to gain an Equality, and clip the power of the Great ones, yet it again grew extravagant within this time, ſo that the People, to provide againſt that of the Kings and Senate for the future, got theſe Officers created. Five they were in number, (whereof one Blatus was the firſt) choſen every year by and out of the People, without any diſtinction of birth or wealth; inſomuch, that ſometimes the meanſt ſort of men were elected: which cuſtom is noted as bad by Ariſtotle. But their uſe and end being only to proteſt the Liberty of the people, ſuch, what ever they were, muſt be preferred, as made the greateſt ſhow of love to Freedom, of a ſharp and bold wit, and aſereneſs towards the power of the great ones. Theopompus the Son of Nicander, and Grandſon to Charilaus, was King at this time, who bringing in, or giving way to this Office, hiſ Wife rebuked him for ſo doing, ſaying, that he would leave the Kingdom to his Son of leſs value than he had it of his Father. To which he answered, that on the contrary, he ſhould leave it ſo much the greater, by how much more durable. Indeed hereby it came to paſs, as Plutarch obſerveth, that the Kingly power, being leſs, was not ſubject to that envy which ruined the affairs of the Kings of Meſſene and Argos, who would not moderate their power, nor at all ſtoop to any Popularity; and the Government here being poized, continued longer, as freed from the inſtead diſtempers of the neighbour Commonwealth. Yet it is alſo obſerved by * one, that the reaſon of the proſperity and long duration of the Spartan State, above that of the Athenian and others, is to be fetched from its ſo much partaking of Ariſtocracy, and the want of that influence which the heady Multitude had in to the greateſt affairs elſewhere.

25. The general and moſt probable opinion is, that the Ephori were brought in in the time of Theopompus. So writeth Ariſtotle, Plutarch, and Valerius Maximus. Yet (a) Hærodotus, having reckoned up ſeveral things performed by Lycurgus in the framing of his Commonwealth, at length addeth, Further, Lycurgus ordained the Ephori and Elders: of which opinion Xenophon ſeemeth alſo to have been in his Treatiſe of the Lacedæmonian Commonwealth. But though they were brought in during the reign of Theopompus, yet it is not agreed who was the principal Author of their creation, becauſe the end or deſign thereof is uncertain, though that ere now ſpoken of be generally received. (b) Plato, and Plutarch (as he confeſſeth) from him, will have them created to be as a bridle to the power of the Kings, for theis it muſt needs be, which he calleth Hereditary. Cicero alſo in his third Book of Laws teſtifieth, that the Ephori at Sparta were oppoſed againſt the Kings, as the Roman Tribunes againſt the Conſuls, who as well as the Senate were, even at the firſt inſtitution, feared by the Commons, for that they were the chief Patritian Magiſtrates at that time, and the Animofities in that State were cauſed by the diſtinction of the two Orders. Valerius Maximus maketh the ſame compariſon betwixt the Ephori and Tribunes, and will have them inſtituted by Theopompus for this very end, whom Plato alſo ſeemeth upon the ſame account to call the third Saviour of the Lacedæmonians; ſo that he muſt have been at the laſt inſtrumental in their inſtitution. Ariſtotle (c) accounteth this Magiſtracy as the Nerves of the Commonwealth joyning the parts thereof together; becauſe the People by virtue of it being partaker of Empire, was quiet: ſo that the People ſeemeth eſpecially conſidered in this Office, by which in another place the Philoſopher expreſſly ſaith Theopompus moderated the power of the Kings. But for all this Clemens King of Sparta, as (d) Plutarch himſelf relateth the Story, affirmed in a ſpeech to the people, that Lycurgus having added the Senate to the Kings, the Commonwealth was for a long time governed without any other Magistracy. Afterwards, when the Messinian War was drawn out in length, the Kings, because they were employed abroad, chose some of their friends to administer Justice, whom they left as their Deputies over the people: and those were called Ephori, from their inspection. Being at first no other than Assistants to the Kings, by little and little they assumed power to themselves, and no body aware of it, constituted a peculiar Office. Hereof, he said, a sign remained at that day, for that the King being called by the Ephori, refused to come once, and again; but at the third call came to them: besides, Asteropus, who first enlarged the bounds of this Office, was Ephorus many Ages after.

Their power.

26. The power of those Magistrates, for what end forever constituted, (as of others in other places) was moderate at the first; but in process of time, as the ambition of them, and the confidence of the People thereupon increased, it exceeded the due and just bounds, and made the Government almost degenerate into a Democracy. They not only consulted with the Kings and Senate, resolved about the affairs of State, and judged of Controversies amongst the people; but afterwards grappled even the whole Power into their hands, doing all things themselves that were of moment. They governed the Assemblies of the people, proposing and gathering Suffrages, they made and dissolved Leagues, ordered what Forces were to be sent out, for which they also made provision, they rewarded or punished, according to their pleasure, other Magistrates, calling the very Kings to account for their Lives; insum that, as the Philosopher observeth, they obtained a kind of Tyranny: the only remedy was, that their Office was but annual, and being five in number, the designs and endeavours of one or two were crossed and overthrown by the contrary party, nothing being done without the consent of the whole College. They rose not up, as other Magistrates, in preference of the Kings, with whom they mutually swore every month; the Kings, that they would rule according to the Laws, and they in the name of the people, to preserve their Rule thus ordered, safe and entire to them. With their entering into their Office the year began, (constantly in Winter, as we learn from Theophrastus;) and from one of them, as principal, the year was named, (who thence was called Eponymus;) as from the Archon at Athens. At their first entrance they were wont to publish an Edict, that the men should take off all the Hair from their upper Lips, and observe strictly all the Laws, lest they should be constrained to punish them, requiring obedience in a little, thereby to inure the people to it. In the War two of them used to go out with the Kings, to assist them in their Councils. They were wont to proclaim open war against the publick Slaves or Helots, giving liberty to kill them; and thence is to be derived that cruel custom of the Cryptia, rather than from any Constitution of Lycurgus, as Aristotle thinketh. The cause thereof, as Plutarch judgeth, was the conspiring of these Slaves against their Masters, during the Messinian War.

The Messinian War.

27. In the second year of the ninth Olympiad this War began: though the ground of the quarrel had been partly laid several years before the bringing in of the Ephori. In the days of Telesius Father to Alcamenes now King, there being a Temple of Diana in the borders, to which both the Lacedæmonians and Messinians constantly resorted, it happened that some Spartan Virgins going thither, according to the custom, were abused by the Messinians, and Telesius, endeavouring to prevent the injury, was there slain: moreover, the Virgins for very shame and grief destroyed themselves, as the Lacedæmonians told the Story. On the contrary, the Messinians pleaded, that at this Temple Telesius lay in wait for the principal of their City, by sending thither young men, disguised in the habit of Virgins, with Poniards under their cloaths; that hereupon the Messinians coming in to help their friends, slew Telesius, and the counterfeits, for which at that time the Lacedæmonians found not themselves so much concerned as to stir. However it was, grudges hence arose, or were rather heightened betwixt them; for the Lacedæmonians often complained, that in the division of the Territories obtained by the Heracleide, Eurythene and Procles, their Kings, were cheated by their Uncle Cresphontes of the far better grounds, for which now they envied the Messinians, thinking themselves far worthier of them, as being much more the more considerable people.

28. Animosities being raised upon these accounts, another thing happened which increased them to that height as they brake out into open War. There was one Polycharus, a Messinian, who had got the victory in the Course at the celebration of the fourth Olympiad. He let out some Cows to one Euphæbus a Lacedæmonian, on this condition, condition, to have part of the profit. Euphæbus sold the Cows, and then coming to Polycharus, told him that they and their Keepers were stolen from him. But while he was labouring to gain credit to his tale, some of the Herd-men (who, as it seemeth, with the consent of Euphæbus, were taken away by force) escaped from the Merchants, and acquainted Polycharus with the Fraud; which now the other not able to deny, asked him pardon, told him for how much the Cattel were sold, and promised to send the money, if he would let his Son accompany him to Sparta. He sent his Son accordingly; but when they were come together into Laconia, Euphæbus most perfidiously murdered the young man: with the horridness of which fact Polycharus grievously moved, came several times to Sparta, complaining bitterly, and with many tears, to the Kings and Ephori, but found no Justice; insum that growing into a great rage against all Lacedæmonians in common, he killed them as enemies wheresoever he could meet them.

29. The Lacedæmonians, finding themselves concerned herein, sent to the Messinians, demanding Polycharus. At that time Androcles and Antiochus, the Sons of Phintias, reigning at Messene, promised they would report the matter to the People, and know their minds therein. The Multitude being called together, Androcles was much for the giving up of Polycharus; but, on the contrary, Antiochus urged how unjust and lamentable a thing it would be for him to be tormented before Euphæbus; and the contention grew so hot betwixt the Brothers, that it came to blows. Antiochus his faction prevailing, Androcles with the chief of his party lost their lives. Antiochus then reigning alone wrote to the Spartans, offering to refer the business to the Argives, who were of the same flock with them both; or to the publick Council of the Amphyctiones; or else, if neither of these liked them, to the Senate of Acroagium. They returned no answer by the Messenger, and within a few months Antiochus died, and his Son Euphæbus succeeded him. Neither then did they send any message, nor yet renounced amity with the Messinians, but entering into secret consultations provided for the War, and bound themselves with an Oath never to return home till they had subdued Messenia.

Paus. Polybius lib. 6.

30. Being bound with this Oath, and having all things in a readiness, under the conduct of Alcamenes, the Son of Telesius, they went out by night and fell upon Arphæa, a Town upon the Borders; which by the suddenness of the onset, no Watch being kept, but the Gates standing open, they easily took; and finding it a place for situation, and convenience of water, fit for their purpose, put all to the Sword, intending to use it as a Receptacle, and chief Fortress in the War. After this they made Excursions, and rather practised Robberies than carried on a War, the Messinians declining the Fight through the persuasion of Euphæbus. But after four years, when they were now well exercised, and exceedingly incensed against the Lacedæmonians, he gave them leave to make inroads into Laconia, where they waited all about Taygetus. He then led down his Army into the Borders to fight: which opportunity the Lacedæmonians embraced, and engaged with the Horse, and those Foot that bare the light Armour. But Euphæbus having provided matter for making a Trench, caused the place where his other Souldiers lay to be fortified, (in them consulting his chief strength;) so that, seeing they could not fight with them, and being unprovided to besiege the Camp, they returned home, where they had but cold welcome, because of this Retreat made contrary to their solemn Oath.

31. The year after, for that the elder fort exceedingly upbraided them, they returned into Messenia under conduct of both the Kings, Theopompus, the Son of Nicanor, and Polydorus of Alcamenes now dead. There they were received by the enemy, and entertained in a great and bloody Battel, wherein both Parties with much earnestness and contention demeaned themselves. The Spartans as they surpassed the other in skill, being trained up in Exercises from their Childhood, so exceeded them also in numbers: but desperation and necessity made the Messinians valiant, as they abundantly shewed it, many breaking their Ranks on purpose to come to hand-to-hand with the enemy. In the main Battel the Victory continued doubtful a long time; in the right wing Euphæbus put Theopompus to flight, and in the left Polydorus did as much by the Messinians, and neither Party would give the chase: Euphæbus, for that he thought he had already done enough; and Polydorus, because the Lacedæmonians were deterred from it through their ignorance of the place, being in an enemy's Country: so that fighting on even terms they were parted by the night. The day following neither side would fight, nor had the confidence to erect a Trophee; but made truce so long as to bury their dead.

32. After this Battel none other succeeded for several years. The Messinians, for that their Country was the seat of War, were pressed with many difficulties.

Their

Their Garrisons had cost them so much money, that now they were rendered unable to pay their Army: their Slaves fled daily to the Lacedæmonians, and a certain Disease, not much better than the Plague, seized upon them; which though not exceeding deadly, yet, jointly with the other difficulties, caused great trouble and perturbation. After a serious debate concerning the main of their Affairs, it was resolved, that most of the Towns lying upon the Sea should be dismantled as far remote, and Ithome, a Mountain as large as any within the Isthmus, (whereupon stood a Town more ancient than great) was to be fortified, because of the natural strength thereof. When they had here settled themselves, they sent to Delphos to enquire concerning the event of the War. The Oracle (agreeable to the disposition of the Enemy of mankind) required a Virgin of the stock of Ægyptus to be sacrificed; whereupon all that belonged to that Family were subjected to the lot, and the Daughter of one Lyrciscus was taken. She being to be offered, the Sooth-sayer forbade it, alleging that she was not the Daughter of Lyrciscus, but brought in under-hand by his Wife that was barren: and whilst he was thus persuading the people, Lyrciscus fled away with her to Sparta. All hereat exceedingly startled, Aristodemus, another of that Family, voluntarily offered his own Daughter: but a young man there present that was in love with her, and shortly intended marriage, justly impugned it, and contended she was not in her Father's power, because betrothed to himself. Not herewith prevailing, he affirmed he had lien with her, and that she was with Child. Whereat Aristodemus was so enraged, that he killed her with his own hand, and, ripping up her belly, shewed plainly to all that there was no such matter. Yet the Sooth-sayer avouched her Death could not at all profit the State, and commanded some other to be offered: but Euphaes persuaded the People that the Oracle was already satisfied, and required not the Life of any other.

The Lacedæmonians make War upon the Argives.

33. The rest which the Lacedæmonians had in this interval was presently turned into adion with the Argives about Thyrea, a Town situate in the borders of both Commonwealths. This fell out in the reign of Theopompus, whereat yet he was not present, partly by reason of his old age, and also for grief taken at the death of his son Archidamus. The controversy was brought before the Amphyctiones, who ordered that 300 on each side should decide it. Of the Argives two persons survived the Combat; but of the Spartan party only one, by name Othryades, as good as many, who lived no longer than to make use of broken Spears in stead of Crutches to sustain his body, then to gather together the Targets of the slain, and to erect a Trophæe therewith, whereon he made an inscription with his own blood. Because of this Trophæe the Amphyctiones decreed the Town to the Lacedæmonians; but the Argives, for that two of their party survived, afterwards renewed the War to their own damage.

That with the Messenians renewed.

34. The offering up of Aristodemus his Daughter seemed to the Messenians to have done some good, the affairs of Lacedæmon appearing to be in a declining posture, and that State flower in its Enterprizes than formerly. But in the sixth year after the departure of Lyrciscus, and the eighth from their removal to Ithome, the War was again renewed against them. Another Battel was fought, but with the same success as formerly. In the midst of the Fight was the hottest contest, the most valiant on both sides betaking themselves thither; where Euphaes also, venturing farther than either stood with his dignity or safety, against Theopompus, received many and deadly wounds. Herewith being so weakened that he fell, the Lacedæmonians strove to take him, and a great conflict ensued; but one Avander so far resisting as to lose his own Life in the quarrel, Euphaes was brought off, and died a few days after, having reigned thirteen years, all which time he spent in the War against the Lacedæmonians. He dying Childless, a great controversy arose about the Succession, for that several of the Family of Ægyptus stood for the Kingdom, amongst whom was Aristodemus, who, though it was objected that, having polluted his hands in the Blood of his Daughter, he was not capable, was preferred before all others through the favour of the People. After his Election he sent Presents to the chief of the Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, whom he engaged to his Party. Afflicted by some Arcadians he made incursions, and the Lacedæmonians did the same, proceeding to no greater extremity: but at length, in his fifth year, another Battel was fought near to Ithome, wherein the Messenians were afflicted by the three States now mentioned, and the Spartans by no other Peloponnesians than those of Corinth. The dispute was very sharp, and the event doubtful, till the Messenians, having the upper ground, at last put their enemies to flight, of whom it is credible, as Pausanias only writeth, that many miscarried.

The Partenien.

The second Messenian War.

35. The Lacedæmonians, after this, almost despairing of success, both Parties sent to enquire at Delphos concerning the issue of the War. The Messenians received an answer so ambiguous as could not be interpreted: that to the Spartans plainly signified, that as Cresphontes had obtained Messene by a wife in ordering the Lots, so by wiles it was to be recovered. Several then they invented, but all were discovered, by the vigilancy and cunning of Aristodemus. But the twentieth year of the War approaching, the Affairs of the Messenians began exceedingly to relapse, and the Oracle, again consulted, answered, that whosoever could first dedicate a hundred Trestles (or Three-footed stools) to Jupiter of Ithome should obtain Messene. The Messenians, having the Temple within themselves, doubted not but to be able to do this first: yet the Answer being brought to Lacedæmon, one Oebalus, a crafty man there, made a hundred of Clay, and while the Messenians were busied about others of Wood, (for their purses were not able to reach to Bras) disguised himself in the habit of a Fowler, and carried them into the Temple. This struck the Messenians with great consternation, who were streightly besieged by this time, and hindered from getting in any Provisions. Aristodemus was also tormented with sad Dreams about his Daughter, whereat forcibly moved, and exceedingly afflicted with consideration that he should kill his Child for his Country's good, which notwithstanding was desperate, he slew himself at her Monument.

36. With this sad Accident the Messenians were more grievously struck, and so depaired as to have thoughts of making their applications to the Lacedæmonians; but as yet not able to stoop, they made no Overtures, though almost oppressed with Famine: they chose then Captains in the room of Aristodemus, preparing to fall out, and fight it out to the last man for their lives and fortunes. Yet at length distrustful their ability to doe any thing that way, and considering themselves urged hard with the want of all necessities, they left Ithome, and yielded in the fifth month after the death of Aristodemus, the twenty eighth year of the War being almost finished, in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, the Medontide at Athens yet enjoying the Power for ten years, in the days of Hezekiah King of Judah, and the time of the deportation of the ten Tribes. The Conquerors utterly demolished Ithome, and, having gotten easily the other Towns of Messenia into their power, imposed what Laws they pleased upon the Inhabitants, who were commanded to till their grounds, and send one half of the profits unto Sparta; to bind themselves by Oath, to remain in perpetual Fealty to the Lacedæmonians, and both men and women, when the Kings and Nobles of Sparta died, to attend upon their Funerals in mourning weeds: which things were enjoined them upon pain of Death. As many as would not endure those hard Conditions, and had hope of entertainment with the Arcadians, Argives, and Sicyonians, went thither, and such as were Priests, to Elusine: all the rest of the Multitude departed every one to his own seat: and so the first Messenian War ended.

37. Whilst the Lacedæmonians were abroad, and lay under the obligation of their Oath, never to return till the War should be finished, fearing, either through the suggestion of their Wives, or their own recollection, that their Posterity might fail, they chose out of their lustiest young men fifty in number, who, coming out under age, were not liable to the Oath, and sent them to Sparta, to lie with their Wives and Virgins (or the Virgins only) in a promiscuous manner, whence arose a generation called Partenien, as the Sons of Virgins. But after that the War was finished, and the Spartans returned home, they looked upon them as a spurious brood, and as such contemned them; which these Youths apprehending, and how they could not inherit any thing in the Commonwealth, entered into conspiracy with the Helots, and made one Philanthus their Captain, whose Father Arcasus had given the advice to send the young men to the Virgins. This Plot being revealed by some of the Slaves, they were expelled, and forced to seek out new seats; so that departing into Italy, they drove out the Barbarians and Cretians, who inhabited about Tarentum, and seizing upon that Place, therein planted themselves.

38. The Messenians thus brought under the yoke, endured it, though with much repining, for 29 years; but then, besides their most hard and servile condition, wearied with the infolency of the Spartans, in the fourth year of the 23. Olympiad, a little after the nine Annual Archons were constituted at Athens, in the fourth after the taking of Ithome, they revolted, at the instigation of Aristonomenes especially, a young man of a most active and courageous spirit, who had before-hand solicited for assistance the Arcadians and Argives, now being jealous of the power of the Lacedæmonians, and at open enmity with them. At this time Anaxander, the Nephew of Polydorus by his Son Euryerates, and Anaxidamus the Son of Zonias, Grand-son to Theopompus, by his Son Archidamus, who died ere he came to reign, were Kings at Sparta.

39. Aristomenes managed the whole business for the Messenians, being of extraordinary abilities both of body and mind. He first engaged with the Spartans at Dere, a Village of Messenia, where he is said to have behaved himself above the capacity of a man, and seeing he was of the Family of Pepytus, was chosen King by the People. Refusing this Title, he was created General, with absolute Authority; and afterwards, at the Monument of the Boar, (a place in Messenia, where Hercules made a League with the Sons of Nileus) by the assistance of the Arcadians, Argives, Steyonians and Eleans, overthrew the Lacedæmonians, terrifying all wherever he came. In the pursuit he lost his Target, which whilst he was seeking, they had opportunity to escape. After this, he took and plundered a Town of Laconia, named Phara, whence retreating with much Booty, he also overthrew Anaxander the King, who pursued him; and having in his intentions to march against Sparta it self, is said to have been deterred from it by the Apparitions of Helena and her two Brothers, Castor and Pollux.

40. The Lacedæmonians, much startled at this Loss, thought to have put a period to the War, but were again encouraged by the Verses of Tyrtæus, who persuaded them to fill up their Army with the Helots. A year or two before this, tending to consult the Oracle about the War, they had answer, That they must send to Athens for a Counsellor. The Athenians were unwilling in the least to promote their Affairs, being jealous of their growing Power: yet fearing also to do any thing crook to the Oracle, they sent to them this Tyrtæus, a School-master, lame on his feet, and not very found in his brain. In the third year of the War, another Battle was fought, at a place called the Great Ditch, wherein the Messenians having no other Associates than their Friends of Arcadia, these also failed them at this time, through the Treachery of their Captain; so that, left to themselves, and compassed in by their Enemies, most of them were slain, though Aristomenes omitted nothing worthy of a General, or common Souldier. Having gathered up the reliques of his Army, he persuaded the people to quit all in-land Towns, and, fortifying onely Pylus and Methone upon the Sea, to secure themselves in the Hill Ira. Here they were presently besieged, and issuing out for Booty, made Depredations both in Laconia and their own Country; which drew out an Edict from the Lacedæmonian State, that the Borders of both Countries should, during the War, be left desolate: whereupon a Dearth ensued at Sparta, and thence a Sedition, which Tyrtæus with his Poetry had work enough to suppress.

41. Aristomenes in the mean time, like some fierce and greedy Lion, with 300 choice men at his heels, to the great fear of all men, ranged up and down, and made continual Excursions into the Enemy's Country. At length he was taken and carried to Sparta, where condemned to death, he was thrown in to a deep Dungeon, the ordinary way of punishing capital Offenders. Coming safe to the bottom, though others were killed by the fall, he perceived a Fox feeding upon some dead Carcases; whereat considering that this creature must have some hole to creep in at, he caught it by the tail, and defending himself from its teeth by the other hand, it led him to the hole, which being but little, he so enlarged with his hands, as, contrary to the belief and expectation of all men, he returned safe to his Companions. Presently after his return, he fell upon the Camp of the Corinthians, who assisted the Spartans in the Siege, and lay carelessly, without any watch, and killing the Captains, plundered their Tents. Not long after a Truce was made for forty days, during which, he wandering abroad too carelessly, was entrapped by some Cretians, who assisted also in the Siege, and being bound with the thongs of their Quivers, was carried into a Village, to the house of a certain Widow. This Woman, understanding who he was, calt in her head how to deliver him: which she effected, by giving his Keepers so much drink, that they falling asleep, with one of their daggers he cut the thongs. Being loosed, he stabbed the Cretians, and escaped: and afterwards, to requite the Woman's kindness, married her to his Son Gorgus.

42. Ten years the Siege of Ira continued, the Messenians enjoying the grounds at the foot of the Mountain, as far as the River Neda, and thereby being better provided for to hold out. But in the eleventh, when Aristomenes was rendered by a wound incapable of taking such care about the Watch as he had been wont, in a rainy and dark night the Sentinels, secure of him, betook themselves to their own homes. Amongst those there was one, whose Wife in his absence entertained a certain Herd-man as a Lover, who belonged to Emperamus, a Lacedæmonian, now at the Siege. He being hid by his Paramour upon her Husband's coming, heard the man tell the Story, how he and his fellows had forsaken their charge, and slipping away, therewith acquainted his Master. Both the Spartan Kings were absent at this time; but Emperamus, unwilling to let slip so fair an opportunity, led the Army thither, and got into the Fortrels before he was discovered. When the matter was perceived, a great contest there was betwixt the parties; but Aristomenes seeing there was no hope of doing any good, and willing to save what was left of the afflicted Messenians, obtained liberty to depart: and so Ira being taken, the War ended, after it had lasted sixteen years, in the fifth of the 28. Olympiad, when Antisthenes was Archon at Athens, A.M. 3337.

43. When the Arcadians understood of the taking of Ira, they defired of Aristocrates their King to be led out, either to restore their friends, or die with them. But he having formerly betrayed them at the great Ditch, was now also corrupted with money, and refused to do it, alleging there was none left to whom they could give assistance. Yet when it was clearly known that they were alive, they sent some before to comfort them, then met them with Cloaths and Meat, as far as the Hill Lycaeus, and kindly invited them to live amongst them. Aristomenes boyling with hatred and revenge against the Lacedæmonians, chose out of the Company 500 men, whom he knew to be no whit desirous to outlive the fortune of their Country, and asked them in the hearing of Aristocrates (not knowing any thing of his treachery) and the Arcadians, whether they would venture their lives with him. Upon their answer that they would, he acquainted them with his design, to march straight for Sparta, which if he could surprize, now that all its strength was employed in the plunder of Messenia, then should he make an even exchange with the Lacedæmonians; but if not, death would be the worst that could happen. Besides the Messenians, 300 Arcadians gave their names to this Expedition; but being stayed by reason that the entralls of the Beast were not propitious, Aristocrates had time to give notice of the design to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Treachery was discovered after the return of the Messenger by some that suspected it, and the Letter sent back from Anaxander was read in the Assembly of the Arcadians, wherein thanks was given to Aristocrates, as well for the help he afforded the Lacedæmonians at the great Ditch, as for this timely notice. Hereat the multitude was so enraged, as they stoned him out of hand, calt him out unburied, and erected a Monument to his infamy, with this note, that Perjury cannot escape God. They exhorted also the Messenians to throw Stones at him, who looked upon Aristomenes, as expecting directions from him; but he onely fixed his eyes on the ground and wept.

44. The Messenians desired of Aristomenes to lead them out to seek some new place to inhabit; but he denied it, resolving to spend his days in doing as much mischief as he could to the Lacedæmonians: onely his Sons Gorgus and Manticles he offered to them. Those that had kept Pylus and Methone, with others which lived on the Sea-coasts, went by Ship to Cyllene, the Haven of the Eleans, to seek out the rest. The following Spring several places being proposed to go to, Anaxilus, who then reigned at Rhégium, and was descended of one Alcidamidas a Messenian, (that, after the taking of Ithome in the former War, betook himself thither) sent some to convoy them into Italy. After their arrival, he told them he had continual War with the Zancleans, a people of Sicilie, that inhabited a fruitful and pleasant Soil, which if they would help him to conquer, he would put it into their hands. He then besieged them by Sea, and the Messenians by Land, whereby being distressed, and the greater part of the Wall now calt down, they fled to the Altars of their Gods. Anaxilus would have had them slain, and their Wives and Children sold; but the others, unwilling to commit such cruelty against any Greeks, (for such they were, the Town being first inhabited by Rovers, and afterwards by others from several parts of Greece) gave them liberty to continue, and incorporating themselves into their body, changed the name of the place from Zancle into Messene. Aristomenes for some time continuing in Greece, married his Daughters very honourably, whereof Demagetus, Prince of Rhodes at that time, took the youngest to Wife, having been advised by the Oracle to make choice of that man's Daughter who was the best in all Greece. He carried his Daughter to Rhodes, whence he intended to go to Ardis the Son of Gyges, then reigning in Lydia, and thence to Ecbatane, to Ptolemaeus King of the Medes; but death prevented him, and he finished his days in that Island, being found in the number of those few that lived and died in great glory.

Such as continued in those miserable Slaves.

Slaves, amongst whom such of the Inhabitants as there still remained were inrolled, and became a Proverb for their hard Bondage; being worse used than any, because, as some think, the War was carried on with them, not for glory and Empire, but for life and safety; not with a contention which People should rule, but whether should be preferred. The accession of this Country to their Demesnes very much increased the power of Lacedæmon, and so they held it for two hundred years, till an opportunity was offered for the old Inhabitants, in despite of them, to return. This thing being brought to pass long after, must be referred to another place: as also (because what farther happened betwixt the Arcadians, Argives, and this Commonwealth, is not very material) whatsoever we have farther to observe concerning the Lacedæmonians.

The most ancient Kingdom of Corinth.

Corinth first called Ephyra, and built by Sisyphus.

THis City, seated in the Isthmus of Peloponnesus, had first the name of Ephyra, and was built by Sisyphus (whose posterity reigned here some 428 years) in the days of Cecrops, the first King of Athens, and a little before Deucalion's Flood, about the 2486 year of the World. He married Merope, the Daughter of Atlas, by which he had four Sons, Glauco, Ornytion, Therjander, and Almus; was accounted a very wife and prudent man, feigned also to have returned to life again, that he might chastise his Wife for not having performed what was due to his memory. After he was once got up, he would not return of a long time to Hell; where he is also said by the Poets to rowl a great Stone up an Hill, which continually tumbling down again keepeth him in constant toil; having this punishment inflicted on him for discovering to Agave his Daughter (stoned away by Jupiter. Glauco his eldest Son was the Father of Bellerophon, and first celebrated Games in the Isthmus. Ornytion begat Phoco, who led a Colony into, and gave name to the Country called Phocæ after him: and Thoas, a younger Son, who continued at Corinth. Therjander had two Sons, Coronus and Haliarimus, who being adopted by Athamas their Uncle on the Father's side, then reigning in Boeotia (after he had lost his own two Sons Phryxus and Helles, and his Daughter Ino with her two Sons) gave name to two places in that Country. Almus, (called otherwise Halimus and Olinus) the youngest Son of Sisyphus, had part of the Country of the Orchomenians bestowed on him by Eteocles the King: and from him Almon, or Olinos, a place in Boeotia, was so named.

Bellerophon.

Bellerophon, having committed man-laugher at Corinth, was forced to fly thence, and went to Prætus King of the Argives, whose Wife Sthenobea enamoured of his beauty tempted him to lie with her; but he had the modesty to deny her, wherewith she was so incensed as to accuse him to her Husband of an intended Rape. Prætus taking it in great disdain to be so used by his Guest, yet would not kill him, but sent him to Iolas, King of Lycia, his Wife's Father, with Letters, wherein he desired him to make the bearer away. To fulfill his request, Iolas first caused him to fight with the Chimæra, a Monster that vomited fire, not doubting of his destruction thereby; but he mounting the Horse Pegasus, flew the Monster. After this he sent him against the Solyms and Auxans, whom he conquered: then caused some of the strongest young men he could procure to fly in ambush, and fall on him; whom also he having slain, Iolas, admiring his valour, gave him his Daughter Philonoe to Wife, and when he died, left him his Successor in the Kingdom of Lycia. Concerning this Chimæra, what should be meant thereby is scarcely discernable. (a) Some have understood by it a Mountain in Lycia, the top whereof vomited forth fire, the middle part had pastures full of Goats, and the foot or bottom abounded with Serpents. 'Tis conceived he might make this Mountain habitable, and thence be said to have slain the Chimæra, which had a mouth like a Lion, middle parts as a Goat, and the hinder parts like a Dragon. (b) Others again say that Bellerophon gave occasion to this Fable by killing one Chimæras a Sea-Captain, who infested the Lycians with Piracy: the story being thence raised, for that Chimæras his Ship had a Lion painted on the Prow, and a Dragon on the Deck,

Bellerophon being driven from Corinth, Thoas the Son of Ornytion obtained the Kingdom, whom succeeded Demophon his Son, then followed Propædæus; whose two Sons Doridas and Hyantidas reigning both together, Aletes the Son of Hippæus (Son to Antiochus, and Nephew to Hercules) came down and subdued the Kingdom. The Heraclidae having, before this, obtained Peloponnesus, referred this part for him, who consulting the Oracle of Jupiter at Dodona, was answered, that he should then obtain it, when a Clod of earth should be given him. At his return this was fulfilled; for begging some meat of an Herdsman, he, having nothing to give him, offered him a Clod, which he gladly accepted, saying, Aletes accepteth of a Clod: which became a Proverb. Who gave the name of Corinth to the City is uncertain; but however, Aletes, out of gratitude to the Oracle, named it Corinth of Jupiter: which gave occasion to the multitude to believe that Corinth, the King that built it, was the Son of Jupiter; wherein they too gloried, and so often vaunted of it, that nothing became more ridiculous, and they were laughed at for it throughout Greece. After Aletes, the eldest of the Family succeeded for several generations. The first was Ixion, who reigned 37 years; the next Agelaus, who ruled as many; Pruvinnis 35, and * Bacchis full of many, who was so famous, that whereas he and all his Ancestors were called Heraclidae, his Successors from him had the name of Bacchiade. The first after him was Agelaus, who governed thirty years; the next Eudæmus, who reigned 25: then came Arifstomedes, who having ruled 35, left a Child behind him, which his Brother Algemon, whom he had appointed Guardian, deposed, and held the Kingdom himself sixteen years. After him followed Alexander for 25, whom Telaster the Son of Arifstomedes slew, and obtained his Father's Kingdom, which he held twelve years. He was also slain by Ariens and Perantas his Kinsmen, and then Antomeneus reigned one year, which being expired, the Bacchiade, more than 200 in number, seized on the Kingdom, and governed in common; only every year they created a Prytanis out of their own Body to be in the room of a King, and so they continued 90 years in the way of an Arifstocracy.

Colonies of the Corinthians.

4. During this term, in the fourth year of the eleventh Olympiad, the Corinthians, being powerful at Sea, sent out a Colony into the Island of Sicily under conduct of Archias, one of the Heraclidae, which, expelling the Siculi out of that quarter, founded the City Syracuse. More people flocking thither out of Peloponnesus, this City grew and increased exceedingly; so that it became not only the principal of all in Sicily, but the greatest and most beautiful of all Greece, as Cicero witnesseth, and in its due place will be farther discovered. Much about the same time was there another Colony sent into the Island Pæacrus, lying nigh to Epirus, at a little distance from the Continent, conducted thither by Cheriferates another of the posterity of Hercules. Homer in his Odyssy maketh this Island inhabited in the Trojan times, by the Phæacians a most noble People, over whom reigned Aleinoüs the Son of Nauplihoüs, who received Ulysses after his long Wandrings, and helped him in his journey home to Ithaca. He mentioneth his Royal seat, called Scheria, (which Pliny from him affirmeth also to have been the name of the Island, as well as Phæacia) and saith, the Inhabitants were much given to Navigation, and most skillful therein. In the soil of this Scheria, the old Inhabitants being expelled, this new Colony planted it self, which taking the name of Coreyra, the whole Island came thence to be so called. The City, much befriended by the commodiousness of the Haven, and the convenience of the place for Sea-matters, grew in a short time to be very considerable; so that it founded of it self two Cities, viz. that of Epidamnus, as we have it from Thucydides, (by the Romans called Dyrrachium) and Apollonia, as Strabo writeth; both of them seated in that part of Illyricum inhabited by the Taulantians. The form of this Commonwealth was agreeable to the constitution of all Colonies like to that of Corinth the Metropolis, which then was governed by the Bacchiade in an Oligarchical way. When Corinth was afflicted by Tyrants, Coreyra felt felt also their influence upon its infancy; but at length it grew to that height, as to renounce such obedience as the other challenged, whence great and tedious Commotions were produced in Greece.

5. The Bacchiade neither communicated the Government nor Marriage to any other person than of their own family, till one of their Women being lame, and upon that account despised by them all of her own stock, had thereby an occasion given to break the custom. She (named Labda) married Etion, (the Son of Echeerates, and Nephew to Antafus of the Petræan Tribe) who, having no Children by her, or any other, went to Delphos, and enquired of the Oracle concerning issue. He received an answer to this effect, That he should have a Son, who like a Stone would fall upon the Oligarchy, and breaking it in pieces, amend the State of Corinth. This coming to the ears of the Bacchiade, who had an Oracle before much to the same purpose, though under general terms, they resolved to hold their peace, and kill Etion's Child as soon as it should be born. And as soon as his Wife was delivered, they sent ten of their Company to destroy it, whom the Mother presented with a fight of the Babe, thinking they had come to congratulate her Husband about its birth. They had agreed amongst themselves, that whosoever first came at the Infant should knock out his Brains: but the Child smiling in his face who first took it in his Arms, he was so moved with compassion, that he would not kill it, but delivered it to one of his fellows, who touched with the same compassion gave it to another, till it passed through all their hands unhurt. Being gone out, and standing at the door, they blamed one another exceedingly, especially the first, whose part it was to kill it, and in they returned now to do the deed. But the Mother, hearing their discourse, hid the Infant under a Bushell, or such a like instrument of measuring Corn, so that not finding it they returned, giving out they had done their errand: and so the Child thus preserved was named Cypselus, from Ky-Ja-nu.

6. When he was come to man's estate, relying upon another Oracle (whereby he was plainly bidden to be King of Corinth, and his Children after him, but not his Nephews) he invaded the Tyranny, which to establish, many he deprived of their estates, but many more of their lives. He first lulled the people asleep with good language, and thereby getting all into his hands, made himself Lord of the City. His power he preserved by removing those out of the way whom it most concerned him; but once established he grew exceeding mild and fair, with good words, and no ill deeds, drawing the people into such a respect of him, that all his time he stood not in need of any Guard: a rare thing in men of his condition, which Gelo at Syracuse only imitated. This change happened at Corinth in the second year of the 31. Olympiad, in the days of Phraortes, King of the Medes, and Arads Grandfather to Cresus, King of Lydia, 20 years after the second Messenian War, and 30 after the nine Annual Arctons were established at Athens, A. M. 3350. Upon his seizing the power, Demaratus, a man eminent amongst the Bacchiade, and very rich, fled into Italy, and seated himself in Hetruria, where, of a Woman of that Country, he begat two Sons, Aruns, and Lucumon, the latter whereof became King of Rome, by the name of Tarquinius.

Periander.

7. Cypselus having enjoyed the Principality of Corinth and Corcyra the space of thirty years, then died, and left it to his Son Periander. He was much unlike his Father, of a cruel disposition, (if we believe Aristotle rather than Soficles in Herodotus) inasmuch as not trusting the good will of his People, he got a Guard of 300 men about him, and would rather be feared than loved of his Subjects; yet being hardy and warlike, he held the power longer than he. Herodotus out of Soficles relateth, that at first he was very mild and courteous, till, by acquaintance with Thrafsybulus the Tyrant of Miletus, he altered his humour: for sending to him for his advice how he might best order his affairs in Government, he returned no answer to the Messenger, but carrying him out into a plot of Corn, fell a-plucking off the tallest and most eminent Ears, till he had well-nigh marred the whole plot. The Messenger returning, told Periander what he had seen; who easily guessed, that the most eminent and powerfull Citizens were to be removed out of the way. But * Aristotle maketh him the Author of this Counsel to Thrafsybulus. Laërtius saith, he grew more cruel after it was known that he lay with his Mother Cratea.

8. He married Melissa the Daughter of Procles (or Patrocles) Tyrant of Epidaurnus, on whom he begat Cypselus and Lycophron, whereof the elder was very blockish and stupid. At the instigation of his Whores he afterwards killed his Wife, kicking her when she was great with child, then lay with her when she was dead; dead; and calling together the Corinthian women, as well adorned as possible, to celebrate the Feast of Junio, caused his Guard to strip them all naked, and made a parentation to Melissa of all their cloaths and ornaments. Lycophron, his youngest Son, who only was capable of the Government, moved by Procles his Grandfather, grew exceeding froward and refractory because of his Mother's death; inasmuch that, differences and distasts increasing, Periander banished him first his house, then forbad all his Subjects to speak to or comfort him, and at length forced him into Corcyra. But after some years growing old, infirm, and unfit for business, he sent for him home, offering to pass over all to him: but by no arguments or intreaties could he move him to return, till he offered to change places, and devest himself of all Power. Now when this was agreed on, the Corcyreans, fearing above all things to have Periander come amongst them, to prevent it, killed the young man. Periander, to be revenged, took away from them 300 of their choicest Boys, which he sent to Halysartes, King of Lydia, his Friend and Ally, to be gelded: but they being driven upon the Island Samus, the Inhabitants took such pity both on them and their relations, as to send them home safe, and disappointed the Tyrant. This so vexed him, now almost eighty years old, that he died of grief, though by some he be reckoned amongst the seven Wise men of Greece. Suidas out of most ancient Authors delivereth this Character of him; That he was an harsh and cruel Tyrant, very martial, scarcely being ever out of War, and very powerfull at Sea, having for convenient Havens both upon the Ionian and Ægean Gulfs. He reigned nigh forty years, and died in the fourth of the forty eighth Olympiad, seven after the establishment of Solon's Laws, A. M. 3420.

Pfammetichus.

9. Periander being dead, his Tyranny as it were tottered for three years and some six months, during which time Pfammetichus the Son of Gordias, Brother to Periander, or rather something a-k-in to him, held it; as appeareth by (e) Aristotle, who only hath preserved his name to us from utter oblivion. After his removal the power of One man was laid aside, and the People put themselves into a Free State, which continued as long as the Liberty of Greece it self. The form thereof is not described to us by any ancient Author; only this we know from (f) Plutarch, that it was inclining more to Oligarchy than that of Syracuse, the power of the Multitude being more bounded. Yet, for certain, the Government was Popular, things of greatest consequence never being resolved on without the consent and decree of the People, (which kept those of highest concernment in its own power;) and, if any other in the World, was a friend to Antimonarchical liberty, and an utter enemy to Monarchy, wherever it was found in Greece. For this City undertook many times great Wars for this very cause, and not out of any ambitious design, as is clear in the case of the Syracusanians, and others; so that a Captain out of it was most desirable upon such an occasion; as may hereafter be discovered.

The ancient Kingdom of Thebes.

1. BOEOTIA had on the West Phocis, on the East the Eubæan Sea, on the North the Eastern Locri, and on the South Attica and Megaris. The chief Seat and Metropolis of this Country was Thebes, the Builder of which is not certainly known. Calydus is reported first to have reigned here; whence by a Poet of Chalcis it is called the Tower of Calydus; and in Hefychius, Calydnean is the same with Ancient. After him was Ogyges, or Ogyrus, from whom Thebes by the Poets is called Ogygian, and that great Ogygian Deluge is named, which is said to have happened in his time, 1020 years before the first Olympiad, in the days of Phoroneus King of Argos, (as Africanus gathereth) and so overwhelmed all the region of Attica, that it made it uninhabitable for 200 years, as Pererius noteth. Pausanias writeth, that he was King of the Edæne, the first Inhabitants of Thebes, and that from his Son, Elenusine, a famous Town in Attica, took both Original and name, as some were of opinion. These Edæne are reported to have been consumed by Pestilence, whom succeeded the Hyantes and Abas, who continued in those parts, together with the Temices, (who came from Sanium) and the Leleges, till Cadmus, coming to Greece, made himself Master of this place, in the days of Corax King of Sicyon, and Danaus of Argos, 347 years after the beginning of Ogyges.

Cadmus.

2. This Cadmus, according to the tradition of the Greeks, was Son to Agenor the Brother of Belus, Uncle to Danaus and Aegyptus, who, coming out of Egypt into Phœnix some 36 years before, on his Wife Telphassa begat three Sons, Cadmus, Phœnix, Cilix, and a Daughter named Europa. This Europa Jupiter stole, and carried over Sea into Crete, in the likeness of a Bull, where he begat on her Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Sarpædon. Asterius King of the Island afterwards married her, and, having no Children of his own, adopted her Sons. Herodotus telleth us that some Greeks, (Asterius perhaps, or some for him) in revenge for what the Nation had formerly suffered from the Astæicks in stealing away Ino, went to Tyre, and thence stole Europa the King's Daughter, bringing her away in a Ship whose Ensign was a Bull; whence occasion was given to feign, that she was carried over upon a Bull's back.

3. Agenor sent out his three Sons to seek their Sister, charging them never to return without her into Phœnicia. Cadmus sailed first into the Island Calisthe, (lying near Crete) where he left a Colony, and thence into Thasus (so named from Thasus one of his Companions, and head of another Colony left here) and at length into Greece, where, in Beotia, being past all hope of finding his Sister, and consequently of returning into Phœnicia, by the command of an Oracle he founded Thebes; or re-edifying what was formerly built by Ogyges, a new laid the foundation of the Castle, which, ever after, from him retained the name of Cadmeia. The Hyante, beaten by his Forces, fled the night following into Phocis; but the Æone, upon their submission, were suffered to continue and imbodie themselves amongst the Phœnicians. Here he married Harmonia the Daughter of Mars and Venus, agreeable to which alliance, the Gods are said to have come down unto Cadmeia to the Wedding. Out of Phœnicia he first brought Letters into Greece, giving them their peculiar names and characters, fitted for the language of the place, and thence they were called Phœnician; though afterwards Pelægian, because the use of them was, after they were brought over, first made known to the Pelægi.

4. Of Harmonia Cadmus begot Polydorus his Son, and four Daughters, Semele, Ino, Antiope, and Agave. On Semele Jupiter enamoured begot Dionysus, or Bacchus, who found out Wine and Ale, and travelled throughout the then known World, to reduce men to civility. This he did with an Army both of men and women, and after an Expedition of three years returned out of India, first triumphing upon an Elephant. Ino was married to Atamas the Son of Æolus, and Grandson of Hellen, to whom she bore Alceon, that was devoured by his own Dogs. Agave became the Wife of Eetion, to whom she bore Pentheus. After Cadmus had reigned some time at Thebes, he was called by the Encheleæ, who had Wars at that time with the Illyrians, and were bidden by the Oracle to fend for him and Harmonia to be their Captains. He left then the Kingdom of Thebes to his Son Polydorus, and, having subdued the Illyrians, reigned over them, and begot another Son called Illyrius, who either gave or took name from that People. The Poets feigned Cadmus and his Wife to have been turned here into Snakes, because they seem to have forgot their former civility, and learnt barbarism.

A. Apollod.

Polydorus.

What the Sidonians said of Cadmus.

5. This is the sum of what the Greeks have delivered concerning Cadmus. But though they, for their own credit, made him the Son of a King, yet the Sidonians, whose Country-man he was, denie this, alleging that, being their King's Cook, he fled away with Josheph, so that he seemeth to have led into Greece a Colony of those Canaanites, or Phœnicians, who were outed of their habitations by the Israelites. His Family may be gathered to have been that of the Kadmonites, mentioned by Moses, who were the same with the Hittites, and called Kadmonites, or Orientalis, because they possessed Mount Hermion, the most Eastern part of Canaan, taken for the East, as Thabor for the West. Hence came it to pass that Cadmus his Wife was called Harmonia, or Hermione; and it is apparent why they were feigned to be turned into Snakes, because an Hivite in the Syrian language signifieth a Serpent. That he first brought Letters into Greece is most probable, 1. Because the ancientest Greek letters, in most things, are like to the old Phœnician, which the Samaritans at this day use. 2. Their names are plainly Phœnician, or Hebrew, as may be instanced in Alpha, Beta, &c. of which the Greeks were not ignorant, ignorant, as appeareth out of Varro. For Crates the Philosopher, disputing in Greece about some points of Grammar, demanded why they said not Alpha Alphabet as well as Gramma Grammatos; to which the Grecians answered, that the names were not theirs, but barbarous; and Plutarch rendred this reason why Alpha is set before the rest by the Phœnicians, because they called an Oxe by that name. 3. The Greeks kept the same order of letters as the Phœnicians did, being most ancient, as appeareth by some acrostick Verses of David and Jeremiah. Cadmus brought over the Rites of Bacchus into Greece, and thereupon is feigned to be Grand-father to him, who lived many Ages before, and indeed was Nimrod. To this City, built or re-edified by him, he gave the name of Thebes, of which name there was a place in Canaan mentioned by the Book of (a) Judges, and by (b) Josephus also written Thebe, in the plural number; so that an end may be put to that controversy about the original of the word, which betokeneth mud or dirt. But concerning all this Bochartus is to be consulted, in the first Book of that admirable Work intitled Canaan.

(a) Cap. 5. 40. (b) Antiq. l. 5. cap. 9.

6. Polydorus, succeeding his Father, married Nycteis the Daughter of Nycteus, by whom he had a Son named Labaecus, whom, dying before he came at age, he left to the tuition of his Father-in-law. Nycteus had another Daughter, Antiope, by name, which Epopeus King of Sicyonia stole away, whence a War ensued, wherein both of them received mortal wounds, and Nycteus dying, left the tuition of the young King to his Brother Lycus. After Labaecus came at age, Lycus restored faithfully the Kingdom to him: wherefore the King dying also not long after, and leaving his Son Laius a Child but of one year old, having experience of his faithfulness, committed him to his protection. Afterwards Amphion and Zethus, the Sons of Antiope, invaded Thebes in revenge for their Mother's hard usage and Captivity, the having been taken by Lycus in Sicyon, or delivered up to him by Lamedon King of that City, when he led down thither an Army, at the desire of his dying Brother, to revenge him upon her and Epopeus, as we before shewed. Lycus meeting them in the field was slain in battle, Thebes lost, and the Child Laius had miscarried, but that some well-wishers to his Family withdrew him out of the danger, left the posterity of Cadmus should be utterly extinct. Amphion then and Zethus obtained the Kingdom; said by Homer to have built Thebes, which must be meant of the lower City distinct from Cadmeia. Amphion was so excellent a Musician, that he is said to have made Stones to follow him, wherewith he built Towers about the City. He married Niobe, the Daughter of Tantalus, and Sister to Pelops, who brought him many Children, but boasting her self more fruitful than Latus her self, procured the destruction of them all. For Apollo was commanded to kill the Boys, and Diana the Girls; whereat she was struck with such stupidity, that she is feigned to be turned into a Stone; and Amphion with all his Family at length died of the Pestilence. Zethus, having his young Son killed at unawares by the Mother, pined away for grief; so that both Brothers being dead, and their Families ruined, the Thebans restored the Kingdom to Laius the Son of Labaecus.

7. Laius married Jocaste, the Daughter of Menecæus, but was admonished by the Oracle to beget no Children, because else he should be killed by his Son; which punishment Pelops had prayed might fall on him for stealing his Son Chryseus, begotten on a Concubine. Notwithstanding this he had a Son, but as soon as he was born he thrust his Feet in Iron fetters, and exposed him as a prey to wild Beasts. Yet, either by those that had this charge, or others that found him, he was carried to Polybus, King of Corinth, who caused his Feet to be healed, (from the Swelling of which he had the name of OEdipus) and brought him up. Many years after, when he was grown, Laius, either hearing some rumour concerning him, or carried by natural affection, went to enquire of the Oracle what had happened to his Sons and at the same time it chanced that OEdipus, having heard of some design against himself, went thither also to enquire who were his true Parents. They met in Phocis, where Laius bidding the other somewhat imperiously to give way, OEdipus moved with choler killed him, being utterly ignorant who he was.

loft their lives for a misinterpretation, he expounded it to be meant of a Man, who when an Infant creepeth on hands and feet, when arrived at ripeness of age goeth upright on legs, and when he cometh to be old useth a staff. Some think her a deformed and savage kind of woman, that living on prey used to lie in wait for Passengers. But Pausanias writing that she was the Bastard-daughter of Laius, others judge her to have been for her wisdom preferred to determine the Pretences of such as claimed the Kingdom, and that those who were cast in the Trial she punished with Death: which Cruelty the Poets detestful raised the Fable. Eteocles and

9. Oedipus then married Jocasta his own Mother, not knowing that she was such, and obtained the Kingdom of Thebes. Diodorus telleth us that he had two Sons by her, Eteocles and Polynices, with as many Daughters: but others say he had them by Euryganea, the Daughter of Hyperphus. At length all came to light; both that he had killed his Father, and married his own Mother: whereupon the presently hanged her self, and his Sons kept him up close for the filthiness of the thing, as some say; though others will have him driven from Thebes, and that, going to Thebes King of Athena, he there died a little after. Polynices, while his Father was yet living, went to Argos, where he married Argia, the Daughter of Adrastus; but after his death returned to Thebes to succeed him in the Kingdom. The two Brothers then agreed to reign by turns; but Eteocles, having the first course, refused to yield up his Power at the time prefixed, so that Polynices was glad to return to Argos. At the same time there happened to be with Adrastus one Tydeus, the Son of Oeneus, who, having killed a man in Attolia, fled also to him: both these he kindly received, and, by direction of the Oracle making them his Sons-in-law, promised to restore them to their Countreys and Estates. Beginning first with Polynices, he sent Tydeus in Embassy to Eteocles, who caused fifty men to lie in wait for him by the way, but he killed them all, and returned safe to Argos. Adrastus, to revenge the injury, made all possible preparation for a War, and invited all the best Souldiers from all quarters to the Expedition. Seven eminent Captains gave their names, whereof Amphiarus, who had married Eriphile, the Sister of Adrastus, was Chief; though of so ancient a thing as this Theban War there can be little certainty.

The Theban War.

10. Having each of them his several Army, (or Company rather) they marched to Thebes, which they besieged, and divided themselves according to the Gates of the City. Eteocles made all preparations for defence, assigning to every Gate its Officer, and consulted Tiresias a Prophet, then blind, concerning the event of the War. He answered, that the Thebans should overcome, if Meneceus, the Son of Creon, would devote himself as a Sacrifice to Mars: which he presently did, killing himself before the Gates. The Thebans then made a Sally, but were beaten back to the Walls, when the Argives approached, Capaneus, one of the seven Captains, first of all others set to Ladders, and mounted; but he being killed, the other retreated, and many of them were slain in the pursuit. After this, it was agreed that the two Brothers, in a single Combat, should decide the Quarrel; and so doing, they mutually fell by the hands of each other: then followed a very sharp Fight, wherein all the Captains that followed Adrastus were slain, and he only escaped by the swiftness of his Horse Arion. Yet this Victory cost the Thebans so dear, that being themselves almost ruined, hence Cadmea victoria became a Proverb. This War fell out twenty eight years before that of Troy.

Laodamus.

The Expedition
of the Epigoni.

11. Eteocles leaving behind him a young Son, named Laodamus, Creon, the Brother of Jocasta, assumed the Guardianship of him, and would not suffer the Argives to be buried, till Thebes and the Athenians procured it. Ten years after the War, when Laodamus was now grown up, the Sons of those Captains that had been slain, called Epigoni, made an Expedition against Thebes, to revenge the Death of their Fathers. Consulting before-hand the Oracle of Delphos about the success, they were bidden to chuse Alcmeon, the Son of Amphiarus, for their General; which having done, and marching into Thebes, they waited all the Country round about the City. Hereupon the Thebans made a Sally, and a sharp conflict ensued, wherein Laodamus slew Regialeus, the Son of Adrastus, and was himself killed by Alcmeon; though Pausanias saith he escaped out of the Fight, and fled to the Hyrrians. After this the City was taken, and, with other plunder, Tiresias the Prophet was sent as a Present towards Delphos; but drinking by the way presently died. This is he who is said to have experienced both Sexes, and lived seven Generations; even from the days of Cadmus to this time. The Epigoni having taken the City, and either slain or driven away Laodamus, placed Thersander, the Son of Polynices in the Kingdom, who sailed with Agamemnon towards Troy as General of the Ewotians, and was killed in Mysia by Telephus, as was before shewed. The Beotians chose Penelus for their Captain, because his Son Tisamenus was then but young; and he was also slain in the War by Eurphylius, the Son of Telephus, who after the death of Achilles brought Auxiliary forces out of Mysia unto Priamus.

12. Penelus being dead, Tisamenus, the Son of Thersander, reigned at Thebes, Pausanias saith His Son Antefon left this place, and went to the Dorians; wherefore Damagichthon, the Nephew of Penelus, and Son of Obtelus, was chosen in his room. After him followed Ptolemaus, and then Xanthus the last King of all, who was slain by Meantius the Messian in a single Combat, in behalf of the Athenians, about Celene, a place situate upon the Borders, as we have * already shewn. This happened 56 years after the destruction of Troy, 24 before the descent of the Heraclides, 57 before the death of Codrus the last Athenian King, 252 before the first Olympiad, A. M. 2877. After his death, together with the possession of Celene, the Thebans quitted the Government of Kings, it seeming good to them no longer to be governed by a single person, but by many, as Pausanias writeth, from whom yet it appeareth not what kind of Rule was created; whether an Oligarchy at first, or the whole power was assumed by the People, which we know assuredly exercised it in after-times, in a Democratical way. Such was the Government when the Persians had obtained the Empire of the East, and Greece it self most flourished; at which time, in the entire History of this Country we shall hear farther of the Thebans.

The Original and Kingdom of Rome Contemporary with the Babylonian Empire.

SECT. I.

The Originall of the City of Rome.

1. THE City of Rome was seated in Latium, the Western Tract of Italy, upon the River Tiber. The soyl, for as much as can be known, (saith Dionysius) was first inhabited by the Sicils, who held many other places of that Country. These were expelled by the Aborigines, who being the Posterity of the OEnotrians, (who seized upon that Tract lying near Tarentum) were consecrated first to the Gods, and according to the custom of the Country, then sent out to seek them new seats, and fortunes. The OEnotrians came out of Lycania (afterwards called Arcadia) to seek a more commodious habitation under conduct of OEnotrus, the Son of Lycan, from whom they received their name. These Aborigines here settled, were forced to admit of some Pelagians to live amongst them that fled from Hemonia, (since called Thessaly) where for some time they had continued; and afterwards certain Arcadians who followed Evander, Son to Mercury, and the Nymph Themis, from a Town of that Country called Palantium, which name they gave to an Hill on which they fixed, afterwards reckoned amongst the Seven belonging to the City. Not long after, the Greeks; who have Hercules come into these parts, as he was returning home from his Expedition into Spain, and the Western Regions, and here to have left some Peloponnesians, who settled themselves upon the Hill called then Saturninus, and afterwards Capitolinus, at what time Favus reigned over the Aborigines.

Picus.

2. The Father of Faunus is said to be Picus the Son of Saturn, who, flying out of Crete from his Son Jupiter, came into this Country, and here hiding himself, gave occasion for the Region to be called Latium. Some say the Father of Picus was rightly called Sterces, and surnamed Saturn, from whom the Laurentine Kingdom took its beginning, named from Laurentum the Town, and that from Laurus or Laurel. Picus had this name from the Bird Picus (a Wood-pecker) which he used, by its flying to foretell things to come, as Festus noteth out of Verrinus. Plutarch saith, that he was by the Sorceries of his Wife changed into this Bird, in the likenes of which he gave forth Oracles, and answered Questions. And agreeable hereto, Dionysius of Halicarnassus compareth this Bird with the Dove of Dodona, as performing that to the Aborigines, which it did to the Thebotes. But Servius thinketh all this feigned, because Picus was a Soothsayer, and observed the flying of this kind of Bird: and Bochartus telleth us, that Picea in the Phœnician dialect signifieth a Seer or Prophet; whence, as Pix amongst the Beotians was taken for a cunning woman, so he, for his skill in such matters, might, according to the termination of Latin words, have the name of Picus. This man, who in Suidas hath the name of Jupiter, (except Jupiter of Crete, that stole Io, who was called Picus) begat Faunus or Fatunus, and a Daughter named Fauna and Fatua, which being in a fury would also foretell things to come; whence such as were thus taken were said Fatuari. Being killed by Faunus her Brother and Husband, as it seemeth, she was worshipped as a Goddess, and called Bona Dea, because she was so modest, that never any man saw her except her Husband. Dionysius maketh this Faunus the Son of Mars. He is feigned to have served under Bacchus in his Expedition into the East; and this is the reason, because indeed he was the same with Pan, the constant companion of Bacchus. (a) One writeth that he was called also Sylvanus Iovius, and Pan by some. (b) Another saith, his name in Latin was Iovius, and in Greek Pan. So that his reigning in Latium was a meer Fable, invented by some who knew not that he was the same with Pan the Arcadian, whose worship was brought into Italy by Evander.

Æneas with the Trojans arrive in Italy.

3. After him reigned Latinus, as the Story goeth, whom Festus maketh his Son; but others, as we have it from Dionysius, fathered on Hercules, who begat him on a certain Hyperborean Virgin, whom having received as an Hostage from her Father, he kept untouched till he came into Latium, and afterwards gave her in marriage unto Faunus, therefore accounted the Father of Latinus. Fifty five years after the departure of Hercules, and in the 35. of the reign of Latinus, Æneas with his wandering Trojans arrived at Laurentum, not far from the Mouth of Tiber. Livie saith, it is most certain, that, Troy being taken, the Grecians raged against the other Inhabitants, but abstained from Antenor and Æneas, (the Son of Anchises, who was Son to Carys, and Grand-son to Ascræus, the Brother of Ilius King of Troy) both for the friendship which had past betwixt them and their families, and because they were ever for peace and the restitution of Helena. But Dionysius relateth out of Hellanicus, that the lower part of the City being taken, Æneas with his associates, that came from Ophryniun and Dardanus to the aid of Ilium, timely perceiving it, retired into the Castle, where were the Idols and much treasure, protected by the most valiant Souldiers. Hither also betook themselves such as escaped the fury of fire and sword; and they easily repelled the force of the Enemy. But Æneas considering that the City could no way be preserved, resolved to quit the Castle so as might stand with the safety of the Company. He therefore sent out with a guard the aged and infirm, in the mean time diverting the Enemy, and then marched out in order of battel, when Neoptolemus and the Acheans had now taken part of the Fortifications. Whilst the Greeks were busied in plunder, they all escaped to the Mount Ida, where fortifying themselves, the same night others flocked to them out of Dardanus, Ophryniun, and the rest of the Trojan Towns, expecting till the Enemy, fatished with the destruction of Ilium, would draw off, and return into his own Country.

4. But the Acheans having wasted the City, and lesser Towns, provided also to storm the Hills; when a Treaty was desired by the Trojans. It was there agreed, that Æneas and his Companions, with such things as they had, should depart out of the Country under safe conduct. Whereupon he first sent away his eldest Son Ascanius, with part of his Associates, (whereof the greater number was Phrygius) to the Lake Ascanius, for that he was desired by the Inhabitants of that Country to be their King. He continued not long with them, for the Scamandride, with others of the Family of Hector, now dismissed out of Greece by Neoptolemus, the Son of Achilles, coming to him, he returned with them to Troy, and and restored them to their Father's Principality. Æneas with the rest of his Children, Anchises his Father, and his Household, passed over the Hellefont into a Pennisula called Pallene, whence he sailed to the Island Delos, and thence to another named Cythera, over against Peloponnesus. Touching at the promontory Cinethium, (so called for that Cinethus a Trojan was here buried) they renewed their friendship with the Arcadians their kinsfolk, and passed on to the Island Zacynthus, which was so named from Zacynthus one of the Sons of Dardanus. Thence they came to Adium, and so to Ambracia; from which Bay Anchises directed his course towards Butrotum an Haven of Epirus, and Æneas by Land went two days journey to the Oracle of Dodona, which having consulted about new Seats, in four days he came to the Navy at Butrotum. From this Haven sailing towards Italy, they touched upon some parts thereof, but passing into the Straights of Sicilie, they fell also upon that Island; where leaving part of their Company, they went over and landed at Laurentum, the place appointed to put an end to these Wandrings. This account Dionysius giveth us, as most probable, amongst others which he briefly toucheth. Alexander the Ephesian, as he is cited by Aurelius Victor, wrote that Ilium being betrayed by Antenor, Æneas took his Father upon his back, with his Gods, and his little Son in his hand, and thus loaded made towards Ida; whither being suffered to come by the Greeks, (who were much moved at his Piety) he there built Ships, and by the advice of an Oracle came into Italy. The Piety of Æneas is much spoken of, and commended by many; and, amongst others, by the pen of Xenophon, that Attick Muse: but some wrote that he joyed with Antenor in betraying the City.

5. The Trojans landing at Laurentum, there pitched their Tents in the place called Troy from this occasion, distant from the Sea about half a mile. Taking their dinner on the ground, some laid their meat on Parley, that there grew, or, as some said, on crusts of Bread, which afterwards they did also eat up; and then understood that they had fulfilled the Oracle, which bade them go so far Westward, as till they should eat up their Tables, and then take the conduct of a Sow, which they should follow till the lay down, and in that very place build a City. Now was Latinus busied in War against the Rutulians his neighbours. As some wrote, he was first overcome by Æneas, and then made peace with him: but others say, he first sent to expostulate the injury offered him by these Strangers in the invasion of his Kingdom; and then, understanding who they were, agreed to give them all the ground five miles about the Hill where the Sow lay down, upon their engagement to assist him in his War against the Rutulians. This Accord made, and Hostages delivered on both sides, they soon utterly subdued the Rutuli, and then built up the Trojan City, which was called Latinium, as the Romans said, from the Daughter of Latinus. Virgil, too much indulging his Poëtick fancy in imitation of Homer, bringeth Æneas into Italy not till the eighth year after the destruction of Troy. But Dionysius and Sollinus (our of the Annals of Cassius Helminia) write, that he arrived at Laurentum in the second year, and the latter saith, with no more than 600 followers.

6. Æneas in the third year after his departure from Troy, and the second of his abode in Italy, reigned only over the Trojans: but the next brought him also the Kingdom of the Aborigines, by the right of his Wife Lavinia, Daughter to Latinus now deceased, and the favour he had purchased of this People, by his conduct against the Rutulians. For they had again revolted, through the procurement of a certain Fugitive named Turnus, who being the Nephew of Amata, Latinus his Wife, out of indignation that a Stranger should be preferred to the Marriage of Lavinia before him, at the instigation of Amata and others, revolted to the Rutulians with a party of men which he commanded. Livie maketh him King of the Rutulians, and to have made War upon Latinus, because he had first made him a promise of his Daughter. The Aborigines had the Victory, but lost Latinus in the Battel. Dionysius saith, that Turnus was now also slain with many others: but Livie will have him again to renew the War, and to call in Meczentius King of the Hetruscans, who was already jealous of the growing power of the Greeks. Æneas, to oblige his new Subjects, caused both them and his own Country-men to be called by the common name of Latini; but ingaging in another great and bloody Battel with Meczentius, which night onely interrupted, he was never seen more, by some thought to be taken up to Heaven, and by others drowned in the River Nimicius. This happened to him in the fourth year of his reign over the Latines, and the seventh after the destruction of Troy. He was honoured by a Chappel dedicated to him under the title of Jupiter Indiges.

SECT. I.

Afcanius.

7. Afcanius his Son succeeded him, who before was called Euryleon, till his name came to be changed in their flight from Troy, as Dionysius writeth. Some thought him the fame with the eldest Son of Aeneas by Creüsa, and called Iulus, from whom the Family of the Julii took its name; but others accounted him younger. Mexentius grew very high upon the death of Aeneas, and befieging Lavinium, forced the Latines to submit themselves; but requiring all their Wine to be yearly sent as a tribute into Hetruria, they would not endure so harsh terms, and encouraging themselves, fell upon their Enemies at unawares, and, killing Laufus the King's Son amongst many others, forced him to submit to equal conditions. Thirty years after the founding of Lavinium, Afcanius led out a new Colony, and built another City called Alba Longa, whither he betook himself, leaving the old to his Mother Lavinia, who, if his own Parent, managed the Kingdom for him in his Nonage. He died in the 28. year of his reign, and was succeeded by Sylvius, whom some make his Son, others his Brother, saying, that Lavinia being left with child by Aeneas, for fear of Afcanius fled into the Woods, and there was delivered of this Child, who from the place of his birth had the name of Sylvius. Iulus, the eldest Son of Afcanius, contended with him for the Kingdom: but the people conceiving it to belong to him of right, as the Nephew of Latinius, gave the Priesthood to the other, in whose family it thenceforth continued. From Sylvius all his Successors were surnamed Sylvii; whereof the first (after he had reigned 29 years) was Aeneas Sylvius, his Son. Aeneas having reigned so many, left Latinius his Successor, whom after 51 followed Alba for 39. After Alba, Carpentus reigned 26 years, Caps 28, Carpentus, or Carpentius, 13, and then Tiberinus 8, who being drowned in the River Albula, bestowed on it the name of Tiber. After him Agrippa reigned 24 years, then Alladius (called also Arenulus and Romulus Sylvius) 19; who was very wicked and tyrannical, inasmuch that he would counterfeit Thunder, furious to be accounted a God by his Subjects, and justly perished by Thunder and inundation through excessive Rains. Aventinus succeeded him, who gave name to one of the seven Hills, and after 37 years left Procas Sylvius his Successor.

8. Procas, the thirteenth King of Alba, left two Sons, Numitor and Amulius; whereof the latter and younger violently thrust his Brother from the Kingdom; and that he might have no Posterity to revenge the injury, caused his Son to be made away in a pretended Hunting, and his Daughter Rhea to be devoted to the service of Vesta, and a single life. In the fourth year of her Priesthood, as the was going to fetch water for the service of the Goddess, she was light upon by some one, and ravished: some said by one of her Lovers, others by Amulius himself, who came disguised upon her, rather out of desire to take an occasion against her, than for any affection; but for credit of the cause the fact is laid upon Mars, in whose Grove it was committed, and who came to her, as 'tis said, in a terrible manner with Thunder and Lightning. Rhea (called also Sylvia and Ilia) conceived with two Boys; and when they were born, she was either put to death, or condemned to perpetual prison, and they were thrown into the River. At the fall of the water they were left upon the dry ground, and a Wolf moved with their cries came and suckled them, till they were taken notice of by Faustulus the King's Herdsman, who brought them home to his Wife Acca Laurentia, that had been newly brought to bed of a still-born Child. Some thought that Numitor, aware of his Brother's intention to make them away, caused other two to be brought in their rooms, and gave his two Nephews to be nourished by this Faustulus. Others write that this Acca Laurentia was but the Paramour of the Herdsman, and for the naughtiness of her life called Lupa, (Lupanaria amongst the Romans signifying Brothel-houses, and Lupa a Strumpet) whence the Fable arose that the Children were nourished by a Wolf. Their names were Romulus and Remus.

9. The Boys grown up proved active and courageous, suitably to their birth: but being educated as was agreeable with the fortune and employment of their Foster-father, they had occasion to fall out with the Herdsman of Numitor, and Remus being taken prisoner was carried before the King. Now did Faustulus reveal the whole matter to Romulus concerning their Original, who got together a company of Herdsmen, and therewith falling upon the Palace slew Amulius, and restored their Grand-father to the Kingdom. After things were settled at Alba, the young men had a desire to build a City in the place where they had been brought up; which their Grand-father well approving gave them the ground, with such of his Subjects as he knew to be of his Brother's Faction, and all others that of their own accord would willingly go out in this new Colony.

Several opinions concerning the Builder of Rome.

Most of the Trojans gave their names, (whereof continued to the time of Dionysius almost fifty Families); the Inhabitants of the place also, as many as were left about Palantium and Saturnia, were taken in, and the Multitude divided into two parts, that by emulation the work might proceed with greater expedition. But what was intended for a laudable contention grew to a greater inconvenience; for hereby were two Factions made, which preferring the Brothers each before the other, raised in them ambitious desire of Preeminence. This soon appeared in that they could not agree about the place; Romulus would have the Palatine Hill (or Palantium) to be taken in, and Remus contended for Remuria, though on the other they were educated. The matter was brought before their Grand-father, who advised them to go apart, and observe the flying of Birds; and to whom happened the most lucky Flight, he should be accounted the Author of the Colony. Romulus went to the Palatine Hill, and Remus to the Aventine near adjoining. Remus first had six Vultures come flying by him; but Romulus his flock doubled the number: so that both of them were fluted King, and neither would give place to the other.

10. The contention grew so sharp as to proceed to a Fight, wherein Remus had the worst of it, and was slain; which Dionysius thinketh the most probable opinion. Others write, that he scoffed at the lowliness of the Wall which his Brother had made, saying, it would easily be pulled over by Enemies, and therewith leaped over it himself; for which he was presently killed by one Celer, who over-saw the work. Romulus compassed in the Palatine Hill, and made that the Rudiments of the City, with an Heifer and a young Bullock joyned together plowing up a furrow where the Wall should be reared: which use was afterwards observed by the Romans, both in the building and razing of Cities. This is the most common and received opinion about the Original of Rome, which some make built at another time, and by other Founders. Cephalon Gergithius, a most ancient Historian, wrote that it was built in the second Age after the Trojan War, by Romus, one of the four Sons of Aeneas; with whom many other Authors agree. Others made the Founder of it to be Aeneas himself, whom they will have come in company with Ulysses into Italy. Aristotle the Philosopher wrote, that part of the Acheans themselves, in their return from Troy, were by Tempests driven upon Italy, and forced to plant themselves in Latium. Callias the Historian, who recorded the Acts of Agathocles, mentioned a Trojan Woman, called Roma, that being married to Latinius, King of the Aborigines, bare to him two Sons, Remus and Romulus, who building the City, named it Rome after their Mother. Xenagoras reckoned up three Sons of Ulysses by Circe, Romus, Antias, and Ardea, all which built Cities of their own name. Dionysius of Chalcis, with others, would have this Romus to be the Son of Afcanius; some of Emethion, and some of Italus by Eletra the Daughter of Latinius. Besides these, many other Greek Authors dissembled about the Founders of the City.

11. Neither have Roman Writers agreed amongst themselves. Some of them would have the Sons of Aeneas to be Founders of the City, viz. Romulus and Remus; others, his Nephews by his Daughter, which he gave up as Hostages to Latinius, King of the Aborigines. Some write how Afcanius, being left Heir by his Father, divided his Inheritance with Romulus and Remus his Brethren. He himself built Alba and other Towns: Romulus Capua, so called from Caps his Great-grand-father; Antifis, from Antifis his Grand-father; and that place afterwards called Janiculum, which he named after his Father Aeneas; then lastly, Rome after his own name, which being afterwards desolate, the Albans re-peopled by a Colony led thither by Romulus and Remus. According to this History, this City should have been twice founded; first, not long after the Trojan times, and then again in the fifteenth Age after. But more than this, Antiochus of Syracuse mentioned a third Rome that must have been before the War of Troy, writing, that from Rome came a certain Sicilian fugitive to Morger, the Son of Italus, King of Italy. By reason of this uncertainty of the Founders, some, whose prejudice against the Empire of the City moved them with envy, accounted it no other than a receptacle and fortress of Barbarians, Fugitives, and Vagabonds; and were ready to call into question the History of Romulus, as a mere invention made to hide the despicable Original of so great a Commonwealth.

12. Whether it was a new Plantation, or reparation of an old Town, there is great variety of opinions concerning the Time thereof. Timeus the Sicilian made its Foundation contemporary with that of Carthage, and the 38. year before the first Olympiad. But of those which seem to approach nearer to truth, some place the foundation of it in the sixth Olympiad; whereof Velleius Paterculus assigneth the first year, others the third, and Varro (from the opinion of Tarutius, a most excellent Mathematician) the fourth: which opinion is followed by many Authors of great note, (besides Augustus, Claudius, Severus, and Philip, Emperours, in their Secular Games) as Plutarch, Tacitus, Dio, Gellius, Confrinius, Onuphrius, Cesar Baronius, Tornelius, Joseph Scaliger, and Jacobus Capellus. Solinus will have Pomponius Atticus and Cicero to reckon from the third year of this Olympiad; but as Pliny, Paterculus and Livy, to Cicero varieth, sometimes counting from the Calends of January of the foregoing, one while of this, and another of the following year. M. Porcius Cato, knowing that Rome was built something before the seventh Olympiad, not standing upon minute and scrupulous deductions, began the Æra of the City from the first of January that fell in the first year of that Olympiad; and so the year of his own Consulship he said to be the 758. year of the City. This Æra is followed by the Fasti Capitolini, Solinus, Eusebius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, (who taketh pains to prove the account good) Polybius, Signinus, Pighius, Occo, Goltzius, Iaacus Casaubonus upon Polybius, and others, Fabius Pitæor wrote that Rome was built in the eighth Olympiad; the reason whereof, as Capellus thinketh, is, because Romulus might then have finished the Wall and Ditch; some deriving the Æra of a Building from laying of the Foundation, and others from the finishing of the Structure. Lastly, L. Cincius, as Dionysius informeth us, held that the City was built in the second year of the twelfth Olympiad. In this great variety of opinions we have most reason to approve that of Varro, the most learned of all Romans, who placeth the beginning of Rome in the fourth year of the sixth Olympiad, the sixth of Jotham King of Judah, and the seventh of Pekah King of Israel, about the time that the Ephori were made at Sparta, in the days of Charops the first Archon at Athens for ten years, A.M. 3252.

From the Building of the City to the Destruction of the Kingdom. The space of Two hundred forty five years.

The founding of Rome.

I. Romulus, being 18 years old, laid the foundation of the Walls on the (a) eleventh day before the Calends of May, (which answereth to the fourth of October, after the Julian account) betwixt the hours of two and three, the Sun being in Libra, and the Moon in Taurus, Jupiter in Pisces, Saturnus, Venus, Mars and Mercury in Scorpio, according to the Computation of Tarrutius, the most noble of Mathematicians. (b) Varro, (c) Ovid, and several others write that Rome was founded on the Parilia, or Palilia. Festus telleth us the Parilia were so called à Pariendo, from bringing forth; those Stars in the head of Taurus, (or which make up the head of themselves, as Gellius criticizeth against Tiro) named Hyades, and under which Rome was founded, being also called Parilicium, and Palicinium Sidus. Servius noteth that Pales was the Roman Goddess of Fodder, to whom a Solemnity being observed on the eleventh of the Calends of May, it had the name of Palilia. Capellus thinketh that, according to the mind of Tarrutius, the first year of the City commenced from the first of January, and Capricornus, in the new Moon, three months after the foundation was laid.

The number of the Colony.

2. The number of the Colony amounted scarcely to 300 horse, and 3000 foot, wherewith Romulus (which some make but the diminutive of Romus his true name) planted this new City, called Rome after himself. To increase the number of his Citizens, he opened a Sanctuary to all malefactors and discontented persons, who then resorted to him in great numbers from the Countries adjoining. Setting about the frame of the Commonwealth, by his Grandfather's advice, he remitted it to the choice of the People what kind of Government they would have; whereby, obtaining the Kingdom in way of gift, his Power became the more plausible. He divided the people into three Tribes, every Tribe into ten Curie, and every Curia into ten parts or Decurie, over all which he appointed Officers. According to the number of the Curie he divided the Grounds into thirty parts, except-excepting one portion for publick use, and another for superstitious Ceremonies. He made a distinction of his People according to honour and dignity, giving to the better sort the name of Patres, either for that they were elder, had Children, for the Nobility of their stock; or, if Detractors may be heard, he therefore named these Patritii, because they alone could show their Fathers, the other multitude being a rabble of Fugitives that had no free and ingenuous parentage. Wherefore when an Assembly of the People was called by the King, the Patritians were by the Crier cited by their own and Fathers name; but the inferior sort, or Plébeians, were gathered together by the found of Ox-horns. Having distinguished his Subjects into these two Ranks, he ordered what should follow due. The Patritii were to take care of Superstition, bear Offices of Magistracy, administer Justice, and govern the Commonwealth together with the King: The Plébeians to till the Fields, feed Cattel, and exercise Trades; left by their meddling in the Government, and by mutual Contention of the poorer and richer sort, such Seditions might arise as were too visible in other Commonwealths.

Patrons and Clients.

3. To bind each to the other, he commended to the Patritians certain of the Plébeians, whom they should protect and countenance; liberty being given to the common sort to make choice of whom they would for their Patrons. This custom of Patron and Client was very ancient in Greece, especially amongst the Thessalians and Athenians; where yet the Clients were very imperiously used, their Patrons imposing on them services ill befitting Free-men, and beating them like Slaves, if they disobeyed their commands. The Athenians called them Thetes for their service, and the Thessalians Peneſte, upbraiding them with their Fortune. But Romulus refined the use of Patronage, rendering it profitable unto both. Patrons by him were ordered to advise their Clients concerning Law, of which they were ignorant, and take care of them as well absent as present, as their own Children, in what concerned money and contracts, undertaking Suits for them when oppressed, and procuring them quiet both as to publick and private business. On the other hand it was the duty of Clients, to help their Patrons with money in the marriage of their Daughters, if need should be, or redeem them and their Sons if taken captive; to bear the charges of private Sutes or publick Fines, and that at their own cost, in way of gratitude; to assist them with their purses in defraying the charge of Magistracy, or honourable employments. This was common to both, that neither ought to accuse the other, nor give any testimony or suffrage against each other, or to be reckoned amongst his Enemies; which if any one did, or was, he was held guilty of Treason by Romulus his Law, and it was lawful for any one to kill him. Hereby, for many Ages, this Patronage continued in force, and was as effectual for love and mutual help as Consanguinity or Alliance: it was the glory of the Nobility to have many Clients devolved upon them from their Ancestors, and obtained by their own virtue. But not onely the Plébeians in the City found themselves secured by this Patronage, but in process of time all Colonies, associate Cities, and such as were subdued by war, had their Patrons, to whom many times the Senate would remit such Controversies as were brought before it from the said Cities or Commonwealths, and ratify their Judgement. Lastly, Sichius firm Concord followed this Constitution of Romulus, that, for 730 years, as Dionysius reckoneth, though many and great Contentions arose betwixt the Nobility and Commons about the Commonwealth, (as is usual in all both great and little States) yet it never came to blood or slaughter, but, mutually yielding and granting, all Controversies were composed by civil Expostulations; till Caius Gracchus, Tribune of the people, overthrew the peace of the City: after which, they neither spared to kill and banish one another, nor to commit any other wickedness, whereby they might compass Victory and their own devices.

The Senate.

4. After this, Romulus resolved to chuse a Senate, which should assist him in the Government, and from amongst the Patritians selected 100 after this manner. Out of them all he first made choice of one particular man, to whom, when he was elected, contrained to be absent in the Wars, he committed the Government of the City: Then he commanded every Tribe to chuse three men, such as were eminent for birth and wisdom; and every Curia to elect three out of the Patritians. This number he called a Senate, either for their age, or virtue; or because, as Festus will have it, nothing was done without their permission, the Senate being named à ſinendo. Perceiving after this, that he stood in need of a Guard for his own person, he caused the Curie by their Suffrages to chuse him out 300 young men, (ten out of each) whom he called Celeres, from their readiness to execute his commands, as most have written; or, according to Valerius Antias, from their Captain,

SECT. 2. Captain, whose name was Celer. Under him were three Centurions, and other inferior Officers. This Company with their Spears defended the King in the City, and received his Orders: in Battels were the first Leaders, and the Keepers of his body, beginning the fight first, and retreating last of all; which custom Diomsius thinketh Romulus to have taken from the Lacedæmonians. Things being thus appointed, he limited unto all their work and honours. The King's duty was to take care of their Superstitions, to look to the preservation of the Laws and Customs, either natural or written; to decide the most weighty Causes betwixt man and man, and refer those of lesser consequence to the Senate, unto which he was also to have an inspection. He was to call together the Senate, assemble the people, first to speak his opinion, and raise what was approved by the major part. This was the King's work at home, who in the Wars had absolute authority. To the Senate this honour and power was given, to debate and resolve about such things as the King propounded, which were decreed by the greater number of voices, agreeable to the constitution of Lacedæmon, as our Author observeth. To the People he committed three things; to create Magistrates, make Laws, and resolve about War what was propounded by the King: yet so, as that the authority of the Senate interposed. All the whole Multitude together gave not their votes, but the Curie apart; and whatsoever seemed good to most, was referred to the Senate: which custom was afterwards changed, when the Senate did not confirm the Decrees of the People, but the People the Resolves of the Senate.

5. For the increase of the City, besides the opening of a Sanctuary, (which Diomsius ranketh after this settlement of the Civil Policy) he forbade, when any Town was taken, that Prisoners of ripe age should be slain or sold, or their grounds left untill'd; but commanded a Colony to be sent from Rome, to which part of them should be assigned, and some of the Strangers to be admitted to the Freedom of the City: which device our Author esteemeth of great weight and consequence. He made many good and profitable Laws, whereof most were unwritten.

He ordained in reference to Marriage, that the Wife should be partaker of all that was her Husband's, when chaste and modest. If he died intestate, she was his absolute Heir; and if he left Children, equally with them. When the offended, she was left to his disposal for punishment, who admitted her Kindred to judge with him concerning the fault, if she either violated Chastity, or drank Wine, which Romulus utterly condemned, as an incentive to wantonness. So effectual became this Constitution to the preservation of the conjugal knot, that for 520 years there happened not any Divorce in Rome, till, in the 137. Olympiads, when Marcus Pomponius and Caius Papirius were Consuls, Sp. Carvilius, an eminent man, put away his Wife; and then, though he swore to the Censors, that he did it only to provide for posterity, yet was he ever hated by the people. He gave to Fathers absolute power over their Sons, and that for all their lives, either to imprison, beat, carry away bound to rustic labours, or kill; although the Son bore the greatest Office in the Commonwealth, or were publicly commended and honoured. By virtue of this Law, some eminent Persons, making Orations to the People in opposition to the Senate, in the midst of popular applause, have by their Parents been pulled down from their seats, and led away to be punished according to their pleasure: and as they passed along the Forum, none could deliver or rescue them; not the Consul, Tribune, nor Multitude it self, which they had flattered. And because of this absolute paternal dominion, several valiant men have been put to death for their valour shewed in some way against the Enemy, contrary to the direction or command of their Fathers.

6. He compelled Parents to educate all their Male-children and their eldest Daughters: he permitted a Child younger than three years to be made away, if it was born defective in some member, or monstrous; and yet then was it not to be exposed without approbation of the five next neighbours. If any one broke this Law, he, besides other punishment, forfeited half of his goods. The Father was permitted by the Law-giver to sell his Son, and that three times over, if it happened that he recovered his liberty: a greater power than was had over Slaves, who, if once made free, thenceforth continued. All sordid Arts, and such as were subservient to Luxury, he forbade, which being left to Slaves and Strangers, for a long time the Romans scorned to meddle with. Two courses of life only he enjoyed them, Warfare and Husbandry, allowing a Market once in nine days. He divided equally to them the Grounds, Slaves, and Money, taken from the Enemy. Concerning Injuries, he presently decided all Controversies, or referred them unto others, inflicting punishment according to the crime: and seeing the people people to be by fear best retained in order, he set up his Judgement-seat in the most conspicuous place of the Forum, where his guard of 300 Celeres, and twelve Sergeants, or Lictors, carrying Rods and Axes, and in the view of all men either beating or putting to death Malefactors, made a terrible show. This is the form of the Commonwealth, as Romulus first established it, much admired by Diomsius above all the Constitutions of his own Country-men the Græcians: whose Religion also (as giving occasion to the vulgar sort to condemn their Gods involved in such misfortunes, or to abstain from no iniquity and filthiness to which they heard that their Deities were also obnoxious) he esteemeth vain, frivolous, and dangerous, in comparison of that which was instituted by the Roman Law-giver.

The Rape of the Sabine Virgins.

7. Romulus, considering that there were several powerful Nations round about him, which with evil eyes beheld the growth of his City, bethought with himself how he might contract Amity with them. Concluding, that Affinity was the only means, by the advice and consent of the Senate, he resolved upon a course to provide Wives for his Subjects. He caused, at the suggestion of his Grandfather Nunitor, a solemn Feast, and Exercises in honour of Neptune, to be proclaimed throughout the Country: to which many flocking with their Wives and Children, upon sign given, his men laid hold on such Virgins as were come to see, and violently carried them to their houses. The number of them amounted to 683; for whom Romulus chose out so many Husbands, and married them after their own Country Rites, making them covenant a Society or Communion of Fire and Water: which Custom continued for many Ages. Some write that this happened in the first year of Romulus; but others assign the fourth of his reign for it, which scarcely could be done till matters were somewhat settled. Some delivered, that scarcity of Women was the cause of this Rape: others thought, that by it an occasion was only fought for War: but a third party will have, that by this violent act an Affinity with the neighbouring Cities was endeavoured.

Romulus his defensive wars.

8. Some were grievously moved, and others put a good construction upon the business: but at length the matter broke out into a manifold War, of which that with the Sabines was most grievous. The Cities Cæcina, Antenna and Craustum first began, after they could not persuade the Sabines to join with them. The two former, inhabited by the Aborigines, Romulus presently subdued, and afterwards the latter also, which was a Colony of Alba. The Grounds were divided betwixt some Romans, sent thither to plant, and the old Inhabitants; of whom such as would were made free of the City, and without loss of their former estates, reckoned amongst the Tribes and Curie, to the number of 3000: so that now the Roman Footmen were increased to 6000 men. Upon the Victory over Cæcina and Antenna, he first triumphed, and designed a plot for a Temple to Jupiter Feretrius, (so called from Romulus his bringing home in triumph the Spoils of Acron the King of Cæcina, whom he slew. The Spoils were named by the Romans Opima Spolia.) The plot of ground was about fifteen foot long, and this was the original of the Capitol. Having obtained a great name for his valour and clemency, many eminent men went over to him with their families, amongst whom was Celivus, who gave name to an Hill in the City: and some whole People committed themselves to his protection, (having taken example from the Medullini) and received Colonies from Rome. This success the Sabines fore repined at, laying now the blame one upon another, that they had not withstood the beginnings of the Roman Greatness: wherefore they resolved to correct their former carelessness by double diligence, and assembling together at Gwer, their Metropolis, decreed War against Rome for the Spring following, and made choice of T. Tatius their King to be General. Romulus made all possible provision for resistance, fortifying the Capitoline and Aventine Hills. Lucumo from Solonius, a City of Hetruria, brought Auxiliary forces, and Nunitor was not wanting to the assistance of his Grand-son.

9. The Sabines having demanded restitution of their Virgins, and to have the authors of the injury delivered up, (that they might have a more specious pretence for their actions) received no satisfactory answer, and therefore both parties drew out into the field. The Sabines brought 25000 foot, and almost 1000 horse; and the Roman Army contained 20000 foot, and 800 horse; a very great number for a new-built City. Tatius pitched his Tents betwixt the Quirinal and Capitoline Hill, where seeing all places strongly fortified, and small hopes for him to attempt any great matter, as he despaired of doing any good, one Tarpeia, the Daughter of Tarpeius who kept the Capitol, called to his men from above, and and covenanted with them to betray the place into their hands. Concerning the wages he was to receive, several stories, or fables, are related: It is said, that he required to have what they wore on their left arms, meaning their Bracelets; but when he let them in, they threw their Targets which they carried on their left arms upon her, and therewith pressed her to death. Being Masters of the Capitol, they had thereby great advantage to continue the War at their pleasure, and first some light Skirmishes ensued: but at length they resolved to doe their utmost on both sides, and for several days continued the fight, so long as till night severed them, for the most part with equal success. This made the Sabines ferociously bethink themselves, whether they had best carry on the War, or retreat; and the Romans were rather more to seek how to hold out: yet neither party would stoop to desire a Treaty. Whilst they remained in this anxious condition, those Sabine Women who were married to the Romans, and the cause of the War, through the persuasion of Herilia, one of the principal amongst them, became Mediators, and made Peace betwixt these Fathers and Sons-in-law, after the War had lasted six years. The Conditions were, that Romulus and Tatius should reign at Rome, with equal prerogative: that the City from Romulus should be called Rome, but the Citizens Quirites from Cures the native place of Tatius. Such of the Sabines as would, were made free of Rome; and a respect was had of those Matrons who procured the Peace, that they which would live with their Husbands, should be exempted from all work and service, besides spinning and making of Cloath.

10. Some write, that from thirty of these Women which undertook this Reconciliation, to perpetuate their memories, the Tribes were named: but Terentius Varro denied it, alleging that they had names before, and that by such honour given to thirty, the rest of the Women were not passed by and discouraged. For five years the two Kings reigned peaceably together, and joyntly subdued the Camertini, a Colony of the Albans: but in the sixth, it happened that some of Tatius his friends plundering the Lavinians, and by him being protected, notwithstanding Romulus and the Senate judged they were to be given up; moreover killing the Embassadors sent to demand them, wherein they were also born out by him; when he went to Lavinium to sacrifice, or perfwade the injured persons to be quiet, the friends of the Embassadors fell upon and knocked him on the head. Romulus, to his great contentment thus freed from his Partner, made satisfaction to the injured, and burying Tatius at Rome very honourably, subdued Fidenes, a Town five miles off, which had seized on provisions coming to Rome in a time of famine. Thither he sent some of his own to inhabit, according to his custom, and then punished the Crustumini, who had killed those Planters which he placed amongst them; and over them he obtained his second Triumph. The Veii, most powerfull People of Etruria, inhabiting a City no less than Athens, situated upon a craggy Rock, at some twelve miles distance from Rome, found themselves concerned in what the Fidenates suffered, and by an Embasie required the Romans thence to remove their Garrison, and restore the Inhabitants to their whole Demeines. This being denied, they met at Fidenes, and there fought two bloody Battels, wherein Romulus had the better, and triumphed the third time. Plutarch writeth, that the Veientes ridiculously challenged Fidenes to belong to them, and receiving a scornfull answer from Romulus, divided themselves into two parts, whereof with one they fought the Fidenates, and with the other went to meet Romulus, who slew of them above 8000, with the loss of 2000 of his own men. In the next Battel he is fabulously reported to have killed 7000 with his own hand, being half the number that was slain. The Veientes now betook themselves to intreaties, and entred into a League with the Romans for an hundred years, on these Conditions: to quit a great part of their Grounds, with the Salt-pits near the River, and give up fifty Hostages of their most considerable Families. Romulus triumphed over them on the Ides of October, leading with him their Captain, an aged man, who had badly performed his office, for which he was afterwards perfonated by an old man in all Triumphs.

11. This was the last War managed by Romulus, who being grown exceeding high and tyrannical upon his Success, enlarged his Prerogative beyond those bounds he had formerly set to it, and made use onely of the Senate to ratifie his commands. Hereby he contracted the hatred of that Order, (though the Soldiers loved him) which brought him to an untimely death. Some think he was torn in pieces in the Senate-house, and the Senators by piece-meal carried out his body under their gowns, so that it was never seen. Others wrote, that having drawn out the people to the place called Capra Palus, and there making an Oration to them, a sudden darkness darkness and Tempest happened, wherein he vanished and departed from amongst mortals. The Senators took occasion from the secrecy of their fact, and concealment of his body, to perfwade the multitude that he was taken up amongst the Gods; and Julius Proculus, a man of prime Nobility and credit amongst the Patritians, put all out of doubt, by swearing most religiously that he appeared to him in the high-way, and told him, that it pleased the Gods, from whom he came, so long to let him continue amongst men, till he had founded a City, whose Empire and glory should excell, and then again that he should return to Heaven. He bade him farewell, and tell the Romans, that if they did but use Temperance and Valour, they should in power excell all Mortals. And he would be a propitious God unto them, under the name of Quirinus. He lived 55 years, and reigned 37, in which space he much advanced the State of the City, which who first planted with him, were not much above 2000 foot, and scarce 300 horse; but when he died, he left of the one kind 46000, and almost 1000 of the other fort. After his Grand-father's death, he succeeded in the Kingdom of Alba, which he governed by Deputies, continuing his residence at Rome. The day on which he died, was the Nones of Quintilis, (afterwards called July) which answereth to the 26. of May, as the Calendar was reformed by Julius Caesar. It was named Nonæ Caprotine from the place where he vanished; and Erga Populi, because the people astonished at the King's death took them to their heels. Tarrutius the Mathematician observed, that the Life of this Prince was signalized by three Eclipses of the Sun: one at his Conception, which is also the first that is observed by Authors; another the same day he founded Rome; and the third on the day of his death; concerning which, for that the calculation of the former is rather founded upon Astrological than Astronomical Principles, Jacobus Capellus is to be consulted.

12. Romulus dying childless, the Senate for a year's space retained the Power in their own hands, which is called an Inter-regnum. They governed by their courses, each man five days. But the People murmuring, and giving out, that for one Tyrant they had got an hundred, at length they resolved that a King should be chosen. The Sabines thought it reasonable he should be of their Nation, not having had any since Tatius; and the other were averse to a Stranger, being desirous he should be some one of the Patritians: but at length the Fathers fixed upon Numa Pompilius, a Sabine, a man of almost forty years of age, and the most considerable for knowledge and ability of that time, who by consent of the People was advanced to the Government. At first he excused himself; but solicited by his Father, and Marcus his kinsman, not to let slip so fair an opportunity of his own and Countrey's preferment, he accepted of it. He thought it policy to raise that City by Laws, and religious Customs, which had been founded by Force and Arms, and to soften the Genius of it by diversion from Warfare; it being necessary to employ a People well at home, as exercise them abroad. He built a Temple to Janus, which was to stand open in time of War, and be shut in peace, as it continued all his reign. But it onely happened so to be twice from his time to that of Tiberius Caesar, as some observe. The first occasion was in the Consulship of Titus Manlius and Marcus Attilius, after the ending of the first Punic War; and the second in Augustus his reign, after he had subdued Antonius and Cleopatra, at what time there was a universal Peace. Numa disbanded the Royal Guard of the 300 Celeres, as standing in no need of them. To the two Flamines of Jupiter and Mars, he added the third of Romulus. To him is also ascribed the bringing in of the Pontifices, whereof he himself was one, and the Original of which name is so much controverted. He also ordained the Vestal Nuns, and the Feciales, a sort of Priests which judged concerning the equity of War, and denounced it. His Religion much suited, in the manner and strictness thereof, with that of the Pythagoreans, which caused this report of his being contemporary and conversing with Pythagoras; although this Philosopher was born 100 years after his death. The reason of this mistake, besides the ignorance of the times, was his familiarity with Pythagoras a Lacedæmonian, who gave him advice concerning the ordering of his Kingdom, travelling in Italy in the sixteenth Olympiad, the third year of which was the beginning of Numa's reign, according to Plutarch.

13. As Pythagoras taught that the Principle of all things is not to be perceived by sense, or liable to motion, but invisible, immortal, and to be apprehended by the understanding alone; so Numa forbade the Romans to use the Image of any God which represented him after the form of a Man, or any other living Creature. Neither in these ancient times was there any painted, carved, or molten Image amongst them: but for the first 170 years, though they built Temples

SECT. 2. and Sacred places, yet had they no Image at all; because they thought it wickedness, to liken more excellent things to those below them, and thought God no otherwise to be perceived than by the Mind. Numa divided those Grounds amongst the poorer sort which Romulus had gained in his Wars, causing his Subjects to apply themselves to Husbandry, to cultivate their Minds as well as the Earth; and that he might take away the distinction of Roman and Sabine, which threatened the State with endless emulation and prejudice, he distinguished them all according to their Trades and occupations, making every Art a particular Company and Fellowship. He abated the rigour of that Law made by Romulus, concerning the power of Fathers over their Children, ordaining it should not be lawful for them to sell such Sons as by their leave had married, because it was unjust that a Woman which had married a Free-man should be constrained to live with a Slave. He reformed the Year, which in the time of Romulus was quite out of all order: some months had fewer than 20 days, some had 35, and some above; the variety of the several courses of Sun and Moon was not understood; but only this aimed at, that the Year should consist of 360 days.

He reformed the Year.

14. Numa, considering that a Solar Year exceeded the Lunar by eleven days, (the one consisting of 354, and the other of 365) doubled these eleven days, and every other year inserted a Month after February, consisting of 22 days, and by the Romans called Mercedonius, because at that time wages were wont to be paid. He changed the order of the Months, assigning to March (formerly the first) the third place, to January the first, and February the second; whereof this was the last, and the other the eleventh, in the days of Romulus. Many have been of opinion, that Numa added January and February to the rest of the Months, and that formerly the Romans had but ten, which appeareth by the name of December, the last month, and because the fifth and sixth months from March were called Quintilis and Sextilis. Thus March must have been the beginning of the Year, which Romulus so named from Mars his supposed Father. The second was April, so called from Pennis, as some thought, (because her superstitious Worship was performed in it, when the Women were crowned with Myrtle as they washed;) or, as others gathered, from the opening of Plants at that time of the year. The third was May, named from Maia, and sacred to Mercury. The fourth was June, from Junio, as some thought: others deriving the names of these two from Maiores and Juniores, the Elder and Younger. The rest had their names from their order, as Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, November, December. Afterwards Quintilis was from Julius Caesar called July; Sextilis August, from Augustus. September and October the Emperour Domitian changed into his own names, but presently after he was killed they recovered their former. Only the two last ever retained their first appellations. Of those months which Numa either added, or ranked, February was so called from the Expiations which used to be in it, signified by the word Februa: then they were wont to make Parentations to the dead, and celebrate the Lupercalia, certain Sacrifices and Games in honour of Pan, much like to the Sacrifice of Expiations. January was named of Janus, which Numa seemeth to have set before March, because he would shew that Civil virtue is ever to be preferred before what is exercised in War: For Janus was accounted one of the most ancient Gods, or Kings, (from whom, reigning in Italy, some make the Romans descended) very studious for civil society and humane converse, and who changed the course of man's life from brutish and savage to an humane and gentle kind. He is therefore feigned to be double-faced, because he brought in another fashion of life than what formerly had been; and had a Temple built by Numa with two doors, that were shut in Peace, and open in War, as was before said. These things Plutarch relateth in the Life of Numa.

15. But Livie, and other considerable Authors, (a) Solinus, (b) Macrobius, (c) Censorinus, write that the first Roman Year consisted but of ten months, and 304 days; six of the months having 30 days, and the other four 31 apiece. But this account differing from the course of the Sun, Numa, to make them agree, added 51 days to the year. That he might make up the twelve months; from the fix, consisting of thirty days, he took one day apiece, and therewith made up 57, which were divided into two months, whereof the one contained 29, and the other 28 days; and so the Year began to have 355. Of this opinion, besides Junius Gracchanus and Ennius, both Varro and Suetonius were, as appeareth out of Censorinus. Yet Licinius Macer and Lucius Fensstella, by the same testimony, (two ancient Writers of Annals) delivered that the first Roman Year consisted consisted of 12 months, agreeable to the former opinion related by Plutarch. This a noble pair of modern Critics prove to have been the truer opinion, affirming that January and February were not added by Numa, but transferred from the end to the beginning of the year; and endeavouring to shew, that they who would have the year to consist but of 10 months make it no shorter than they that are for 12, distinguishing it not so much in number as placing of days: for the Romans in Romulus his time filled up the year, either by assigning more days than thirty to the months, or adding so many in the end thereof as seemed to be wanting. But it sufficeth to have touched these things for the direction of beginners.

(a) C. 9.
(b) Saur. lth. cap. 12.
(c) cap. 20.

16. Numa, to gain credit and obedience to his Constitutions, feigned that he had converse with the Goddess Egeria. He married Tatius, Daughter to Tatius the King, by whom he had a Daughter named Pomptia. Some said he neither had any other Wife nor any more Children: but others both as to Wife and Children differed from them. He lived above 80, reigned 43 years; and at his death was buried with great honour. His body was not burned, (which he forbade) but buried in a Stone-Coffin under the Janiculum; and the Books of his Ceremonies laid by him in another, which being twelve written in Latine, and as many in the Greek tongue, were 400 years after, when Publius Cornelius and Marcus Baebius were Consuls, by water wrought out of the earth, and for that it was thought wickedness to have such things discovered to the multitude, (from whom he also kept them, after the fashion of the Pythagoreans, not communicating discipline by writing, but only by word of mouth) burned by command of the Senate. He kept the State in constant Peace, and his ability herein contributed to the general quiet of Italy; so that, by the example of his Reign, Plutarch judgeth that saying of Plato to be verified, That the only means whereby men should be made happy, would be, to have a Philosophical mind and Regal power concur in a Prince, who would make Virtue superiour to Dishonesty. But the fortune of the succeeding Kings added to the lustre of his glory: For of the five which followed, the last was cast out, and died in exile; and none of the rest obtained a natural and quiet end, according to Plutarch.

Tullus Hostilius.

17. Numa being dead, and the Government devolved upon the Senate, after several Inter-reges, at length Tullus Hostilius was created King by the universal consent of the City. His Grand-father was that Hostilius, who most gallantly behaved himself against the Sabines at the Cittadel, and married of that Nation the Daughter of Herfilius. After much valour shown, he was slain in battel, and left a young Son, who at ripeness of age, of a noble Matron, begat this Tullus Hostilius, the third King of Rome; whose beginning, according to the account of Dionysius, was in the second year of the 27. Olympiad, wherein Eurybates the Athenian was Vicitor, when Leostatus was Archon at Athens, in the 83. year of the City, and the 31. of Manasse King of Judah. At his first beginning he purchased the favour of the poorer sort, by dividing unto them, man by man, that portion of Land which the two former Kings had kept to bear their charges, saying, that his own inheritance would suffice for his own expences. Left these should want room, he took in the Hill Celivus, where such as wanted habitation, and now had gotten grounds, built them houses, and he also dwelt himself. He was not onely of a different temper from Numa, but, as Livie describeth him, more fiery than Romulus, being as well moved by his proper inclination, as the glory of his Grand-father; so that he fought, and greedily embraced, all occasions for War. It was not long ere one was presented from the Albans, who made Depredations in the Roman Territories, and were again robbed by the Romans. At that time Caius Clivius governed Alba, who envying the growth of Rome, fought to stir up Division, and raise War betwixt the two Cities. Dionysius writeth, that for this end he privately procured some to prey upon the Romans, knowing they would revenge the injury; and when they did so upon such as they could take, he perswaded the Albans that they had received a great affront, and excited them to take up Arms.

18. Embassadors were sent to Rome to demand Restitution, and such as had been Authors of the injury to be given up into their hands. This Hostilius being aware of, and knowing that they who first refused to make satisfaction would bear the Odium of the War, caused some of his friends kindly to entertain the Embassadors, pretending he was by necessary occasions hindered from giving them audience, till he first sent some of his own to Alba to demand Restitution. They received a sharp repulse from Clivius; whereof Hostilius having notice, then gave audience to the Albans, told them how those that he sent had already received such an answer as argued the League quite broken: whereupon he

SECT. 2. denounced a just and necessary War against the Albani, which he would carry on not only with his domestick forces, but by the aid of his other Subjects and Dependents. Both parties then made all possible preparations, and drew out their Forces to a place afterwards called the Ditch of Clulius, some five miles distant from Rome. When they expected suddenly to decide the quarrel, Clulius was found dead in his Tent, whether by some secret practice upon himself, by grief, or any other means, is uncertain. Into his place was chosen Metius Sufpetius, a man of a turbulent spirit, and scarcely able for warlike matters, but thought fit for the place, because as great an Incendiary as his Predecessor. Yet sensible of danger that hung over his head from the Fidenates, (who gaped after the destruction of both) he drew out the War in length, and at last fearful to lose all, was inclinable to a present Compofure. Hoftilius was now also not averse to a determination of the business, being desirous to punish the Fidenates and Veientes, who, formerly overcome by Romulus, had submitted to the obedience of Rome, and in the days of Numa taken occasion of his peaceable Government, to provide for the absolute shaking off of the yoke. This time they thought presented them with a fit opportunity; for, gathering together at Fidena, they were ready, when the Albani and Romans should in battle have weakened each other, to fall upon both.

19. This Plot discovered, wrought fo upon both the Captains, that they came to a Conference, wherein much being alleged for the justice and right of both parties, at length it was agreed, that three persons on each side should by Combat decide the quarrel, and that City, whose Champions should have the better, obtain preeminence and command over the other. Whilst every Officer desired to be one of the three, Sufpetius bethought himself of two ternions of Brothers who were most fit, as he thought, to take it upon them. One Segunius of Alba had two Daughters, whereof one he married to Curvius his Fellow-citizen, and the other to Horatius a Roman. It happened that both being with child at the same time, brought forth each of them three Sons at the first birth, whom their Parents educated as the hope of their Families. To these it was that Sufpetius thought the Combat concerning Principality was to be committed, being of equal years, strength, and courage. The motion was embraced by the parties, who dispensed with their private Affection, (no whit unsuitable to their Consanguinity) now that the honour and welfare of their Country was concerned. In the Combat two of the Horatii were slain first, and the third left to deal with three adversaries, spirited afresh by the great advantage they had of him; but warily retreating, so as he might have but one upon him at a time, he flew them all, and Rome in him remained Conqueror. As he returned into the City, he was met by his Sister, who fell upon him with chiding and outrageous words, for imbruing his hands in the blood of his Cousin-germans, whereof one was contracted to her. Now elevated by his success, and transported with a certain kind of ecstasical love to his Country, he killed her in the place, as one that, preferring private respect before publick good, was unworthy to live. Hereof he was accused, and Tullius neither thinking it seemly to quit or condemn him, as some say, created the Duoviri for capital Judgement, who condemned him: but, if so, there lying Appeal from these Officers to the People, the Multitude granted his life to the tears of his Father, who not only took not ill his Daughter's death, but esteemed it an heroic act, and gave her an ignominious Burial.

20. Hoftilius dealt moderately with the Albani; but Metius Sufpetius, their Dictator, or King, thinking his credit much impaired by the event of the Combat, fought how he might betray the Romans, and wrest the Power out of their hands. He dealt therefore underhand with the Fidenates and Veientes, who now, called to account for their Double dealings, brake out into open Rebellion, and by promise of assistance, encouraged them in their enterprise. And when the Romans and the other came to engage, he resolved to stand neuter till he saw which party had the better, intending then to clofe with it. The Romans were discouraged to see their Friends stand aloof, suspecting the Treachery; which Tullius also apprehending, gave out, that it was by his order, as meaning by some Strategem to surprize the Enemy: upon which report the Fidenates and their Companions were discouraged, and at length by the Romans, who resumed their courage, put to the rout. After the Victory Hoftilius called the Albani together, and laying open the Treachery of Sufpetius, (which favoured the more of Treason, because he had trusted him as his inward Friend, and kept him three years in his place) caused him to be pulled in pieces; having beforehand sent Marcus Horatius to Alba, who who razed the City, and translated the Inhabitants thereof to Rome, after it had stood about 487 years, according to the account of Dionysius, which is to be preferred before the other of Livie, or that of L. Florus, an Author not to be relied on, either as to Chronology, or order and disposition of matters, to say no more.

Alba destroyed.

21. To this end came Alba, through the power of its own Colony, having flourished with Riches, numbers of Inhabitants, and been the Mother of thirty Latin Towns. After this, Tullus, having fully brought under the Fidenates, moved War against the Sabines, for robbing such Romans as used to traffick into the Country, and refusing to make restitution of the goods. He overthrew them at the Wood called Malitiosa Sylva, and forced them to beg Peace. Now also the Latines and Romans fell out, because they refused to yield obedience to these, who challenged it as due to their City, which had conquered the Metropolis. The War was managed for five years with great moderation; onely, besides continual Depredations, Hoftilius punished Medullia for an example, which in the time of Romulus had received a Roman Colony. Otherwise no Battle was fought, nor any Town taken and plundered; which made both inclinable to Peace. But at this time Tullus Hoftilius died, having reigned 32 years; some say by Lightning, with his whole Family, for neglect of the Religion instituted by Numa: but most believed him taken away by the practices of his Successor, though Dionysius holdeth their opinion to be improbable.

Ancus Marcius.

22. After the death of Tullus, the State fell into an Inter-regnum, according to the custom, and, by the Inter-rex and Senate, Ancus Marcius was elected King; who being confirmed by the People, began his Reign in the second year of the 35. Olympiad, wherein Sphernus the Lacedemonian was Victor, at what time Darius was annual Archon at Athens. He (who, according to what Festus writeth, had the Surname of Ancus from his crooked Arm, which he could not stretch out in length) was Grand-son to Numa, by his Daughter Pompilia. She was married to Marcius, the Son of that Marcius, who, being the Kinsman of Numa, came with him to Rome, after he had earnestly perswaded him to take upon him the Kingdom; and being elected into the Senate, after the King's death, stood in competition with Hoftilius for his place, and missing of it laid violent hands on himself. Marcius his Son marrying Pompilia the Daughter of Numa, (whether by Tatia or Lucretia, is uncertain) begot on her this Ancus Marcius, who was five years old at the death of both his Grand-fathers. Ancus considering that much of the Superstition brought in by Numa was neglected, set himself to restore the use thereof, alleging to the people, that the Diseases, Pestilence, and other innumerable Calamities which had lately fallen upon the City, together with the disastrous end of Hoftilius, proceeded from neglect of their Gods. He advised them to return to Husbandry, and other peaceable employments, neglecting violence, and the profit that cometh by War. The State being thus restored, he thought, as his Grand-father had lived, so to pass his time free from all War and molestation: but he found his expectation crossed, for that he was compelled to be a Warriour against his will, and was never free from peril and tumult. Scarcely had he begun to reign, and modelled the Commonwealth, when the Latines, contemning him as a Sluggard, and unfit for military employment, made Depredations upon the Roman Territories. Making preparation for War, Livie writeth, that he first denounced it, sending to the Latines beforehand, and now constituted the Office of the Feciales, the Rules whereof he took from the Equicoli, an ancient People.

23. He surprized Politorium, a Town of the Latines, the Inhabitants of which he took from Rome, where (for that the ancient Romans inhabited the Palatine, the Sabine the Capitoline, and the Celian had been given to the new Denizens of Alba) to them was granted the Aventine Hill to pollets, other Neighbours being added, when, within a while, Tilene and Sicania were taken. The Latines, much concerned at this loss, conspired against him for the Spring following; but at several times he defeated their united powers, and forced them to ask Peace: so did he the Fidenates, Vulsci, Veientes, and such Sabines as, not yet having felt the strength of Rome, sorely repined at the success of an upstart City. He laid a wooden bridge over the River Tiber, and fortified the Janiculum on the other side with a wall, having by a bridge united it to the City: and in the middle of Rome he placed a Prison for Malefactors. Neither did he only extend the Pomerium or Area of the City, but enlarged its Dominion. For having taken from the Veientes the Messan Forrest, his Territories reached to the Sea, upon which, at the mouth of Tiber, he built a Town called Offida, to secure the profit of Navigation unto his Subjects; for thither Commodities being brought by Ship, were in lesser Vessels

SECT. 2. conveyed to the City. Ancus Marcius reigned 24 years, coming behind the commendations of none of his Predecessors, either for the glory of Peace or War.

24. Ancus being dead, (Of a natural death, as should seem by Historians, save that Plutarch, as was said, included him in the number of those four that came to untimely ends) the Senate received power from the People to order the Affairs of the Commonwealth, and created certain Inter-reges, who holding the Assemblies of the Commonwealth, was chosen King, and began his reign about the second year of the 41. Olympiad, wherein Cleonides the Theban was Victor, Enioclides being Archon at Athen, the 139. of the City, and the 30. of Josiah King of Judah. This man being of foreign extraction, what his Original was, why he came to Rome, and how he attained to the Kingdom, is to be considered. There was a Corinthian, Demaratus by name, of the race of the Bacchiads, who trafficking much into Hetruria, changed his Merchandise for Tuscan Commodities, and thereby growing very wealthy, when Troubles arose at home by means of Cypselus his Tyranny, with all his goods failed from Corinth, and fixed himself at Tarquinia, a City of Hetruria; where marrying a noble Matron, of her he begat two Sons, called by the Hetruscan names of Aruns and Lucumon. Aruns died without hope of issue; Demaratus for grief followed him not long after: so that Lucumon, possessed of the whole Inheritance, began to elevate his designs, and to look after some place of Magistracy in his Country. Here he received a repulse, not being able to procure any mean Office; at which forely disdain, he heard that Rome received Strangers with great courtesy, and gave them free admission unto Honours. He then resolved to remove thither with his goods and friends, and after his arrival, was much made of by Ancus, to whom offering his Patrimony for the publick good, as exceeding that of a private man, he received Freedom of the City for himself and followers, with ground to build houses, and for their sustenance. Now he changed his name from Lucumon to Lucius, and his Wife from Tanaquil to Gaia Cecilia, and from the place of his birth superadded that of Tarquinia. During the reign of Ancus, who chose him into the Senate, he flourished in great esteem with him, and in the favour of the People; in War no man shewing himself more hardy, nor in Council more dextrous, prudent, or successful; and his Integrity seemed such unto the King, that he left him Guardian to his two Sons, whereof both were under age, and one but yet an infant.

25. He took advantage at the Minority of the eldest, as yet scarcely fourteen years old, whom sending out of the way, under pretence of hunting, he made a Speech to the People, faith Livie, wherein he plainly begged the Kingdom, drawing to his private interest the example of Tatius and Numa, whom, being meer Strangers, they had chosen to reign over them: whereas He was not absolutely such, having lived a good space in Rome, and been trained up both in civil and military Affairs under Ancus. He urged then his Liberality towards them. Which things not being merely pretended, he obtained his end, and was the first that came to the Government through his own ambitious seeking. His first War was with the Latines, from whom he took several Towns, and amongst the rest Collatia, over which he placed Governour his Nephew Aruns Tarquinus, the posthume issue of his Brother, and furnished Egerius from his poverty, (having no Patrimony) and Clautius from this place, which Surname continued to his Posterity. Having forced the Latines to beg Peace, notwithstanding their supplies out of Hetruria, he turned his Arms against the Sabines; whom after he had also forced to submit, all Hetruria combined against him, because he retained such prisoners as he had taken of the Auxiliaries by them to the Sabines. It was decreed amongst them, that what Town forever refused to joyn against him should not be accounted of their Body; and they presently possessed themselves of Fidene, a Roman Colony. But he so ordered the matter, that overthrowing them in sundry Battels, and preparing for another Expedition, they were humbled; to purchase Peace owned him for their Prince, and, as tokens of fealty and allegiance, sent him the Ensigns of Sovereignty wherewith their Kings had wont to be adorned. These were a Crown of Gold, an Ivory Chair, a Scepter on the top of which was an Eagle, a Coat of purple wrought with Gold, and a purple Gown pinked; like to the Robes of the Lydian and Persian Kings, save that it was not four-square, but of a semicircular figure. Some wrote also that they sent 12 Axes for so many Cities, it being their custom for every Magistrate in his own Town to have an Axe with Rods carried before him, and in a common Expedition twelve to be born before their General. Others contended that Romulus used these Axes and Rods as a badge of his Authority to punish Offenders; but Dionysius replieth, that Romulus might learn this custom of the Hetrus-

SECT. 2. fans, and if not, yet might Tarquinus have these sent to him, seeing the People of Rome afterwards used to send Diadems and Scepters to such Kings as they confirmed; which these Princes received, although they had worn the same Ornaments before.

26. In nine years he finished the Hetruscan War, and then fell again upon the Sabines, (who alone contended with the Romans for Superiority) a warlike Nation, possessing a large and fertile Country not far distant from Rome. Over them he obtained his third Triumph, and providing for another Expedition, they prevented him by their intreaties, giving up themselves fully into his power, whom he received on the same terms as formerly he had done the Hetruscan. These were his Military actions. At the beginning of his reign, that he might bind the People to him, he chose out an hundred of the Plebeians, who for valour or wisdom were most eminent, and added them to the Senate, which now first consisted of 300. Romulus at the beginning chose 100 out of the first Planters, then added 100 more of the most noble of the Sabines, who with these of Tarquinus were called Patres conscripti, and the last Patres minorum gentium. Zonaras agreeth with Dionysius concerning the number of Senators made by Romulus, adding, that Tatius and he at first consulted with their Senators apart, but at length they were joyned together; so that those are not to be heard, who will have but 200 in all during the time of the Kings, and 100 afterwards added by Brutus. He increased the number of the Vestal Nuns from four to seven, adorned the Forum, built the Walls of the City (before patched up in haste) with four-square stones, whereof each was a Cart-load. He caused the common Sinks to be made for voiding the filth of the City into Tiber; a work so admirable, that Dionysius thinketh, from the magnificence of it, as from the Aqueducts, and the high Campled ways, the Amplitude of the Roman Empire appeared. And this is manifested from what C. Aquilius wrote, that those Sinks being once stopped, the Censors spent 1000 Talents in cleaning them. In the Circus Maximus (a place dedicated to the beholding of Games and Exercises, betwixt the Palatine and Aventine Hills) he caused Seats to be raised for Spectators, whereas, before, all stood; and he distinguished their places according to their dignity.

27. Tarquinus intended to add three Centuries of Horsemen, named after himself and his friends, to the former three instituted by Romulus. That King first chose 300 out of the three Tribes, or Legions, and, after the taking in of the Sabines, increased the Legions, so that each contained 4000, whence it was called Quadrata, as Festus observeth. Yet afterwards a Legion comprised full 60 many men as were found convenient for the service of the Commonwealth. But he was forbidden by Astius Nevius to change the Constitution of Romulus, and therefore, without increase of the Centuries, doubled the number of the men. This Nevius was the most famous Angur that Rome ever knew, and so well versed in his Art, that he never missed in his Predictions. Tarquinus on a time, to try him, asked if that was possible to be done which he had in his thoughts; who answering, Yea, he laughed him to scorn, saying, that he had thought of cutting a Whetstone with a Razor which he held in his hand: but Nevius still replying he should do it, and bidding him to strike hard, he cut through it. This much enhanced the reputation of his skill, and he flourished thenceforth with great honour, till at length he was suddenly missing, and his body never could be found, which turned to the disquiet of Tarquinus. For the Sons of Ancus Marcius, now grown men, grudged him their Father's Kingdom, and often thought of thrusting him out, expecting much from martial men, who generally bore love to their Father's memory. Now they accused him to the People of having made away the Angur, (because he had contradicted his devices) and created him some trouble; till Tullius his Son-in-law answered the objections, and cleared him of the Calumny. Missing of their design this way, they counterfeited repentance; and being easily reconciled to the old man, out of respect to their Father, cloaked their malice for three years. Then they clothed two of their Companions like Shepherds, who going to the Court, and pretending to be slain out, did beat each other, and called loud upon the King for Justice, having at their backs other Conspirators apparelled also in rustick weeds, who offered to give Testimony on both sides. Being called in to the King they wounded him to death, and betaking themselves to their heels were caught, confessed who were authors of the Plot, and received their just reward. To this end came Tarquinus (surnamed Prius), after his Grand-son of the same name had obtained the Kingdom) about 80 years old, when he had reigned 38 years, and done many and great good Offices for the Commonwealth.

SECT. 2.

Servius Tullius
his descent and education.

28. Tarquinius Priscus being dead, Servius Tullius his Son-in-law succeeded him in the fourth year of the 50. Olympiad, wherein Epitides the Laconian was Victor, when Archestratides was Archon at Athens: concerning whose Original, and private life, something is first to be spoken. A certain man of Corniculum, a Town in Latium, of Royal blood, was slain when Tarquinius took the place, and left his wife Ocrisia big with Child; which Woman Tarquinius gave to his Queen Tanagail. Ocrisia then was delivered of a Son in the King's house, named Tullius, and surname Servius by her in remembrance of her Bondage. When being an Infant he lay in the Cradle, a flame of fire is said to have appeared, and encompassed his head; which raised great expectation of him in Tanagail, a Woman skillful in the mysteries of her Countrey. She brought her Husband into a great opinion of him, so that he was educated by them, and answering what had been conceived of him, at length was made their Son-in-law: then abroad he had Command in the Army, and at home managed publick Affairs for the King when grown old; in all things behaving himself with such integrity, valour, and prudence, as purchased him the love of all the people. Now whereas Tarquinius had at his death no Sons (as Dionysius maketh most manifest) but left two Grand-sons both Infants, Tanagail having a desire that Tullius should succeed him, kept his death private for some time, till he had procured the people to banish the Marcii: giving out that the King, dangerously wounded though not dead, had referred all business to him according to his custom. Being secure of the Faction of the Marcii, he then carried out Tarquinius to be buried, as newly dead; and, as Tutor to the young Children, executed the Office of King: which Tanagail out of the window had told the people was her Husband's will, when yet he feigned him to be living. But the Patricians grudging Tullius this honour, conspired how, the next time he assembled the Senate, they might constrain him to leave off all the Royal ensigns, and then go to an Election, according to the usual manner.

29. He, coming to the knowledge hereof, assembled the People, and producing the two Boys, pleaded their cause and his own: he promised them to pay all their Debts, and divide to those that wanted the publick Grounds. Hereby retaining the power under the notion of Guardian. The Patricians were sore aggrieved therewith, but the wisest sort thought it not good to stir, though they plainly saw the Authority of the Senate much infringed. For they considered, that if they should make a King of their own Body, the people would not approve the choice; and if it were referred to the Multitude, Tullius would assuredly be the man: wherefore they thought it more wisdom to suffer him to reign in an unlawfull manner, that so they might ever have some just pretence against him, than by stirring in the matter to procure him a legal Title. But he prevented this their design, going with his Mother, Mother-in-law, and all his Kindred, in mourning habits unto the Forum; where he shewed the People how lamentable his condition was through the plots of the Patricians against him, which he deserved no otherways than by his good deeds towards the Commonalty. He laid to their charge that they would call in the Marcii, that had murdered Tarquinius, and expose his Posterity, who had so well deserved of the State together with himself, to the same cruelty: and in conclusion, offering to lay down all, if such was the pleasure of the People, and undergo any hardship rather than be troublesome, he offered to defend from the Tribunal. A great clamour then arose mixed with prayers and tears of those that besought him to retain the Government: and presently some, that were provided beforehand, began to cry out that he was to be chosen King, and the Curia were to be called the Vote; which thing was instantly resolved by the Multitude. He gladly took hold of the opportunity, thanked them that they were mindful of the benefits received from him, promised larger if he were elected King, and appointed a day for the Comitia, or Assembly, whereto he intended to have present those also that were abroad in the Countrey. At the day appointed for the Assembly of the Curia, (called Curia Comitia) he was chosen King by the Suffrages of them all, and so, in despite of the Conscript Fathers, who refused to confirm the choice, as the manner was, obtained the Principality.

30. Presently after his settlement he accomplished his promise, concerning the division of the publick Land to such as were forced to preserve themselves by daily labour in other mens grounds; and in the Curia Comitia preferred five Laws concerning Contracts and Injuries. He added two Hills to the former five, viz. the Viminal and Esquiline, in the latter whereof he lived himself; and was the last man, if some rightly observe, that enlarged the Pomerium of the City, the Wall whereof was never any farther stretched out, though very large Suburbs were afterwards added.

ded. After he had compassed all the Seven Hills within one Wall, he distinguished the City into four parts, and, in stead of three, made four Tribes. And as Romulus distinguished the People, according to their Seats and Communion in Sacrifices, into Tribes and Curia; so Servius, making every one give an account how much he was worth, according to their riches divided them into fix Ranks, or Classes. Of these, the first and highest consisted of such as were worth 110000 Asles (each of which answereth to ob. g. of our money,) the next four decreased in value a fourth part; and in the last were contained all such whose Estates were of little or no value.

The Censur.

Lustrum.

31. The Classes he did also fo subdivide into Centuries, that 193 were made in all: his design herein being to know certainly how many were fit to bear Arms, and what Treasure might be supplied for Wars, or other occasions. He also first ordained the Lustrum (so named à Luvendo, (from paying) saith Varro, as Florus De Lingua Lat. lib. 5. à Luvendo) to be celebrated after this Censur, or value of each according to their substance. On a certain day after the valuation, he enacted that all the Citizens should meet in their Armour in the Campus Martius, every one in his several Classis and Century; where by sacrifice the City was expiated, or Lustrated. This Solemnity was termed Solitauritia, (or rather Suovetaurilia.) because an Hog, Sheep, and Oxe were sacrificed, as we read in Quintilian. These things being performed, the Lustrum was finished, which, because of continual change of mens Estates, he ordained should be reiterated every five years; so that he (who begun it according to Lipius, in his twelfth year) celebrated it himself four times, according to Valerius Maximus. Every fifth year the Tribute or Tax (called Censur) was paid; and thence Lustrum seemeth to have had its name. After the Banishment of the Kings, the Consuls managed this business, till the Censors (Magistrates proper to the work) were brought in. Lastly, Joseph Scaliger telleth us, we must distinguish the old Roman Lustrum from the later or Julian, which is only a Systeme of four Julian years, whereof the last consisteth of 366 days absolutely without any overplus of hours. For the old and proper Lustrum contained five years compleat, which that cited by Cicero, concerning the Censors, out of the Laws of the Twelve Tables, Let them be two, Let them obtain the Magistracy for five years, maketh manifest: so that this Lustrum cannot answer to an Olympiad, properly fo called; of which beginners are to take notice.

The Centuries and Centuriata
Comitia.

32. Of the six Classes, which contained 193 Centuries, the first and richest was divided into 98, the Equites or Horsemen being counted in; the second into 22, taking in Artificers; the third into 22, the fourth 20, the fifth 30 5, and the sixth and last, of the poorer sort, made up but one Century. Men and monies being levied according to these Centuries, and not by poll, (each Century such a quantity) it came to pass, that the richest being fewer, yet divided into more Centuries, (here the word is not to be taken for 100 persons precisely, being made use of onely to expresse such a Division) were never free from warfare, and contributed also more money than the rest: they that were but moderately or meanly provided of wealth, being exceeded by the other in twenty Centuries, went to the War by turns, and paid but little Tribute: and they that had not any estate to speak on undermost no burthens. This seemed very just and equal to him, that they who were most concerned should take most pains, and bear the greatest charge; the Romans at that time maintaining themselves in the Wars without any pay from the publick. But the richer sort, something grieved to undergo all charge and danger, for the preservation of others as well as themselves, Servius sufficiently satisfied and requited, by giving them in a manner the whole prerogative in matters of State, the poorer being almost wholly removed from any power in the Commonwealth, though at first they did not perceive it.

33. This Secret lay in the Comitia or Assemblies, where the People resolved about the most important affairs; these three things being in their power, viz. Creation of Magistrates as well Military as Civil, making or abrogating Laws, and decreting Peace or War: concerning which things the Suffrages of the several Curia were wont to be gathered, and the Vote of the poorest availed as much as that of the richest person; whence the poorer sort, being much more numerous than the rich, ever prevailed by their Multitudes. Tullius understanding this, in stead of those of the Curia, called the Comitia of the Centuries upon such occasions. First of all were called the Centuries of the first or richest Classis, viz. the 18 of Equites or Horsemen, and the 80 of Footmen; which being three more in number than all the rest besides, if they all agreed, they overcame in number, and there was no need of calling any of the others to the vote: if they disagreed, the 22 Centuries of the second Classis were called, and, if need were, the third Classis, and the fourth, till

SECT. 2.

97 Centuries agreed in their Suffrages. If this happened not after the calling of the fifth, (192 Centuries: being divided equally in number, and of several opinions) then was the sixth Classis called, containing the last Century, free from Tributes and War; and to which side it joyned, that overcame.

34. This rarely happened, and was almost impossible, the Comitia being ended most commonly by the first call; but however, seldom came it to the fourth Classis, so that the two last were superfluous. By this Constitution the poorer sort were deceived, thinking it enough that every man, as well one as another, gave his Suffrage, and not considering that the Suffrage of the whole Century was but one, whether it contained more or fewer persons in it. But at length, seeing themselves freed from danger and charge, they were content; and the richer, enjoying such privileges for their pains and cost, were well satisfied. And this order was kept for many Ages; till afterwards, by the violent actions of some, the Common sort got more power, as Dionysius himself observed the Innovation to have broken in at his time. At the first Lustrum were found 84700 Citizens; but to increase their number, he brought in the custom of making Slaves free of the Commonwealth, whom being before manumitted or set free, he distributed into the four Tribes of the City.

35. These Slaves were either made, or born such, as Justinian the Emperor distinguisheth them. The former sort were either taken in War, (then properly called Mancipia) or as such bought of the publick, or of some private man. The latter were those that were born either of both Parents being such, or of the Mother only. At first they obtained their Liberty gratis, by well deserving some way of their Masters, or some by payment of money earned by their honest labours, they having a certain Peculium, though all was said to belong to their Masters. But in process of time, when the Romans degenerated from their former worth and honour, some by Robberies, others by breaking of houses and other villanies, got money, whereby they purchased their Freedom. Some by helping their Masters in these things obtained Liberty as a reward; others on condition to let them enjoy the monthly allowance of Corn out of the publick purse, or other Largesses conferred by Princes upon poor Citizens. Sometimes they were manumitted through the levity and vanity-glorie of their Lords; some having by their Testaments set at liberty all their Slaves, to obtain a fame of clemency after their death, and that their Funerals might be celebrated by a great train of such as wore caps upon that occasion; in which pomp a thousand Rogues have been seen, who much better deserved hanging. This was laid to the charge of the Mistress of the World, that challenging the Empire over all, she should defile her self with such impure Citizens: which custom might have been reformed, as Dionysius observeth, by the care of the Censors, who, inquiring into the lives of Senators and Knights, never considered what persons were unfit to be admitted Free-men.

36. Tullius not only clipped the power of the Patritians and Senate, but took away half of the King's Prerogative also. Whereas the former Princes called before themselves all Controversies, and took cognizance of crimes as well committed against particular persons as the publick, he separated these Causes, making himself Judge of such as respected the Commonwealth, and referring the quarrels of private persons unto others, to whom he prescribed Laws and Rules to go by. After he had thus ordered the Commonwealth, he caused the Latines to build a Temple at Rome to Diana, upon the Aventine Hill, whereto they should meet and feast every year, and so preserve themselves as one body politic in unity and concord. If any controversy arose betwixt particular Towns, it was to be decided by the judgement of others, in such a manner as the Amphityonies in Greece were wont to proceed, the Council of the Ionians at the Temple of Epheesus, and that of the Dorians in the Temple of Apollo, built by common consent at Ephirupum. These things were done by Tullius at home, according to Dionysius, Livie, and others: to which we may add from Pliny, that he first stamped money with the image of Cattel, whence it was called Pecunia, whereas the Romans before his time used it in a rude lump or Mass. As for his actions abroad; he warred with the Hebrusians 20 years, who refused to obey him, as an obscure man, and renounced the League formerly made. In all Battels, both with the united Nation and particular Cities, he ever had the better, triumphed over them thrice, and at length forced them to submit to the yoke on the same terms as formerly Tarquinius had imposed it, except that from three Towns, that had been principal in the Revolt, he took part of their Grounds, which he divided to those that had newly been made free of the City. Having done these things at home and abroad, when he was grown old and not far from the natural period of his life, he perished by the devices of Tarquinius his Son-in-law, and of his own Daughter.

SECT. 3.

37. Tullius had two Daughters by his Wife Tarquinius, which he married to their two Cousin-germans, the Grand-sons of Tarquinius, joyning them in wedlock according to their age, as he thought it most equal and convenient. But it happened that they were matched together with those of dispositions clean contrary to one another. Lucius, the elder, a man of a bold, arrogant, and tyrannical nature, had an honest, modest Wife, and one most dutifull towards her Father: on the contrary, Aruns Tarquinius, the younger, being of a mild and sweet disposition, lighted on a wicked Woman, one of a bitter spirit against her Father, ready to attempt any thing. Lucius breaking out into passion against his Father-in-law, for keeping the Kingdom from him, was still appeased by his Wife: but Aruns being content to stay his time, and averse to any thing that might favour of disrespect to Tullius, was importuned ever and disquieted by his Wife's earnest and tedious solicitations, to attempt the utmost, though with the destruction of her Father, for the obtaining of the Sovereignty. This Woman being impatient of her Husband's backwardness, and bewitched by the fury of Ambition, resolved to change Husbands, if it might be, and match her self to the other Tarquin, who suited well with her own humor. She brake her mind to Lucius, telling him of what a sordid spirit they were, to suffer an Usurper so long to possess their Patrimony, railing against her own Husband, as a man of a poor and degenerate disposition; and at length made a proffer for them two to dispatch out of the way their present unequal Yoke-fellows, and then unite themselves in that relation, thereby to bring about their noble and gallant Design. He was not backward to a compliance, and the device was accordingly brought about. After which, they resolved by force to expell Tullius from the Kingdom, if he would not give place on his own accord, raising a Faction of the Patritians, that were discontented with the King's new modelling of the State, and the poorest Plebeians, whose assistance they purchased openly, without any respect to right or modesty. Tullius was not ignorant what they intended, and feared also to be destroyed ere he could provide for his defence; yet thinking it an unseemly thing to make War upon his Son-in-law and his own Daughter, and punish them as Enemies, he endeavoured by fair means to take them off; before their Friends, blaming, admonishing, and deborting Tarquinius from the intended injury.

38. Effecting nothing hereby, but the other saying, that he would plead his cause in the Senate, he called together the Fathers, and gave him liberty to speak. Tarquinius laid his claim to the Kingdom, as his Grand-father's Heir, and alleged, that Tullius kept it from him unjustly, having got all his preferment from their Family, and obtained the place illegally, without the consent of the Senate. Tullius replied, that the Kingdom was in the power of the People, to dispose of it to whomsoever they would; which he proved from the Example of Tarquinius Priscus, who, being a Stranger, was preferred before the Marcii. He mentioned how well he had deserved of him, by protecting and taking care of him in his Minority; and as for his coming to the Government without the ordinary assent of the Senate, that concerned the Fathers, and not him. He then appealed to the Senate, whether ever he had wronged or carried himself arrogantly towards any of them, that they should conspire with his Son-in-law against him; and in conclusion told them, that if they thought Tarquinius the fitter man, he should not be against the profit of the Commonwealth, but retire to a private life, and let the World see, he could as readily obey as be obeyed, after he had restored the Honour to those from whom he had received it. Having struck a great reverence of him into the Senate, he assembled the People, to whom, after a great complaint against Tarquin, and a recital of what good things he had performed for the Publick, he offered to resign his place; but was confirmed therein, and after he had refused to give ear to such as would have Tarquin dispatched, with great acclamations brought home to his house by the multitude.

39. Tarquin thus prevented of what he expected from the Patritians, counterfeited repentance, and a desire to be reconciled to the King, which was easily obtained. Covered with this Cloak he laid his designs anew, and being continually solicited by his Wife to attempt something worthy of a Kingdom, took his opportunity on a day when most of the people were out of the City, with the Robes of Estate, and all Royal Ensigns as King, to go to the Senate-house. There he presumed to call together the Fathers, and, such being assembled as were appointed beforehand, he took possession of the King's Seat. Tullius having notice hereof, undisturbed with a few followers hastened thither, admiring the young man's impudence, whom seeing in his Chair, he fell of rating, and received as bad language; then going about to thrust him out, Tarquin took him up by the middle, and haling him to the door, threw him down the stairs into the Comitum. The old man hardly recovering his spirits was led homewards, when his Daughter, Tarquini's Wife, being come in her Chariot to see the event, saluted her Husband as King, but told him his Principality would be but uncertain, except, perfecting what he had begun, he would fend some who should overtake and dispatch Tullius. He took her advice, and the feat being done, he presently returned home the same way. In her passage when she came to the place where the body lay as yet almost gasping, her Chariot-driver stood full, confounded at the sight, and not having room to pass besides it. Hereat the reviled him, and caused him to drive her over it, after she had first thrown her footstool at his head. The place, formerly called Cyprius Vicus, was afterwards named Sceleratus, from that occasion. To this end came Severus Vicius, after he had reigned 44 years, a man just and moderate, who abolished the envy contracted in his illegal assumption, by his after-acts, and was thought, if he had not been prevented, to have intended to lay down his Office, and restore absolute Liberty with the care of the Commonwealth to the People; which some of the Patritii perceiving, took in the interest of Tarquinius, that they might preserve their own power.

Lucius Tarquinius, furnished Superbus.

40. Lucius Tarquinius obtained the Kingdom by violence in the fourth year of the 61. Olympiad, wherein Agatharchus was Victor, when Heracles (or rather Heraclides) was Archeon at Athens. By his Tyrannical and impetuous carriage he soon got the surname of Superbus, as that of Priscus, for distinction, was given to his Grand-father. He would not suffer his Father-in-law's body to be buried publicly, for fear it should give occasion to the people to rise against him, saying, that Romulus died without Burial. He murdered such as he suspected to favour the cause of Tullius, and fearing what end his wickedness might bring upon him, got to him a strong Guard which continually attended his person. He reigned only by his own arbitrary will, neither standing upon the consent of the Senate nor People. As for the former, he much diminished it by the murder of the richer sort, whose wealth he seized on for his own use, and resolved to chuse no more in, that it might wear out, and grow contemptible. All Controversies he decided himself, assisted by his intimate friends, and took cognizance of all Offences, so as he might kill, banish, or fine at his pleasure. He sought to establish himself and confirm his Tyranny by great Alliance, marrying his Daughter to Octavius Manilius, the greatest man amongst the Latines, (being descended from Telegonus the son of Ulysses by Circe;) and by false accusation and a cunning device caused them to stone Tarnus Herdonius, who had discovered to them his baseness and villanies. He began a War with the Volsci, which ended not with him, but lasted above 200 years; and subdued the Sabines, who refused to obey him. From the Volsci he took Sueffa Pometia, (where getting much plunder, he first cast in his head the design of building a Temple to Jupiter, which his Grand-father had formerly vowed) and afterwards the City Gabii by treachery, making Sextus his eldest Son to counterfeit flight from him for hard usage, whereby he was made their General, and having, according to the secret advice of his Father, (who, in imitation of Thersites the Milesian, carried the messenger into the field, and cut down the tallest Popples, dismissing him without any other message) put to death the most principal Citizens, at length easily betrayed it into his hands. After this he made peace with the Aequi, and renewed the League with the Tuscani. Then went he forward with the work of the Temple formerly designed.

His Wars.

Buildeth the Capitol.

The Capitol.

41. Tarquinius Priscus, in his last War with the Sabines, made a Vow, that if he got the Victory, he would build Temples to Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva; and with great cost had in his life-time levelled the Rock, and formed a plot for the Building; but died before he could finish the work. Tarquinius his Grand-son, resolving to perfect what he had begun with the plunder of Sueffa, set on all sorts of workmen; at which time, as they were digging to lay the foundation, a man's Head was found bleeding afresh, which belonging to one called Tollus, thence the building had the name of Capitol. He perfected a great part of the Temple, but could not consummate the work, being prevented by Exile; which was finished by the City in the third Consulship after its Freedom. It was seated upon an high Cragge, eight Acres in compass, almost two hundred foot wide on every side, and almost of the same length and breadth, as differing only in fifteen feet. After it had stood 425 years from its Dedication, it was consumed by fire in the days of Sylla, when L. Scipio and Cains Norbanus were Consuls, as Tacitus writeth: Yet it rose again with greater cost and ornament on the same foundation. Its front looking toward the South had a Porch, or Gallery, with three rows of Pillars: on each side were also

also a double row. The three Temples were contained within the same Walls, the middle belonging to Jupiter, and the other two to Juno and Minerva, under the same roof.

Sibyl.

Sibyl books.

42. In the time of this Tarquinius, another great blessing, as it was counted, happened to the Romans. A certain strange Woman came to the King, offering to sell nine Books of the Oracles of Sibyl: which when he refused to buy at her rate, she went away, and burning three of them, returned; and demanded as much for the fix. Being denied for a mad woman, she departed, and burning half of them, returned with the other three, still asking as much as at the first. Whereat Tarquinius astonished, sent for the Augures to know her meaning; who answered, that the Nine ought to have been bought, and the Three were to be purchased at the same Rate. The Woman after the sale and delivery vanished, and never after could be seen. Tarquinius chose two men out of the Nobility to keep them, to whom he allowed two publick servants. After his Expulsion the people elected most noble persons, who all their lives executing this Office were freed from all other burthens, both Military and Civil, to whom only it was lawful to look in them. No sacred thing was so carefully kept as these Sibylline Oracles. They were consulted by decree of the Senate when the Commonwealth was disturbed by any Seditions, when any great Overthrow was received in War, or any Prodiges happened. They were kept by the Decemviri, or Ten men appointed to this Office, within a Vault under the Capitol, in a stone Chest, till they perished at the burning of the place. Those that the Romans used afterwards were copied out of such as belonged to other Cities, and private persons, wherein were some supposititious things, which they distinguished by the difference of the Acrotycks.

43. The Woman that brought those Books to Tarquinius having the name of Sibylla, and there being many found to whom it hath been given besides, something is to be said of those Women, for distinction. The first Sibylla, or Woman-Prophetess, (to which the * Counsell of Jupiter was communicated, as the word importeth) was a Perjass, according to (a) Varro, or else a Chaldean, or an Hebrewess, born at Noe, a City near the Red-Sea: her name was Sambeba, her father called Barossus and her mother Erymantha. The second was a Libyan. Themis of Delphos was the third. The fourth was called Cumea, because she was born at Cimerium, a Town of Campania in Italy, near to Cuma. The fifth of Erythrae, a City of Ionis in Asia, at this day called Cabo Bianco. The sixth was of the Island Samos, her name being Phyto. The seventh of Cuma, and called Cumana, her proper name being Amalthea, according to some; but Herophile and Demophila according to others. Suida calleth her Hiereophile, and saith she brought nine Books to Tarquinius Priscus, and demanded for them 300 Philipppines, being Gold Coyne of Philip King of Macedonia. Pliny, contrary to the common account of Writers, mentioneth three books, not nine, and writeth that she burnt two of them. But the eighth was called Helleponticae, being born in the Trojan Country upon the Hellefont, in a Village named Marmissus near to Gegetium, which Heraclides of Pontus affirmed to have flourished in the days of Solon and Cyrus. The ninth was a Phrygian, and prophesied at Ancyra. The tenth was of Tybur, by name Albanica, being worshipped for a Goddess at that place, near the Banks of the River Aniene, wherein her Image is said to have been found holding a Book in one hand. These ten are reckoned by Varro. There were several others also. (b) Strabo maketh two to have lived at Erythrae, whereof the latter flourished in the time of Alexander. There was another of Colophon, a City of Ionis. Elissa, and Cassandra the Daughter of Priamus, were accounted Sibyls. There were also a Thessalian, Manto the Daughter of Tiresias the Theban, and another of Epirus. Moreover, Carmenitis the Arcadian, the Mother of Evander and Fauna, or Fauna, the Sister and Wife of Faunus, King of the Aborigenes in Italy, might be reckoned in the number.

The siege of Ilium.

44. In the work of the Capitol Tarquinius employed the people, and in other bawfer works, wherewith he even tired them out; so that to appease them, and especially to recruit his own Coffers, he made War against the Rutuli, and besieged the rich City Ardea, five German miles, toward the East, distant from Rome. The Quarrel he pretended to be, for that they received the Roman Exiles, and endeavoured to restore them; but the true cause was his thirst after the Riches of this most flourishing place, once the Metropolis of the Rutuli. While he lay before this Town, taking great pains to gain it, and the other as eagerly resisting, (yet so as he seemed to have hope to carry it) an act of his eldest Son Sextus occasioned both the freedom of the one and other City. Dionysius writeth, that he was sent to Collatia about some business concerning the War, and going to the house

SECT. 2. house of Tarquinius Collatinus his Kinsman, (Grand-son to Egerius the Nephew of Priscus;) he ravished his Wife Lucretia, the Daughter of Lucretius a Noble Roman. Livy and Aurelius Victor relate, that the Courtiers drinking together in the Camp before Ardea, and with them Tarquinius Collatinus the Son of Egerius, they fell feverally on praising each one his own Wife inasmuch as proceeding to an earnest dispute, Collatinus said there needed not many words, for that they might see within a few hours how far his Lucretia excelled them all; and he desired them to ride to the several places, and judge according as they should find. Being well heated with wine they agreed to this motion, and away they rode. They found not Lucretia junketing, and idly spending her time as the King's Daughters-in-law, but late at night hard at work amongst her Maids; so that by consent of all the fair excelled the rest, and Collatinus nobly entertaining his Guests returned with them to the siege.

Sextus Tarquinius ravished Lucretia.

45. Now was Sextus Tarquinius inflamed with a lustful desire after Lucretia, because of her Beauty, and, as it happeneth towards difficult or forbidden things, the more because of her eminent Chastity. Within few days, without the knowledge of her Husband, accompanied only with one servant, he returned to Collatia, where being kindly entertained by her, he was brought to his Bed-chamber: but when he thought all asleep, having observed where the lay, with a naked Dagger he went to her, and laying his hand on her breast, threatened her with death if she offered to stir. He mixed threats with fair words, but yet could not prevail, till he told her he would first kill her, and then his Slave, whom laying by her side, he would report it was for having surprized her in Adultery with him; whereby obtaining his prey, in the morning he departed. When he was gone, the sent for her Father from Rome, and her Husband from the Camp, (or say some, went her self to the City) desiring they would call together some friends, for that a matter of great importance had befallen her. With Lucretia came Publius Valerius, and with Collatinus, Junius Brutus; who finding her in her Chamber in a sad and afflicted condition, she told them the whole matter, refused to admit any comfort, and intreating them to revenge her cause upon the Author of her sorrow, stabbed her self to the heart before them, with a knife she had kept close about her for that purpose.

Junius Brutus.

46. Lucius Junius, surnamed Brutus, was the Son of Marcus Junius, who being defended from one of the Companions of Aeneas, and, for his Vertue, very eminent amongst the Romans, married Tarquinia the Daughter of Tarquinius Priscus, of which he begat this Lucius. This Lucius was nobly educated, instructed in all disciplines of the City, and of a pregnant wit. But after that Tarquin had privily murdered his Father, (not for any offence, but to possess his great estate, as he did several others) and with him his eldest Brother, who seemed to bear such a mind as would revenge the injury, he being young, and destitute of any assistance from his kindred, counterfeited himself a fool, which he acted all along, and thence had the surname of Brutus; this being the sole remedy against the cruelty of the Tyrant, who thinking his folly not feigned but real, despised the man, and having spoiled him of his Patrimony, kept him as an Idiot in his house, and suffered him to converse with his Children, not out of respect as a Kinsman, but to make them sport by his ridiculous words and actions, as true Idiots are wont to do. On a time a great Pestilence having seized on the City, he sent him to Dolphos with his two Sons Sextus and Titus, to consult the Oracle. They were glad they had him to make them merry, and laughed at him for offering to Apollo a wooden staff, wherein yet he had secretly put some Gold, having made it hollow for that purpose. Having privately enquired which of them should be Prince of Rome, it was answered, he who first of all should kiss his Mother; which the young men misunderstanding, agreed betwixt themselves, that at their return they would do it, and so reign, joyntly together. But Brutus, as soon as they arrived in Italy, knowing the meaning of the Oracle, fell and kissed the Earth which is Mother of all. When, under the Vizard of a Fool, he waited for an opportunity to revenge himself and Family upon Tarquin, this disaster of Lucretia at length presented it self.

47. Being sent for beforehand, or coming in with Collatinus his Kinsman after the death of Lucretia, as Dionysius writeth, while her Husband and Friends were lamenting over the dead body, he told them it was not time now to weep, but to study how to revenge the injury. He acquainted them with the cause of his assuming the name and behaviour of an Idiot, and manifesting himself to be a most cunning man, desired they might unanimously joyn for the Expulsion of Tarquin.

nius and his Friends from the City, speaking many things efficacious to persuade them to it. Finding every one very ready, he said there was no need of words and promises, but real deeds, if they meant to perform any thing, and that he first would begin. Then went he to the dead body, and taking the bloody knife in his hand, swore by Mars and the rest of their Gods, to call out Tarquinius Superbus with his wicked Wife and Progeny, to prosecute them or their Friends with fire and sword, or any other way, and never after that to suffer the Tarquinius, or any other to reign in Rome. He made them all successively take the same Oath; then for the way how to bring the matter about, said, the Gates of the City should be safely kept, that the King might not hear the least word, till he who was Prince of the Sacrificers, should, as he might by his place, assemble the people, to which the dead Body being exhibited, and Lucretius with Collatinus deploring their condition, they might procure the Banishment of Tarquin by a public Decree, that should be presently dispatched to the Army for its concurrence.

48. But before Tarquinius should be removed, they thought it Wisdom to consider what Magistracy was fit to succeed his; left they should pull down the present dwelling before another house was prepared. Some were for Monarchy, as indeed the best of Governments; others for Aristocracy, or the Rule of the Senate; and others would have the whole Power put into the hands of the People: each party bringing examples of good Government in the several kinds. Brutus said the time was short, and these matters required mature deliberation, which neither at length could produce such a form as would be void of all inconveniences. He said, he hoped that after the expulsion of the Tyrants, they should have leisure to consider how they might best reform the Commonwealth, if any better way could be found out than what Romulus, Pomilius, and the other Kings had chalked out to them, wherein proceeding, till Tarquin forsook the path, the City had been happy and famous, both for its Acts abroad, and Constitutions at home. This he could not deny; yet however, he thought those inconveniences, as he called them, had procured the Kingly power to degenerate into Tyranny; and therefore were to be abolished, and to be taken heed of for the time to come. As first, because some men made a great matter of very Names, he thought that of a Kingdom was to be left off, and the other of Commonwealth to be assumed; and that for the Title of King and Monarch, some more modest and popular was to be invented. Then the Regal power he judged not safely to be intrusted with a single person; but that two were to be chosen, who should Govern with equal command and authority, and so be a counter-poize each to other. Of all royal Emblems or Ornaments, such as procured the envy and grudge of the People were to be laid aside, viz. Scepters, golden Crowns, and purple Robes of Cloth of gold, except upon Festival days, and in triumphal Pumps; which rare use of them would not be at all spoken against: but as for the Ivory Chair in which they sat in Judgment, with the white Robe edged with Purple, called Prætexta, and the twelve Lictors or Sergeants, bearing Rods and Axes, they were to be continued. He added, that the main thing to keep these Magistrates in order, was, to prevent their perpetual Power, which would keep them from giving account of their Actions: wherefore he thought fit their Magistracy, after the manner of Athenes, should be but Annual, that so each one might learn as well to be subject as to govern, and this would preserve the mind from being drunk with too much liberty. Lastly, that the name of King might not utterly perish, (whence may be concluded, that his judgement was not against the Office, though his passion was) he would have the title given to one who should be called Rex Sacrorum, and having this honour for his life, with immunity from warfare, should meddle with nothing else but these superstitious Rites, of which the Kings had charge before.

49. Having first got a Decree of the Senate for the King's Banishment, according to the custom of publick proceeding, the Comitia were assembled by Brutus, and the Body of Lucretia brought in her goro into the meeting-place, where it was set for a spectacle to all. Brutus then discovered himself, told them why he had seemed what he now appeared never to have been; and then declared the occasion of their meeting to be, that the Patricians might have their assent for banishing Tarquin, who, having obtained the Principality illegally, had abused it more than any Tyrant that was ever heard of. He illustrated his assertion by a relation of his Crimes: as of his poisoning his own Brother before he was King, together with his lawfull Wife, and marrying the other Sister that was partaker with him in his wickedness; his killing Servius Tullius, and strangling his Wife whom he ought to have respected as Parents; then his invading the Government, without Decree

SECT. 2. of Senate or Suffrages of the People, by force of Arms. He reckoned up the injuries received by the Patritians, most of whom he had made away, and reduced the rest to the estate of beggars; how from the Peletians he had taken Laws, Religious Meetings, the Comitia and Suffrages, and used them no better than Slaves bought with money. He then demanded how long they should endure this bondage; whether no longer than till the death of Tarquin: whereas he had three days; whether more wicked and mischievous than himself, especially the elder, which he proved by the spectacle before their eyes; telling them then the whole story. This advantage he improved to the utmost, shewing how the King being now absent, and the Patritians resolved, nothing could be wanting to them, if they had but courage for the enterprize; not Men, Money, Arms, Captains, nor foreign aid: urging, that it was a shame they should think of commanding the Volscs, Sabines, or others, and be Slaves to others at home; or maintain so many Wars for to serve the Ambition of Tarquin, and undertake none for their own Liberty. As for the Army now at the Siege, there was no fear, but that for their own freedom and accommodation, they would readily clove with them; and if any should be found to intend the contrary, they had their Wives and Children as Hostages in the City, whereby they might easily draw them off.

The people decree Tarquin his Banishment.

50. The Multitude being variously affected with hope of Liberty, and fear to miss of it, during his Speech, yet made acclamations to the particulars, and at the end, with one voice desired he would give them Arms. He said he would, if first they would confirm what was offered from the Fathers, as the beginning of their Liberty; and therewithall recited the form of this severe Decree, that the Tarquin should be banished with all their Offspring, and be capital for any one to speak or act for their return. The several Curia being called, confirmed it by all their Suffrages; which being done, he acquainted them how it was agreed, that unto them the Government should be committed, whom they should elect in their Censurata Comitia, which was also passed. Then according to the custom, by virtue of his Office formerly mentioned, he named Sp. Lucretius to be Inter-rex for holding of his Office formerly mentioned, who adjourned the meeting to the Campus Martius, where it was the custom for the Romans in their Armour to elect Magistrates. There he named Brutus and Collatinus (as was formerly agreed on betwixt the Conspirators) for to have the Regal power, and the Centuries confirmed them by their Suffrages. In the mean time, whilst these things were done in the City, Tarquin, having heard by such as escaped out ere the gates were shut, that Brutus called the people to their Liberty, making none acquainted but his Sons and some trusty Friends, with them rode away in all haste to prevent the general defection; but finding the Gates fast shut, and the Walls full of Armed men, in great grief he returned to the Camp. There now he could not be received; for Brutus foreseeing his sudden coming, sent Letters to the Army, (or went himself by another way than that he knew he would come) wherein he acquainted them with the Decree of the People, and desired that they would revolt from the King. The Letters were read to the Souldiers by T. Herminius and M. Horatius, whom Tarquin had left to govern the Army; and they being called to give their Suffrages also by Centuries, all thought that what their Friends at home had done was to be approved, and would not admit the King at his return. Frustrated of this hope, he went to Cære in Etruria, faith Luise, to Gabii faith Dionysius, where he had made his Son Sextus King, now gray-headed, having reigned 25 years. Herminius and Horatius took Truce with the Enemy for 15 years, and breaking up the Siege before Ardea, returned with the Army. This happened in the 244. year of the City, after the account of Cato, but the 245. according to the computation of Varro, in the latter end of the 67. Olympiad, or the beginning of the 68. Pliny writeth, that it was the same year wherein the Pisistratide were banished Athens; and Clemens joyneth it with the recovery of Babylon by Darius Hystaspis. This was somewhat above twenty years after the beginning of Cyrus, and the destruction of the Babylonian Empire.

The Persian Empire.

SECT. I.

From the beginning of the Empire of Cyrus, to the death of Cambyfes his Son and Successor.

1. CYRUS having obtained the Empire of the East through the Conquest of Babylon, after a three years siege, as is conjectured, was feasible of Gods providence therein (whom he understood to have foretold it, and called him by name above 100 years before he was born) and out of obedience to his decree, gave leave to all the Jews that were in Captivity in his Dominions, to return to their own Countrey, the 70 years of their exile foretold by Jeremiah the Prophet being now expired. In compliance with this opportunity Zorubbabel the son of Salathiel, and Grand-son to Sechoniah as Captain, with Josias the son of Josedec (which Josedec was brother to Elazar, and son to Seraiah the Chief Priest, who being Counsellour to Zedekiah was slain by Nebuchadnezar, the year wherein Jerusalem was taken) and 42462 Jews (as Josephus reckoneth up the number) departed, and went into Fudæa. Though the other Tribes formerly led into Captivity by Salmansar might have the same liberty of returning, yet having together with the memory of their ancient Countrey lost their affection to their God, and it, regarded not the time, the Lord having only promised liberty of returning to those that were exported by Nebuchadnezar. And a great part of the Tribe of Fudæa it self (if not the greater) unwilling to leave their possessions got in a strange Land, as also discouraged by the difficulties and troubles they were to undergo, preferred perpetual banishment before the feat and habitation of their Ancestors.

2. In the second year of the Persian Empire, and the second month, when all things were in a readiness, according to Commission given by the King (who defrayed the charge out of his own Revenue, and restored the Golden Vessels carried away by Nebuchadnezar) the Levites were set over the work of the

The second Temple built at Jerusalem.

Lords house, and Zorubbabel laid the foundation of the second Temple, to the joy of the younger fort born in Captivity, but with the lamentation of the elder, who had seen the glory of the former house. When the Chuthites (whom Ezrah had planted in Samaris) heard of their progress in the work, they first fraudulently offered their assistance, pretending the same religion, and being rejected, corrupted the Courtiers (who either kept the thing from God, or he was then busied in his Wars, as Josephus writeth) that the building was hindered for several years, until the second of Darius, the son of Hystaspes. For this the Prophet Daniel (who was yet alive, and nigh 90 years old, as having been carried into Captivity 73 years before) mourned, and fasted three weeks, and had the great, and last Vision concerning the future Kings of Persia, of Alexander the Great, and his Successors in Misra and Egypt, until the time of the Hajmonians, of Maccabees. But whether he lived past the third year of Cyrus or no is uncertain.

The end of Cyrus variously reported.

3. Concerning the end of Cyrus many and several things are written. According to Herodotus, Trogus and others he invaded the Maffages, and perished in their Country. The Queen of this Sythian people named Tomyris he first made a pretence to sue to for marriage, but she being aware of this design to entrap her forbad him entrance; whereupon betaking himself from wiles to force he laid a Bridge over the River Araxes, and provided for the passing of his Army over. Whilst he thus employed himself, she was so hardy as to send him a message, offering him either to invade her Country, or else to permit her a passage into his. Amazed at it, he referred the matter to his Council what should be done therein, where some advised him to suffer her to pass the River, but Cresus stoutly opposed it, shewing the danger in case he were overthrown but in one battle, and advised him after he had set over his men, and discovered the Enemy, to leave the weakest fort amongst his Army there in the Camp plentifully provided of strong Wines, with which liquor being utterly unacquainted, they would make themselves drunk, and so might be easily destroyed. This advice succeeded accordingly, and amongst the rest Spargapes the Queen's Son was taken prisoner, who as soon as he came to himself desired to be loosed, and put an end to his life with his own hands, out of a deep sense of his condition. His Mother knowing nothing of his death, with threatening language required Cyrus to dismiss him, and when she saw he returned not, gathered together all her forces, wherewith counterfeiting flight she trained the King into streights, and by an ambush laid in the Mountains, cut him off with his whole Army to the number of 200000 men. His head she cast into a Basin of Blood, upbraiding him with cruelty in these words: Satisfie thy self with blood after which thou hast thirsted. To this story Diodo-

4. But Ctesias wrote that the last War he made was against the Derbices, a people also of Sythia, whom though he overcame, yet he received a wound in fight, of which he died three days after. Xenophon saith he died aged, and in peace, and how finding himself almost spent, he called to him his friends, and with his two sons Cambyses and Smerdis, or Tanaxares, whom (after a long Oration, wherein he discoursed much concerning the immortality of the Soul, and the punishment and reward which is due to things committed in this life) he exhorted by the strongest arguments to perpetual concord and love. If so, he acted like one that had received the knowledge of the true God, which he had opportunity also to know from Daniel and others, being by them instructed in the Scriptures. Some think that the variety of these reports proceeded from the study of the Persians to conceal the shame of his being overthrown by the policy of a woman. Others observe, that had he lost his whole Army in Sythia, it is scarce probable that his Son would have transported all his remaining Forces into Egypt so soon, and hereby leave that side of his Kingdom destitute and naked, when the Sythian Nation bordering upon Media was so victorious: not to add that Cambyses would not have been able to undertake, and perform such a Conquest in so little a space. Considerable certainly is that which the Writers of Alexander's Acts have committed to memory, as Curtius, Plutarch, Arianus, and even Aristobolus (who by command of the King was an eye witness of it) as he is cited by Strabo: That he was buried in his own City Pasargardis in Persia, where his Epitaph was plain to be read, in which after telling the Traveller who he was, he desired him not to grudge him that Earth wherewith his Body was covered. The Tomb was opened by Alexander, either ther out of hope to find some Treasure, or (what was pretended) out of desire to honour his dead body with some Ceremonies, and in it were found an old Target, two Sythian Bows and a Sword. The Coffin wherein he lay Alexander caused to be covered with his own Robe, and a Crown of Gold to be set thereon. These things something weaken the credit of that opinion which Herodotus relateth as the most probable of those that were held in his time. But less credit is to be given to that * which will have him slain in a Sea-fight against the inhabitants of Samus; and * another that lengtheneth his life to 100 years, whereas he scarce passed 70. Herodotus giveth to his reign 29 years; but most agree that he reigned 30. which must be counted from his first obtaining the Kingdom of Media.

5. What time passed from the Conquest of Babylon, and the beginning of his Monarchy, unto his death, is controverted amongst learned Writers. Some reckon ten years, or thereabouts, and others but three, of which number was once Joseph Scaliger, who afterwards retracted it as an error; but Ludovicus Capellæ hath renewed the assertion, making it probable by arguments drawn from Scripture, who therefore is to be consulted in his sacred * Chronology. Cyrus had issue two Sons, Cambyses and Smerdis, or Tanaxares, with three daughters, Aossa, Meroe, and Arystona, to which Cresus addeth Amytis. Aossa and Meroe his brother Cambyses afterwards married; and Darius Hystaspis obtained Arystona, as also Aossa after the death of Cambyses. Of the two sons, to Cambyses he left his Kingdom, and to Smerdis or Tanaxares assigned the Government of Media, Armenia, and the Cassians, according to Xenophon.

6. Cambyses presently after he came to the Government, made all possible provision for a war with Egypt, the cause whereof is to be enquired after. Herodotus telleth a story how he sent to Amasis King of that Country to desire his daughter Nitetis in marriage, which he not daring to deny because of the then formidable Power of the Persians, and not willing to gratify him absolutely, for that he conceived his daughter would be entertained but as a Concubine, he found out a way as he thought to satisfy Cambyses, and yet keep his daughter. There was one of Apries his predecessor's daughters yet unmarried, her he sent to him under the name of his own, who when she had sufficiently ingratiated her self with Cambyses, told him how indeed she was nothing a kin to Amasis, but begotten by his Lord and Master; whereat the Persian conceived such indignation, that, to be revenged on him, he invaded Egypt. But that which moved Cambyses to send for this woman, seemeth something strange. He had formerly desired from Amasis a Physician for the Eyes; the best that could be procured in Egypt, wherewith he gratifying him, the man took it ill of Amasis to be sent out of his native Country, that in way of revenge, he moved the matter to Cambyses, concluding with himself, that the King of Egypt would not send his own daughter: This was the saying of the Persians; which Herodotus rather approveth than what the Egyptians alledged, that Cambyses was son to Nitetis the daughter of Apries, and that the Persians ascribed that to the Son which belonged to the Father, because they would have Cambyses born of Cassandane the daughter of Pharnaspes, of the noble race of Achæmenes; and yet he confesseth there was a report, that besides Cassandane, Cyrus kept Nitetis as his Concubine, whom he most affected, and that to revenge his Mother upon her, Cambyses when but young threatened, and after his Father's death made War upon Egypt. However things might go in reference to the daughter of Apries, Cambyses seemeth to have invaded that Kingdom, upon pretence of the right he had to it as heir by conquest to Nebuchadnezar, who subdued it, though it revolted from his Successors; which might be concealed from Herodotus by the Priests, who spared not to invent lyes for a cover to the disgrace of their Country.

7. While Cambyses was yet busied in his preparations, one Phanes an Halicar-nassæan by birth, taking something in distaste from Amasis, whom he served, fled out of Egypt by ship, and coming into Persia, advised this King, that for his better passage of the sandy Desarts, he should send to the King of the Arabians for safe conduct, who being no good friend to the Egyptians, came and met him with Camels bearing abundance of water, which was necessary for the sustentation of the Army in that hot and dry place. Ere Cambyses could arrive in Egypt, Amasis had prevented captivity by a natural death; and Phanemænis his Son having succeeded him, expected his coming at Pelusium one of the mouths of Nile. Here a Battle being fought, the Egyptians were overthrown thrown and fled to Memphis, whither Cambyfes sent after them to yield up themselves to him; but they tare in pieces the Messengers, and then being besieged, stood out for some time; but at length the City was taken. Plammenius had his Son put to death before his eyes, to try his patience, though the Conqueror too late repented of it, and had given him his life with the Kingdom to govern, as a Province, had he not attempted new matters, for which he was forced to drink Bulls blood, and so died, having reigned six months after his Father.

His extra-
gant practices.

8. This work done in Aegypt, Cambyfes betook himself to extravagant practices. The dead body of Amasis he caused to be brought forth, to be beaten, pinched, and then burnt, contrary to the practice as well of the Perfians as Aegyptians, who abhorred such a thing, because the former accounted Fire a God, and the latter a ravenous beast, perishing with the thing devoured by it. Then resolved he to make a three-fold War: One upon the Carthaginians, another upon the Ammonians, or the Inhabitants of the place situate about the Temple of Fupier Hammon, and the third against the long-lived Ethiopiens, who inhabited Africk, near to the Southern Sea. He resolved to send a Fleet against the Carthaginians, an Army of Foot against the Ammonians, and as for the Ethiopiens, he would first send to discover their Country. While his Messengers were dispatching towards Ethiopia, he gave order to the Phenicians (who having yielded themselves, were his only strength at Sea) to fight against Carthage, which they flatly refused, because that City was a Colony of their own, and thereby this design was dashed. After the return of his messengers, who brought him word how he was slighted by the Ethiopian King, in great rage and haste he set forwards against him, without all thought of victualling his Army, commanding all his foot to follow, except the Gracians. When he was come to Thebes, he sent about 50000 men against the Ammonians, with command after they had spoiled them to burn the Temple; and so he marched on with the rest of the Army. But ere he had passed the fifth part of his journey, all provisions failed, and all the beasts that carried burthens were eaten up; yet did he not now recollect himself, but proceeded till they were constrained to eat up every tenth man, and then returned he with great loss and disgrace to Memphis, where he dismissed the Greeks from his service. The forces sent against the Ammonians, never reached thither, neither ever returned, being all overwhelmed, as was reported, in the Sandy Wilderness.

Expeditions.

9. Cambyfes at his return to Memphis, found the Citizens in great mirth and jollity, for that Apis, their god had appeared to them lately; which he interpreting as an expression of Joy for his bad success, wounded the beast in the thigh (thinking to strike him into the belly) of which he died. He derided much the Aegyptians for such deities; those that were found rejoicing, he commanded to be slain, and the Priests to be beaten with rods. For such impiety they accounted him stricken with that madness, which afterward appeared. For not long after, he sent his brother Smerdis back into Persia, having conceived great indignation against him, because he alone of all the Perfians, could draw a Bow that was brought him by his messengers out of Ethiopia. After this he dreamed, that one came and told him how Smerdis sat on the Throne, and with his head reached to Heaven, whereupon, he sent Prexaspes his greatest confidant to make him away, who murdered him in a pretended hunting, or as some said, drowned him in the Red Sea. To this he added the murder of his own Sister, whom, without any example, he had married, because the upbraided him with their brother's death. Memorable is the answer of his Judges, who, when he demanded, whether there was not a Law among the Perfians, that a man might marry his own Sister, answered, they found no such Law, but one there was, viz. The King might do whatsoever he listed. Then married he one Sister, and afterwards another, whereof the younger he killed being great with Child, as the Aegyptians reported, so that the miserable double.

He murdered
and sister.

10. To this rage and madness against his relations, he added fury towards those that were nearest about him. Asking Prexaspes the Minister of his paricide, what his people thought of him, and receiving this answer, that they thought him too much given to Wine, that it might be seen how sober he was to do mischief, he said it should be a demonstration, if he could shoot with an arrow the Soa of Prexaspes right into the heart, which accordingly he did. The day after he buried quick twelve other Perfians for no fault at all, and commanded commanded Cræsus the Lydian to be slain for admonishing him gravely concerning such enormities, having dispatched him himself with an Arrow, if he had not taken him to his heels. His servants notwithstanding preferred Cræsus alive, expecting a reward if he should afterwards repent of his death. And he really joyced in his preservation, when he returned to himself; but put them to death for their disobedience. Many more such like things he did whilst he remained at Memphis, and raged against the Images and Temples of the Aegyptians.

warp.

11. But whilst he thus spent his time, two of the Magi, Medians by birth, conspired against him. One of them he had left Overseer of his household affairs, named Patizithes, who having certain knowledge of the death of Smerdis, though it was kept very secret, took occasion thereat to rebel, because most of the Perfians thought this Prince yet living. For, having with him in the Kings house a brother as like him in the lineaments and proportion of body as in name, him he placed in the Throne, and sent up and down through the Empire, to persuade every one rather to obey Smerdis the son of Cyrus than Cambyfes. One of these messengers coming down to the Army towards Aegypt, found it at Ecbatane in Syria, where standing in the midst, he proclaimed what was enjoined, Cambyfes being much startled, blamed Prexaspes for having neglected to execute his commands; but he protesting his obedience therein, and that he had buried his Brother with his own hands, the messenger was perfused and fetched back, out of whom Prexaspes getting out that he had not himself seen Smerdis, but Patizithes had given him instructions as from him, easily conjectured what was at the bottom, and therewith acquainted the King. Then too late did Cambyfes bewail his Brother, and resolving with all speed to march for Susa, as he mounted on horseback his Sword fell out of the Scabbard, and wounded him in the Thigh. Demanding the name of the place, he gave himself for lost, for that it had been told him he should die in Ecbatane, which he had ever interpreted of the place in Media so called, where he hoped it would be in his old age. Twenty days after, he revealed the whole matter concerning his brother to the Nobility about him, conjuring them not to suffer the Empire to return to the Medes, but rather recover it the same way it had been betrayed. Not long after his thigh-bone being putrified, he died, when he had reigned seven years and five months. He left no issue, and so the direct line of Cyrus in him received its period.

Cambyfes died.

SECT. II.

From the death of Cambyfes to that of Xerxes.

1. Smerdis the Magician (called also Mardus, Sphendadates, and Oropastes) reigned those seven months which were wanting to complete the eight year of Cambyfes, whom the Perfians believed not as to his brothers death, but thought that indeed he was alive and reigned, because Prexaspes feared to confess that he killed him. In this time he, or rather his brother, wonderfully pleased all men, except the Perfians, remitting to other Nations their Tributes, and excusing them from War for three years. But in the eight month he was discovered by the means of Otanes, a man of highest rank in Persia, who suspected him for a counterfeit, because he never would appear in publick, nor admit any of the Nobility into his presence. He having a Daughter then at Court, which had been Concubine to Cambyfes, and now was in the same quality to him that reigned, as all the rest of his wives, to her he sent to know, whether it was indeed the Son of Cyrus with whom the lay. She having had no acquaintance with that Prince, could give him no answer, and neither could the come near Stossa, who being Sister to Smerdis might easily know him, for that the

the Magician to prevent intelligence, kept them severed one from another: This increasing the suspicion, Otanes sent to her again, charging her as he lay asleep to know whether he had any ears; for Cyrus had upon some account cut off the ears of Smerdis the Magician. She obeyed her Father when it came to her course, notwithstanding the danger, and the day following confirmed him fully in what he had suspected.

A conspiracy against them.

2. Otanes presently discovered the matter to Apathines and Gobryas, two men of prime rank also among the Persians, who easily giving him credit, as having suspected the same thing themselves, agreed to take three more, each of them one, into Council about it. Otanes brought Intaphernes, Gobryas chose Megabyzus, Apathines took Hydarnes, and Darius being then arrived at Susa from Perse, which his Father Hydaspes governed, they also thought fit to add him to their number. Darius when admitted, signified, that he had been assured of the cheat, how he was come to Town upon no other account than to kill the impostor, and urged them to join with him and attempt it speedily. Otanes was much against such hasty proceedings, desiring further to consult about it, but Darius alleging the danger of delay, for which cause, if they would not attempt something that very day, he would go and discover rather than be discovered, at length they agreed.

3. But while they were thus debating the matter, the Magi knowing that Prexaspes had made away Smerdis the Son of Cyrus, and considering how nearly it concerned them to make him their own, had sent for him, and by vast promises endeavoured to purchase his secrecy in that private affair. He seemed to comply, and desired that the Persians might be called together under the wall, that he might persuade them, that he who now reigned was the true Smerdis. But after he had mounted the Turret, he began to reckon up the Pedigree of Cyrus from Achomenes, related his kindness and good turns done to the Persians, and then telling the whole matter concerning Smerdis whom he had murdered, after he had laid many curses upon them, except they recovered the Empire, and revenged themselves upon the Magi, he threw himself down headlong and died. The seven Conspirators utterly ignorant of this, arrived at the Court, at such time as the Magi were consulting concerning what had happened, where the Porters easily admitted them, because of their dignity, nothing being suspected of them. But coming into the house, they were stopped by such Eunuchs as there waited, whereupon they forced their passage with their Swords, and were encountered by both the Magi, who having taken the Alarm, and perceived the matter, betook themselves to their weapons. One of them wounded Apathines in the Thigh, and put out the eye of Intaphernes: the other retired into another room, whither he was pursued by Darius and Gobryas. Gobryas grappling with him, Darius stood idle for fear of wounding his friend; but Gobryas bidding him strike though it were thow his sides, he did it at adventure, and slew the Magician. Both of them being slain, they cut off their heads, and carrying them out, acquainted the Persians with what they had done. Then fell they upon such Magicians as they could meet, which the Persians taking as an example, did the like, so that if night had not intervened, all that sort of men had perished, and this day was observed annually as a great Festival, in which none of the Magicians stirred abroad. This was the end of the usurpation, wherein seven Magi are said by some to have been partakers, but if so, those two brothers are to be accounted the chief, one of them counterfeiting the right Heir.

The Conspirators consult about a little meat.

Conspirations.

4. This tumult being over in five days time, the seven Conspirators fell into consultation about a settlement. Otanes spoke for the taking away of Monarchy, which he urged, from the example of Cambyses and the Magician, was apt to degenerate into Tyranny, and would have had the Government renitted to the people in a Democratical way. Megabyzus was for Oligarchie; but Darius of all the three sorts preferred Monarchy, as that into which at length the other would pass, through seditions and the ambition of such particular men as should be able to advance themselves above their Neighbours. The other four subscribed to his opinion as best, which therefore being agreed on by the major part, several capitulations were made in order to the election. Otanes desired that both himself and family might be exempted from the regal jurisdiction, which was granted, and all possible honour further decreed to him for his pains taken in the discovery. It was agreed amongst the other six, that it should be lawful for them at any time to come into the Palace, except the King were with his wife, and the King was prohibited to to take a wife any where but out of their Families. As for the election, it was resolved, that all the next morning by Sun-rise riding into the Suburbs, he whose Horse first neighed, should obtain the Empire of Cambyses.

Darius obtained the Kingdom.

5. Darius obtained it through the cunning of Ochares his Groom, who having knowledge from his Master of the business, the night before the controversy was to be decided, put his Horse to Mare in the place, whether they were to ride. The Horse the next morning remembering his mate neighed, for which, as coming by accident, the other five adored Darius as King. Having thus obtained the Kingdom, though he had children already by a daughter of Gobryas, yet the more to strengthen his title, he married the two daughters of Cyrus which remained; Astossa the wife of her brother Cambyses, and of the Magicians, and Artystona yet a Virgin: he also took Parinys daughter to Smerdis the Son of Cyrus, and Phedaina the daughter of Otanes. This he did, being also himself of regal extraction, both allied to ancient and modern Kings. He was issued from Achomenes, Cyrus and his Father Hydaspes being brother's sons, the one to Cambyses, and the other to Artamenes, as some have reported. This translation of the Kingdom is said to have been first revealed to Cyrus, at such time as having passed the river Araxes, he was marching against the Massagetes; For he dreamed that he saw the eldest Son of Hydaspes (which was this; for he had three younger Sons, Artabanus, Aarnes, and Artaphernes), having wings on his shoulders wherewith he overshadowed Asia and Europe. At that time he was about twenty years old, and Armour-bearer to Cyrus (according to **Ælian*) who sent him back into Perse, and as some said, caused him to be imprisoned. After his death he was delivered out of Prison, and made governor of the Persian Magi, accompanied Cambyses into Aegypt, and when he had discovered the imposture of the Magi, joined with the other Princes against them, and then either by the neighing of his Horse, or by strong hand, as some have thought, obtained the Empire.

6. Though thus Darius obtained the Sovereignty; yet it seemeth to some, to have been as a perpetual Dictatorship, who think it probable, that the other six had also by turns the exercise of Tributinal jurisdiction, together with him. First, because Aeschylus who fought against the Forces of Darius at Marathon, nameth two kings, viz. Maraphis and Artaphernes, betwixt the slaughter of the Magi and Empire of Darius, who seem no other than Mardonius and Artaphernes, reckoned by Ctesias amongst the seven. Then in the holy Scripture, together with the edict of Darius in the second year of his reign, the assent of Artababshira King of Perse is joyned, which may well enough be taken for the said Artaphernes; though others do otherwise expound the place. And, to add something not altogether so material, the other Conspirators foreseeing how burthenom they should be to Darius (which in what other way could it be than this?) bound him with an **Oath* most sacred amongst the Persians, that neither with Payson, Sword, any other violence, nor by famine should he kill any of them; though it proved not so sacred as to be inviolable.

The building of the Temple proceeded.

7. In the second year of Darius the building of the Temple which had been interrupted, began again and proceeded. The Samaritans bribed the Courtiers in the time of Cyrus, to hinder the work, and Cambyses having been formerly no friend to it, when he came to reign stopped it by express command, through the calumination of such as bore the Jews no good will. The Magician also forbade it upon the same account, it being clear from Scripture, that two several Princes named Achuerus and Artaxerxes withstood it; and that betwixt the reigns of Cyrus and Darius. But when the adversaries now betook themselves to Darius, expecting from him a countermand to the Jews (who being reproved for their remissions by the Prophet Haggai, were fallen again to build upon the foundation formerly laid) he instead of any such inhibition, sent them an express command, not only not to hinder, but at his own cost to further the Structure, allowing also to the Priests expenses for the daily Sacrifices. The Jews therefore encouraged by this new Edict, and confirmed by the Prophecies of Haggai and Zachariah, proceeded prosperously in the building.

8. In the same year had the Prophet Zachariah a Vision, in which the Angel interceding for Jerusalem, and the Cities of Judah, mentioneth the Lord's having had indignation threeeore and ten years. The rise or beginning of these years Lucifer Cappellus fetcheth from the destruction of the Temple. For from the first Edict of Cyrus, and the end of the Captivity, to this time, passed about eleven years (Cyrus according to his account, reigning but three after the taking of Babylon, lon, Cambyfes together with the Magician eight, and Darius one; from which must be deducted fo much as the removal of the Jews would require ) even fo many as paffed from the beginning of the Captivity to the defolation of the Temple, and fo the Temple lay defolate full Seventy years. Hence is observable, that as the State and Policy of the Fenile Commonwealth was broken, and much impaired eleven years before the deftruction of the Temple, fo was it renewed at the end of the Captivity fo many years before the re-edifying of it, which hitherto had been attempted without fuccels, but now renewed, was happily finifhed in the fixth year of Darius, as to the houfe it felf, though three years more feem to have been taken up in the building the porches and other appendices to it. And as the greateft part of the holy Veffels were carried away in the Captivity of Fe-choniath, eleven years before the deftruction of the Temple, fo were they fent back again fo many years before the reftauration of it. Laftly, this alfo is observable, that as from the deftruction of this typical Temple to the rebuilding of it, paffed Seventy years, fo from the Conception of Chrift the true and fpiritual Temple, to the final defolation of the fhadow or typical one at Jerufalem, fo many years paffed, precisely Seventy.

The Empire divided into twenty Provinces,

All the Con-fpirators made away.

And recover- ed.

9. Darius after his fettlement in the Kingdom, divided it into twenty Provinces (which the Perfians called Satrapies) over each of which he conftituted a Prefident, withal appointing what tribute each Nation fhould pay. For, hitherto, under the two former Kings, nothing was appointed concerning tribute, the feveral people contributing money by way of benevolence, whereupon, becaufe of this new impofition, they ftiled Darius an Huckfter, Cambyfes a Lord, and Cyrus a Father. Cyrus was mild, and ufed them as children, ftriving to deferve well of them; Cambyfes was fharp and morofe, and Darius by all ways poffible purfued for money. The next thing memorable concerning Darius, is, his putting to death Intaphernes, one of the Confpirators, for abufing the Porters, and violent intruding into the Palace, contrary to the Capitulations agreed on amongst them. Having an intention to go to the King, they that kept the gate ftopped him, faying that he was with his wife, which he thinking to be a lye, drew his Sword, and cutting off their ears and nofes, then tyed the reigns of an horfes bridle to their necks and let them go. They prefenting themfelves in this cafe to the King, he firft fufpected fome treafonable defign of all the fix, but finding that the reft knew nothing of the matter, he put Intaphernes to death, with all his fons except the eldeft, whom he granted to the intreaties of his Mother. But not only him, but all the reft alfo who were burthenfom to him, another telleth us that he made away by a new kind of death. He caufed many afhes to be laid betwixt fome walls, over which laying a rafter, thereupon he feafted them very nobly; but being faft afleep the floor fell, and they therewith into the afhes, where they perifhed. If he deftroyed them in this ftrange manner, probable it is, that he defired to be rid of them, becaufe of fome power to which they might pretend by virtue of a previous agreement, not enduring any incommbrance or refraint upon his prerogative; for that Sovereignty is impaiant of any competition in the Throne.

10. About the tenth year of his reign the City of Babylon rebelled againft him, having of late recovered that greatnefs of mind which fometimes poffeffed it's Inhabitants. Cyrus demolifhed not their walls, but left them intire with the gates ftanding, which putting them in a poffure of defence, they took courage at the forein Wars of Cambyfes, and the firs that happened about the Magi. He gathered his forces together, with all fpeed, and laid fiege to it; but they being refolved to ftand out to the utmoft, chofe every one a woman to make ready their meat, and to fave provifions, killed all the reft of that Sex except their Mothers. Then, as if they had made themfelves impregnable, they derided the Perfians, faying, they fhould be overcome when a Mule foaled: And above nineteen months they held out, notwithstanding all their attempts and devices. At length in the 20th Zopyrus Son to Megabyzus, one of the chief Commanders in Darius his Army, being encouraged by his Mule that foaled, mangled his face, cutting off his ears and nofe, and in gore Blood counterfeited a flight to the befieged, as thus abufed by the king. The Babylonians believed, and according to his expectation chofe him for their General, after which, he made feveral fallies, and the befiegers according to the former agreement fled; but within a while he betrayed the City to Darius. He demolifhed the walls, and nailing 3000 of the principal aQors unto croffes, pardoned the reft, for whom 5000 women were fought out, by whom they might repair their decayed flock. Zopyrus was rewarded, as with other other things in greateft account amongst the Perfians, fo with the City of Babylon for his life. The fon of this Zopyrus was Megabyzus, who afterwards conducted the Perfian Army againft the Athenians and their companions: and fon to this Megabyzus was that Zopyrus, who revolted from the Perfians to the Athenians.

Deus goeth againft the Scythians.

11. After the recovery of Babylon, Darius wanting neither men nor money, undertook an Expedition againft the Scythians, to be revenged on them for holding the (a) dominion of Asia 28 years, at fuch time as perfuing the Cimmerians they (a) Vid. l. 1. c. 1. overthrew and kept under the Medes, whom they found Lords of all in the days of their King Cyaxares. This (b) Herodotus maketh the pretended caufe of the War, but (c) Fufin from Trogus relateth, that it was becaufe Lanthius the Scythian King denied him his daughter in marriage. Darius caufed a bridge to be laid over the Bosphorus into Europe half a mile long, and thereon paffing his forces croffed the Sea himfelf by fhip, and gave charge to the Ionians his Subjects ( who together with the Boians, and others that lived upon the Hellefpont, A. M. 3497. to fail up the Sea as far as the River Ifter ( which parted Scythia from Thrace ) over which he alfo enjoyed them to make a bridge. In his march through Thrace all fubmitted to him except the Getes, who out of ignorance withftood him. The Ionians prepared the bridge againft his coming, whom, after he had tranfported his forces, he commanded there to expect him Sixty days, at the end of which if he came not, he permitted them to return into their own Country.

12. The Scythians had no conftant dwelling or habitation, removing with their wagons, wherein they lay, and cattel, from place to place, according as they were furnifhed with grals, living upon milk and raw flefh, without Towns or corn, and taking their conduct from the Pole-Star, as the Chirm Tartars their pofferty at this day alfo live, the great Chrim himfelf having no other City than an Agora, or one of Carts. Having intelligence of his coming, they fent their wives, children, and cattle towards the North; then ftopped all the Wells, deftroyed all Fruits of the Earth, and fometimes appearing to the Perfians, again retired on purpofe to deride them. Darius feeing himfelf thus mocked, and defpairing to come at them by reafon of their perfect knowledge of the Country, and his ignorance therein, fearing alfo his provifions might fail, and efpecially left the Ionians fhould forfake him at the Bridge, now that the Sixty days were expired, he thought how he might make a fane retreat. The Scythians getting knowledge hereof, laboured to remove the Ionians from the Bridge, telling them how good it would be for them to returne home in fafety; for that now the time prefixed by the King was expired. They fell into confultation hereupon, and Miliadates Tyrant or petty Prince of the Cherfonefus befought them, that, having this opportunity, they would not let it flip, but free themfelves from the Perfian Yoke. But Hiftians Tyrant of Miletus a City of Ionis, and others, who had enflaved their own Citizens at home, fearing, left if the power of the Perfians, by which they were maintained, were broken, they fhould be reduced into a private condition or worfe; by their own Country-men, refolved, that nothing more concerned them, than that the greatnefs of that Empire might be eftablifhed. Yet it was judged convenient to break the Bridge fo far, as to be out of bow-shot from the Scythian fide, therein to comply with that People, who perhaps elfe might force them to do it. Beginning therefore to break it, the Scythians believed their promife of performing the whole, and returned to hunt out the Perfians. Expecting them to retreat that way, which was beft for Provifions, they mifled of them; for Darius returned the fane he went, and with great difficulty recovered the banks of Ifter. Here he arrived by night, and was much difcouraged when he found the bridge broken; but upon the firft fhout Hiftians came with all his Veffels and made it up for the tranfportation of the Army.

His retreat:

Earth and Water demanded of Amysas King of Macedonia.

13. Darius paffing over his Army marched through Thrace unto Seflus, and thence failed over into Asia, leaving Megabyzus in Europe with an Army of 80000 men. Megabyzus, according to order, fubdued the Perinthians and Paeonians, whom he tranflated into Asia; and having reduced to obedience all the Maritime Coast, fent into Macedonia to demand Earth and Water of Amysas the King. Thefe were Symbols of fubjection, fignifying an acknowledgment of fealty, and voluntary homage, the chief Sovereignty over all wherein propriety lay, being yielded up with thefe two Elements. Darius had formerly fent to demand them of the Scythians, and they in return fent him a Bird, Frog, Moufe, and five Arrows, leaving him to make the interpretation, which he framing according to his own wish, thought that they had yielded all those Elements wherein those Creatures live, and their Weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas construed the meaning to be this: O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, dive under the water, or creep into the holes of the Earth, for else our Arrows will overtake you; which exposition was accordingly verified. Amyntas doubting of his own strength, kindly entertained the Messengers, and granting what they came for, magnificently feasted them, in so much that being well heated with Wine they desired that women, according to the custom of Persia, might be brought in to them. He replied, that it was not the fashion of Macedonia; but yet he would gratifie them therein, which being done, they began to be uncivil towards the Women, whereat he inwardly fretted, but for fear suppressed his indignation. But his eldest Son Alexander being present, a young man of prompt boldness and little experience, desired him to quit the room, and let him alone to entertain the Guests; and though he suspected him for his courage, and disfavoured him from any rash attempt, yet did he withdraw accordingly. Alexander then told the Persians they might have liberty to enjoy those women, but for that it now grew late, he desired they would let them go out to walk, and make themselves ready, which done, they should come again. They assenting, he dressed so many bare-faced young men in women's Clothes, who, being brought in, when the Persians began to dally with them, according to his command stabbed them with Daggers hid under their Clothes for that purpose. Megabyzus hearing nothing of his Messengers, sent one Bubares a Persian down with an Army to make diligent search after them, but him Alexander easily took off by giving him his Sister Gyges in marriage, with whom he had fallen in love; so that he suffering the matter to rest in silence, no farther inquiry was made after it.

The occasion of the Ionian Rebellion.

14. The year following, being the 16th of his reign, Darius sent as success for to Megabyzus, Otanes the Son of Sisamnes, who took in the Cities Chalcedon, Byzantium, and Antander, with the Islands Lemnos, and Imbros. He himself was now returned to Susa, whither he carried along with him Histieus, who stood so much his Friend at the Bridge of Asper. Histieus having begun to build a City of his own in Thrace, Darius out of colour of doing him honour, and using his advice in his most important affairs, drew him away from it, knowing his great abilities, and fearing his restless Spirit. There he continued for some years, till not being able to hear so much talk of Empire, and Rule, wherein he himself had no share, he much preferred his antient Dominion though but over one City, before this Real, though plausible imprisonment, and therefore sought how he might kindle a Fire in Ionia, that for his interest in that Country he might obtain to be sent thither to quench it, and so with his liberty get some notable advantage for a great achievement. It hapned that his endeavours did but tend to the blowing up of that Spark, which was already kindled without his knowledge, in Aristagoras his Son in Law, who Governed Miletus in his absence. The first fire was occasioned by the inhabitants of the Island Naxos, who having banished some of their principal Citizens, the Exiles fled to Aristagoras for protection and succour. He knowing not well of himself how to restore them, sent to Artaphernes the brother of Darius, and his Lieutenant of Ionia then resident at Sardis, proposing the Conquest of that Island to him, and offering to subdue both it, and all the rest of the Cyclades to the obedience of the Persian Empire. Artaphernes acquainted the King with the business, and he approving of it, he lent him 200 Ships under the conduct of Megabates his Kinsman. They layled together towards Naxos, and it hapned in the way that Megabates harshly used one of Aristagoras his followers, for which he sharply rebuked him, as having no authority to punish those under his command. This the Persians took to haينously, that he gave intelligence underhand to the Naxians of their coming, who being forewarned were forearmed, so that no good could Aristagoras do, but spending his time to no purpose, was forced at length to raise his Siege. For this fruitless attempt, fearing disgrace, on worse from the Persians, that he might prevent it, he studied how to revolt, and draw the Ionians into Rebellion.

15. While he consulted with himself, a Message came from Histieus, who because the ways were so watched that he could send no Letters, shaved close the head of his trusty Slave, and thereon with an hot iron engraved such marks as served to make out his sentence, and after his hair was grown fast him to Miletus. Aristagoras having his head again as he was commanded, (which was all the message that the Slave carried by word of mouth) presently and gladly apprehended the matter, viz. that that he should excite the Ionians to rebel. Going now more cheerfully about his work, that the Milesians might more readily receive the motion, he restored them to a shew of Liberty, and to oblige the rest of the Cities by one means or other abdicated the power of their petty Princes or Tyrants, as they were called. But knowing how little able this strength would be to grapple with the whole power of Asia which presently would be upon them, he failed to Lacedaemon, there to desire assistance from Cleomenes the King; who refusing to intermeddle, he thence went to Athens, where, as before, he laid open the riches of Asia, with the imbecility of the Persians the present Masters thereof; and added, that the Milesians, as a Colony of the Athenians, might justly expect relief from their hands.

16. The conjuncture of Affairs at present were such at Athens, as he could not have had a more convenient opportunity: It hapned that Hippias the Son of Pisistratus, being expelled thence had withdrawn himself to Sardis, where he laboured with his whole might to make the Athenians odious to Artaphernes, and bring the City into the Command of Darius, that so it might return to his own Dominion. They sent their Embassadors after him, praying Artaphernes that he would give no credit to their Exiles; but he urging them, that if they meant to secure themselves, they would receive Hippias, they chose rather to become Enemies to the Persian, and therefore complied with the motion of Aristagoras. They agreed to send out twenty Ships under the Command of Melanthius, a man of principal note amongst them, with which the Eretrians (out of way of requital for aid formerly received from the Ionians) joyed other five. This was the beginning of those many evils, which afterwards fell both upon the Greeks and Barbarians, and of such wars as ended not till the destruction of the Persian Empire. It fell out in the nineteenth year of Darius, the second of the sixty ninth Olympiad, 501 before the Era of Christ, A. M. 3502.

17. Aristagoras with this force went against Sardis, which he easily took all but the Castle, wherein Artaphernes secured himself: A Fire prevented the plundering of the City, which was all turned into Ashes by the means of a Soldier's burning one particular house. The Confusion being great, the Persians and Lydians met together in the Market place, through which ran the River Pactolus having Golden Sands, and embodying themselves prepared to charge the Enemy, which when the Grecians perceived they fled for fear to the Mountain Tmolus, and thence to their Ships lying at Corefus in the Territories of Ephesus. The Persians in the pursuit slew a great part of them, amongst whom fell Euclidides Captain of the Eretrians, so much Celebrated by Simonides the Cean Poet, and other eminent men: Those that escaped dispersed themselves through the Cities. Aristagoras could not by any means persuade the Athenians from returning home; notwithstanding, for what had hapned to Sardis, Darius was exceedingly incensed against them, inasmuch that he commanded one of his Servants wherever he fate at meat, thrice to found these words in his ears; Sir, Remember the Athenians.

18. At this time all Cyprus revolted from the Persian, except the Amathusians, whom also the Rebels besieged; yet Darius, blinded by the specious promises of Histieus, let him go, thinking indeed that being present at he might do him special service in extinguishing the Rebellion. Though the Ionians were forsaken by their friends of Athens, yet they proceeded, and crossing the Hellespont took Byzantium with the Towns adjacent, and thence went into Caria, a great part whereof they drew into Society with them in the War. But the scene of Affairs was presently altered: Artabius the Persian with a numerous Army was sent against Cyprus, and the Ionians followed with a Fleet to the Aid of Onesilus, who first procured the revolt, and now lay before Amathusia. Both Parties being well appointed by Sea and Land, they engaged with their Fleets and Land Armies: The Ionians had the better by Sea, but on Land the Cypriots were betrayed by Sitalcor, Tyrant of the Curienenses, and by the Salaminians, so that being utterly routed, Onesilus was slain, and Aristagoras Prince of the Solians, and Son to that Philo-Cyprus whom Solon commended in his Verses above other Tyrants, or Reguli. The Ionians receiving intelligence of this overthrow, and how all the Cities in the Island were besieged except Salamis (which the Inhabitants had already given up to Gorgus their ancient Prince) hasted away. Of all Towns Soli stood longest out, but in the fifth Month was taken by the Persians who undermined the Walls; and thus Cyprus was reduced into its former Bondage, a year after it had cast off the yoke.

19. The Persian Lieutenants or Satraps, viz. Daurises, Hyemeer, and Otanes, who had married the Daughters of Darius, after they had driven the Ionians to their Ships, parted the revolted Cities which each of them should fall on. The two for-

He obtained the Countrey thereabout without much trouble, but besieging the Town, was cut off by the Thracians with all his Forces.

20. Histiæans being dismissed by Darius upon that account formerly mentioned, was ere this come to Sardis: Artaphernes demanding of him what should have moved the Ionians to Rebel, He answered that he knew not, but wondered at the thing: Whereunto the other replied, telling him plainly, that He had made that Shove which Ariftagoras had put on. Fearing therefore to stay with him, whom he perceived sufficiently to understand the matter, he fled the night after, and conveyed himself into the Island Chios, where the Inhabitants supposing that he came to promote the affairs of Darius, cast him into Prison, but upon farther advice restored him to liberty. Then sent he to some Persians lying at Sardis, who were partakers of his Conspiracy, willing them to Rise; but Artaphernes having timely notice thereof prevented it, by putting them to death. This device failing, he procured the Chians to convey him to Miletus, but there he could not be received, the Inhabitants rejoicing that they were rid both of him and Ariftagoras; so that endeavouring to get in by Night he was wounded in the Thigh, and forced to retire himself again to Chios. Here now not being able to procure any Ships by all his intreaties, he went over to Mitylene, where he persuaded the Lesbians to furnish him with eight Vessels, with which he sailed to Byzantium; and at this Port he intercepted all such Ships of the Ionians as, coming from Pontus, refused to obey him.

21. The Persian Generals having much weakened the power of the Carians, and subdued all the Ionians that lived upon the Hellepont, were now ready to go against Miletus both by Sea and Land. The Ionian Deputies assembling in Panionium, (the place of their Publick Councils) resolved to levy no Land Army against them, but withstand their violence from the Walls of Miletus, and make as great and strong a Fleet as possible. They ranged themselves in order of Battel near Leda, a little Island lying over against Miletus; the Wing that look'd towards the East the Milesians themselves made up with eighty Sail; to them joyned the Priæniens with twelve, and the Misians with three: By them stood the Teians with seventeen; and by them the Chians with an hundred Vessels. Beyond these were placed the Erythraens with eight Ships, and the Phocæans with three: Next to them stood the Lesbians with seventy, and in the last place were seen the Samiens making up the Western Wing with sixty Ships; the whole consisting of three hundred fifty three Gallies with three Ranks of Oars: But the Persian Navy contained six hundred of Phænicians, Cyprians, Ægyptians, and Cilicians.

22. Though the Persian Fleet almost doubled the other in number of Vessels, yet the Captains feared both the skill and valour of the Ionians, and therefore betook themselves to politicall Councils. They sent for the several Reguli or Tyrants of the Cities, whom Ariftagoras had deposed at the beginning of the War, and desired that every one would endeavour to draw off his own Citizens. While they were using their utmost endeavour herein, Dionysius the Phocian Captain, and General of the whole Ionian Navy, exercising his men continually for the Fight, they being unaccustomed to such Discipline, were after seven days weary of it; and pitching their Tents in the Island therein shaded themselves, and could not be got to their Ships. The Samiens doubting whitherto their sluggishness might tend, thought it wisdom to hearken to the Propositions made from the Persians, by Acees the Son of Syloson their Prince, who advised them by a timely Repentance, to save their estates, rather than expose themselves to the anger of the Persian, who though he were beaten at present, was able to bring another Fleet five times as big, so that their labour and danger would know no end: Their Captains therefore took occasion at the disorder of the Ionians to deny any further obedience, and when the Phænicians began to tow their Fleet together to fall on, they hoisted up their Sails and departed. After this pattern the Lesbians and a great part of the Ionians withdrew drew thither, and only the Chians stood to it; who taking many of their Enemies Ships lost more of their own, and at length fled to Land: Some of them running their Gallies on ground at Myale, went on foot by night unto Ephesus, where the women then Celebrating the Theopompia, the Inhabitants taking them for Thieves, issued out and slew many of them. But Dionysius having light on the Persian Gallies retreated not home, knowing his own Country would go to wrack with the rest; but going into Phænicia there robbed certain Ships of Burthen of much wealth, and thus enriched sailed into Sicily.

Sect. 2.

23. The Persians having thus done their work at Sea, presently laid Siege to Miletus, which by undermining the Walls, and using all sorts of Batteries, they utterly destroyed in the sixth Year after the Rebellion was first begun by Ariftagoras. Some of those Inhabitants which survived their Country, together with the Samiens, transported themselves into Sicily; the rest being brought to Susa before Darius, he, without any punishment inflicted on them, placed in the City Amisus, situated where the River Tygris falleth into the Red Sea. As for their grounds, the Persians took to themselves the Campaign Country, and gave the Mountainous Parts to the Carians of Pedulus. Histiæans seeing what was befallen Miletus, with some Lesbians subdued Chios easily, being weakened before, and thence with many Ionians and Æolians, he undertook an Expedition against Thasos; but hearing that the Phænicians were gone from Miletus into the other parts of Ionis, he returned back to Lesbus. Here his Forces not trusting themselves, he went over into the Province of Æarnes, as it were thence, and from the Territories of the Myrians adjoining to gather Forrage, where Harpagus the Persian then lying with a considerable Force, engaged with him in a Fight at Malena; and having cut off the greater part of his men, took him alive. Being carried to Susa unto Artaphernes, they nailed his Body to a Cross, and sent his Head as a Present to Darius, who was displeased that they had not presented him alive; and caused his Head to be buried, as of a Friend, and one that had well deserved of the Persians. Now not only Caria, but all the Islands and Cities on the Continent were also recovered without much trouble; the most beautiful of the Boys being made Eunuchs, and of the Girls sent to the Persian Court. And thus the Ionians were subdued the third time, once by the Lydians, and twice by the Persians; the Tributes were established by Artaphernes, according to Darius's former prescription, and all things settled at the cost of the revolvers.

death.

24. Two years after the destruction of Miletus, and in the 25th of his reign, Darius recalling the Commissions of all his late Captains, sent Mardonius the Son of Gobryas, who had married his daughter Artozostre, with a great power to the Sea. Mardonius coming into Cilicia, sent away all his Land Forces towards the Hellepont, and passing by Sea into Ionis, there dissolved all the Tyrannies, as they were called, or powers of single men, and brought in the Democratical Government into the Cities. After this, with his Fleet he subdued the Thasians, and with his Land Army other Macedonians besides them that formerly obeyed his Master; but losing from Acanthus and coasting by the Mountain Athos, such a Tempest fell upon the Navy as sunk three hundred Vessels, wherein perished above twenty thousand men. Then quartering his Foot in Macedonia, the Thracians called Brygi, fell in upon him by Night, and killing many, wounded him also; whereupon he turned his Forces upon them, and subduing them, carried back the Army into Asia. The year following Darius constrained the Thasians, who were accused by their Neighbours of having an intention to revolt, to pull down their Walls, and carry all their Ships to Andera. Then to try of what Temper the Grecians were, he sent throughout Greece to demand Earth and Water. The Lacedæmonians and Athenians threw the Messengers into Pits, bidding them thence to take Earth and Water to carry to their Master: But the Inhabitants of Ægina and other Islands out of fear complied, for which they were accused by the Athenian Embassadors at Sparta, as intending with the Persians to fight against Athens. Hereupon Cleomenes, one of the Kings, was sent to Chastise the Principal Revolvers, but such a Contention fell betwixt him and his Colleague Demaratus about it, as ended at length in the deprivation of the latter, who thus unjustly outed of his Patrimony, betook himself to Darius, by whom he was bountifully entertained.

25. When Darius sent into Greece to demand Earth and Water, he gave order to the Cities upon the Sea-Coasts to build long Ships and flat bottom'd Boats, for the Transportation of Horfe. The burning of Sardis by the means of the Athenians and Eretrians, was thrice every time he went to Meat still founded in his Ears: Hippias the late Prince of Athens was yet provoking him against that City, and at length procured

Seft. 2. procured Forces to reduce him into his former place. Under colour of restoring him, Darius intended, if possible, to subdue all Greece, and therefore removing Mardonius, under whom the Fleet had of late miscarried, he put in his room Datis cap. 94, 95, 96. a Mede, and Artaphernes his Brothers Son, to whom he gave in charge to lay waft Athens with Eretria, and bring the Inhabitants thereof Prisoners into his presence. In their passage they burnt Naxos, took some Forces and Hostages out of the Islands, and landed their Horse upon the Coasts of Eretria: They prepared to Fight, but the Enemy keeping himself within the Walls, they strongly attempted the storming of the City for six days, and on the seventh had it betrayed into their hands by Euphorbus and Philagrus, two of the Principal Citizens. The Athenians hearing of their approach, sent Phidippides a famous, though ordinary Foot-Post, to Lacedæmon, to desire that State to hasten their Succors. They resolved to send aid, but said it was impossible speedily to do it, for that they could not break the Law, which forbade them to go forth on the ninth day of the month Orxopeus the Moon was at the full. Whilst they expected that season, the Athenians made choice of Ten Captains for the War; and by this time the Persians, now Masters of Eretria, sailed into Attica, wherein they were conducted by Hippias to the Plains of Marathon, as most convenient for Horse. After the Athenians had taken the Field, the Plataeans came into their Aid, but a great dispute there was amongst the Captains, whether they should stand to the hazard of a Battle: Those that were for the Negative had carried it, but that Miltiades who was all for fighting, drew over Callimachus one of the Pol. marchis to his Party. The major part of the Votes then passing on his side, each Captain assigned his day to him, (who had formerly been Prince of the Cheronesus), and thence was expelled by the Persians committing the management of the Fight to his discretion.

26. Miltiades accepted of the Charge, yet thought good not to Fight till his own day (which was the tenth) should be arrived: Then set he the Army in order, and being at a miles distance from the Enemy, led very fast upon him, which the Persians attributed to madness, seeing the other so few in comparison of themselves, and badly provided both of Horse and Arms. The Fight continued long, wherein in the middle Battle the Persians put the other to flight; but in both the Wings the Grecians prevailed, and turning themselves upon those that worsted their Fellows, made great slaughter of them as far as the Sea side, where they also seized upon seven of their Ships. Concerning the number of the slain, Writers do not agree: Herodotus writeth of six thousand four hundred of the Barbarians, and an hundred ninety two of the Grecians. On the one side fell Hippias, as Justin delivers lib. 2. c. 9. out of Trogus, and Callimachus on the other. What year the Battle was fought is not certainly known, but in the second or third of the seventy second Olympiads, and four or five before the Death of Darius.

27. Datis and Artaphernes returning into Persia, carried the Eretrians Captive along with them to Susa, where they presented them before Darius; though Ctesias lib. 1. c. 6. wrote that Datis was slain in the Battle of Marathon, and that his Body was denied to be restored. Darius placed the Eretrians in America in Cissia, a Country so called, at two hundred and ten Furlongs distance from Susa, the Possession whereof their Posterity held a long time together with their own Language. Notwithstanding the defeat at Marathon, he left not off thoughts of Conquering Greece, making all possible provision for another Invasion. But in the fourth year after, more work fell into his hands; for though Diodorus telleth us that the Ægyptians much honoured him as one of their Law-givers, they now rebelled. The year following he was provided for both Expeditions, and was about to undertake them when the custom of the Country first required that he should name his Successor. He had three children before he was King by the Daughter of Gobryas, whereof the eldest Artobazanes, (by others called Artamenes and Artamenes) challenged the Kingdom by virtue of his Birthright: But it was judged due to Xerxes his eldest Son by Aossa Cyrus his Daughter, who was Founder of the Empire, and he accordingly was declared at this time; although some make this civil and loving Contest betwixt the two Brothers, to have happened after their Father's death, and been judged by Artaphernes their Uncle. But as Darius was about setting forwards for Greece, he was prevented by death, the first year after the Rebellion of Ægypt ending, after he had reigned thirty six years complete, in the third year of the seventy third Olympiad ending, before the Æra of Christ, 585. *A. Xerxes.

28. Xerxes succeeded his Father in the third year of the third Olympiad, being the fourth King of Persia, the right to the Empire whereof he fetched from Cyrus his Grandfather by the Mother's side. He was scarcely settled in the Throne, when Mardonius

Mardonius his Kinsman stirred him up with earnestness not to give over the War which he had begun with Greece, promising to himself great command upon the Conquest of Europe, which he made Xerxes believe would be as readily performed as spoken. He, though ambitious enough, was not at first of himself very forward, but as it concerned him, thought first of recovering Ægypt, for which all things were left in readiness by his Father, and in the year next after his death, turned his Forces thither with present success: For he reduced that Country under the yolk, which he laid heavier upon it than formerly, and committed the Government thereof to his Brother Achemenes, who was after many years slain by L. marus the Lybian.

Recovereth Æ-
gypt.

renewing the War with Greece.

29. Ægypt being thus fortunately recovered, he was therewith much elevated and now had resolved to follow on the War with Greece, but to hear what his Captains would say, he called them together to advise about it, to whom with vanity seemed he opened his mind, and was seconded by an indiscreet flattering Speech of Mardonius, who seemed with words to be able to blast the present Condition of Greece. His Uncle Artabanus, a grave and long experienced man, strongly urged the contrary, shewing how vain Humane Confidence is, how brittle and unstable the Fortune of Princes and others, which appeared sufficiently in his Fathers expedition against the Syrians first, and since that against the Athenians; that the Greeks were not so weak a Nation he proved by the Battle at Marathon; that the thing which he attempted was most dangerous; to be thought on again and again; that without mature deliberation the Attempt would be rash, however the success should happen, that God many times pulls down the highest things, and humbly the haughty that trust in their own strength, by making them to fall into sudden Calamities: And as for Mardonius, he chafed his youthful and ambitious heart with a sharp reprehension, foretelling him what would be the reward of his rashness. But this wise Council could not be heard from a grave man, the Ears of Xerxes being stopped by the suggestions of one more agreeable to his head-strong and youthful humour; so that he imputed to his Uncle baseness of mind and cowardise, inflicting this punishment upon him for it, that staying at home, he should not partake of so glorious an expedition. To this enterprize he was also stirred up by the Alenades, or Princes of Thessaly, who grudged at the Liberties of the Greeks; by the Son of Pisistratus also banished Athens, who living in his Court, abused his credulity by the help of a Wizard or Fortune-Teller.

30. Yet not long after, considering what Artabanus had said, he changed his purpose, and calling his Council together again, after he had commended his Uncles opinion, signified the same unto them, at which all the wiser sort much rejoiced; but the thing running in his mind, so that he was disturbed in his sleep, he returned to his former resolution, and concluded on the expedition. In the preparation for it three years (Herodotus saith four) were taken up, all Asia being concerned therein so far as to be removed out of its place. A Navy he provided out of all the Sea Coasts of his Empire to the number of about twelve hundred Vessels, which he commanded to meet at Cama and Phocæa, and having out of all his Provinces gathered great multitudes of Horse and Foot, at length he moved from Susa in the fourth year of the seventy fourth Olympiad, and in the fifth year (not after the Ægyptian Expedition, as Herodotus hath it, but) of his Reign. All the Land Forces met at Critæa, with which he passed the River Helys, and came to Celæne, a City of Phrygia, where Pythius the Lydian (or Bythinian, as Pliny will have him) entertained him and his Army, and presented him with a vast sum of money, which he returned with advantage. And so at length he came to Sardis, whence he sent into Greece to demand Earth and Water, as Symbols of Subjection. The Navy lib. 1. c. 23, 24. was come to the Cheronesus by this time, and that it might shun the inconvenience which that, formerly governed by Mardonius, had incurred, by failing about the Mountain or Promontory of Athos, he caused the Mountain to be cut off from the main, by a Ditch so broad as two Vessels might sail a breast, through which the whole Navy passed. And wintering this year at Sardis, he commanded a Bridge to be laid over the Hellepont (a mile over wanting an eighth part) which being shattered and broken by a great Tempest, he took so hainously, as he commanded three hundred Stripes to be given the Sea, and a pair of Fetters to be cast into it in token of servitude, and causing the Heads of the Workmen to be cut off, ordered other Bridges to be made.

He wintereth
at Sardis.

31. In the beginning of the Spring he moved from Sardis with his whole Army and came to Abydos, the day being turned into night by a sudden darkness (though no Stars appeared) at his setting forth, with which portentous thing lib. 1. c. 25. (being

SECT. 1. (being no true Eclypse) Pythius, who formerly entertained him, was so terrified, that of his five Sons lifted in the Army, he desired the eldest, as the comfort of his old age, might be left to him, at which the King was so angry, that he commanded the young Manto to be cut in two, and the parts so to be laid asunder that the Army might pass betwixt them. When he was come to Abydos he had an extream desire to view all his Forces, for which purpose he had an high ascent raised for him, where he also desired to see a Sea-fight, which in shew was performed, and wherein the Sidonians had the better: with the sight whereof, and of all his Land Forces on the Shore, he was elevated into a great passion of Joy apprehending of how many thousands he was Master, and then presently again into another of weeping, the cause of which Arabanus his Uncle demanding (who had thus far accompanied him) he told him, it was in considering that of so many thousands not a man should be alive a 100 years after. Hence that wife old Man took occasion to discourse to him most gravely of the vanity, and miseries of this life, and being again importuned to tell his opinion concerning the expedition, did it with the same faithfulness as formerly, after which he sent him back to Susa to govern as his Deputy in his absence.

into Europe.

32. Then prepared he for his passage into Europe, and having performed his Heathenish Devotions to the Sun, by one of the Bridges bending towards the Euxine, passed over his Horse and Foot, and by another inclining towards the Ægean, his Slaves and Beasts; seven days, and as many nights being taken up in the passage. The Fleet sayled Westward to the Promontory of Sarpedon, the Land Forces marched through the Cerberus of Thrace to Agora and so bore down towards the Bay of Melana, where a River of the same name failed them in drinking, as Scamander, and several others in Asia are said to have done before. Passing over, and moving Westward they came to Dorisus, where being a vast plain watered with the great River Hebrus, there they pitched their Tents, and Xerxes mustered his whole Army, both by Land and Sea.

33. The greatest number of Men it contained that ever were seen lifted under the Banners of one Man; but yet great is the variety found in Writers about the true number. Herodotus writeth of 1700000 Foot, and 80000 Horse, besides Camels, and Chariots; Diodorus Siculus not half so many Foot, viz. 800000. and yet what he assigns to the Foot, Ctesias attributeth to the whole Army, which he writeth to have consisted of 80 Myriads, besides Chariots. Fulsius from Trogus, and Orosius out of him, reckons 700000 men out of his own Dominions, and 30000 Auxiliaries. Ælian writeth of 700000 in all, Cornelius Nepos of 700000 Foot, and 400000 (perhaps rather 40000) Horse. Pliny 780000 (for the name of Darius, Xerxes being to be read) and Isocrates agreeth with Ælian, mentioning only 700000 in all. As for the Navy there were found 1207 beaked Ships, and other Vessels for carrying of Horses, and for other uses 3000. according to Herodotus, from whom Diodorus little dissenteth as to the number of the Gallies, writing, there were found above 1200 of them, to which he addeth 850 Horse-boats, and other Vessels of burthen of 30 Oars apiece 3000. with the former agreeth Ctesias (though often dissenting) and Cicero: with the later Isocrates and Lysias. Orosius mentions 1200 beaked Gallies, and 3000 Vessels of burthen; and as for that place in Fulsius, which encreaseth the number of the Fleet to 10000. there is no doubt of its corruption. Herodotus by giving 200 men to every Gally, and furnishing all the other Vessels, conjectures 517610 men to have been bestowed in the whole Fleet, so that at this muster the Land and Sea-forces being added together, with the 20000 Arabians that drove Camels, and the Libyans the Chariots, at this rate would amount to 2317610. besides Slaves and others that followed the Camp.

34. Notwithstanding all this number, he commanded all the Nations in his passage, from Dorisus towards Greece, to march along with him, so that hereby came an accession of 120 Ships to his Fleet, to which giving 200 men a piece, the number will amount to 2400. and to his Land Army another of 30 Myriads, or 300000 men, as Herodotus gathereth (though Diodorus thinketh less something then 20 Myriads) and so the whole number of his Asian and European Souldiers would on this account amount to 2641610. and yet he thinketh the number of Slaves and attendants to have rather exceeded this, so that if it only be doubled, the number of those persons that by land came to Thermopyle, and by Sea to Sepias, amounted to five millions two hundred eighty three thousand two hundred and twenty. As for the number of women that baked meat, and of Concubines and Eunuchs which followed, no man can assign them, of carriage beasts, and for the Waggon; and of Indian Doggs no man could count; so that no wonder it is that to this stupendous multitude some sorts of Rivers failed to afford drink, or that Plutarch and Isocrates should write five millions to have followed Xerxes into Greece; the wonder is, that no greater Plague raged amongst them, that any concord could be preserved amongst so many Nations, and that provisions could be procured for the preservation of the lives of so many Creatures.

The preparation of the Gre-cians for defence.

35. The Grecians all this while having had intelligence; first of his design all along from Demaratus the Spartan Exile, and then of his motions, were according to their several interests variously affected. Some, as the Thebans, and the rest of the Boeotians (except the Thessians, and them of Plataea) and many Thessalians (persuaded by the Alenades) and several others, out of fear, had under-hand sent Earth and Water, as Symboles of subjection: Many also were uncertain in their resolutions, not knowing what to do. The rest meeting at the Isthmus, and consulting for the publick safety, resolved, and swore to join together in War against the Persians, and with united power to defend the liberty of Greece; at the present to wave all their private differences for that purpose, and to remit the monies owing to each other; to devote the tenth to Apollo, i. e. to do to death the tenth man of all those that had already given up themselves to the Enemy. The War which had often been patched up, and still broke out again, betwixt the Athenians and them of Ægina, was composed. By occasion of this War the Athenians of late had strengthened themselves exceedingly at Sea, through the procurement of Themistocles the Son of Neocles, a very wise man, who had brought the people to lay out the money, which issued out of the golden Mines of Lamio, and was to be divided amongst the multitude man by man, upon shipping, whereby the Fleet was encreased to almost two hundred sayl, and Greece came to be preserved. About the same time it hapned that the Athenians asking Counsel at Delphos, the Oracle answered, that wooden Walls alone would be security to them; which several interpreting several ways, he expounded Ships to be meant by it, and pressed hard that a Sea Victory was promised them at the Island Salamine, which being received by the greater part, they set themselves with all their might to the strengthening of their Navy.

36. But those of the League finding it convenient to call in the help of their Friends, and Allies, sent into Sicily, Coryra and Crete, to desire aid and assistance of the Greek Colonies against the publick Enemy; and to Agora to excite them to join against him with the rest of their Neighbours. But all was to no purpose; for Gelon, who then had all Sicily in his power, and was thought to have more Ships then all the associates put together, refused to give any aid except he might be declared Captain-General of the whole Army; the Coryreans promised great matters, confessing their safety to be involved in that of Greece; but resolving to make use of the success of their party, when danger threatened Greece from Xerxes, they sent sixty Ships, under shew of supply, but commanded the Fleet to hover about Laconia, and apply it self to Xerxes, if Conquerour, as coming in to his assistance; which being observed, after the Fight the Officers excused themselves for being absent at the Batel of Salamine, because the Etesian Winds blowing contrary, they could not double the Cape of Malea. The Cretans very powerful at Sea put off the matter under pretence of hearing an answer from the Oracle at Delphos, whither they said they had sent: and the Argives out of hatred to the Lacedæmonians, proposed such conditions as could not be admitted, and pressed them fore with the rest of the associates.

37. The Athenians then and Lacedæmonians being most engaged (against whom the design of the Persian was most bent) applied themselves with all their might to make resistance. Xerxes being about to pass over into Europe, the Thessalians sent to them, demanding help to secure themselves, as else being unable to stand out. The Council General at that time being assembled in the Isthmus, thinking it wisdom to withstand him at the first entry into Greece, rather than to defend it in broken parts, sent presently away by Sea ten thousand men into Thessalia, under conduct of Evenetus a Spartan, and Themistocles the Athenian, who in conjunction with the Thessalian Horse, at the River Peneus, flowing betwixt the Straights of Ofsa and Olympus, might hinder the passage of the Persians; but after they came there, it being shewed to them to be but a vain thing there to oppose themselves against so great a multitude, (especially seeing there were other passages into Thessalia), by Alexander King of Macedonia; they

SECT. 2.

Se<sup>ct</sup>. 2. they returned back again to the Isthmus, and the Thessalians thus forsaken, gave themselves up to the Persians. Afterwards the Council again deliberating what should be done, resolved to seize upon the Straights of Thermopylae, being the only passage out of Thessaly into Greece, and better to be maintained by far than the other, and concluded on sending six thousand Foot thither under command of Leonidas the valiant King of Sparta. Sea-matters were committed to the care of the Athenians and Eginatians especially, and it was resolved, that the Fleet should fall to the Artemisium Shore, towards the North part of the Island Eubœa, and not far from the Straights. Xerxes drawing near, this was done accordingly, both as to Land and Sea Forces; but the Navy receiving an Alarm, through a mischance of three of it's Ships, retreated into the Straights betwixt Eubœa and Boœtia, where Eurypis floweth betwixt Chalcis and Aulis; but understanding of a great Wrack suffered by the Persian Fleet, wherein by tempestuous weather were lost four hundred Vessels, with a great multitude of Men; and much treasure, it returned back after a few days; in the mean while Xerxes drew down with his innumerable multitudes to the Straights.

38. He sent before a Spie to look how Leonidas and his men behaved themselves, who bringing him word how he found the Spartans, who then kept watch, exercising themselves in gymnicks Games, and dressing their Heads as on some Festival, he demanded of Demaratus their Country-man the reason thereof. He told him they were fully resolved to die for their Country, and ready to fight it out to the last man, if need required; whereas he desired him as before when he spake of the valour of his Country-men, thinking they would be so skared at his multitudes, as not to dare to come to hand-strokes. But finding no such matter, but Demaratus his words to be true, on the fifth day after, he commanded a party of Medes to fall upon them; who being with great slaughter repulsed, he sent his Band of Persians, which being invincible as was thought, he named were Immortal, and they, though wanting no courage under the eyes of the King, who from an high Throne beheld the Fight, came off with the same success; whereas he was astonished, and grew melancholly, as being now solicitous for his whole Army. The next day the Fight was renewed, but with the same Issue, great slaughter being made of the Persians, so that the way being more narrow by the Carcasses, there was no room for a multitude to Fight, which being driven one upon another, the confusion and consequently the Slaughter was the greater. At this, Xerxes was struck with great consternation, not knowing what to do.

39. There was one in the Army, a Trachinian, named Epiates, or Ephialtes (as Pausanias writeth it) who understanding his trouble went to him, and offered to shew a way over the Mountains, by which, though with much difficulty, he might send a Party to come about, and fall on the backs of the Grecians. Being cheered with this, he sent as many as shewed themselves most forward, with him, under the command of Hydarnes, who passing over the River Alogus, got in the dark of the night up into the Mountain, where beating down the Guard of Phocians which there watched, they began to come into the more plain and easy way, when the thing was carried by some fugitives to the Grecians. They were stricken with great terror at the report, all but Leonidas with his Spartans, Julia, who for that the Lacedemonians were told by an Oracle, that they must either lose their City or one of their Kings, was very ready to abide to the utmost. Wherefore he willingly gave way to his associates to depart, bidding them reserve themselves for the better condition of their Country, who all presently falling off, except the Thespians, and such Thebans as the rest of the Grecians had forced thither, not so much to help them, as to keep them as Hostages; with them and his three hundred Spartans he prepared himself to fight, with a mind devoted already to death. When the Sun was up, and the Persians not yet got down, those resolute Grecians passing the Straights to redeem their lives at dearer rates, fell in upon the multitudes of their Enemies, with which being compassed about, they were all cut off, with Leonidas, except such as retiring back into the Straights took an hill, and fighting valiantly with those Persians whom Epiates had led down upon them, sold their lives as their fellows very dear; twenty thousand of Xerxes his Army with this handful of men being slain. The Thebans alone lifted up their Targets begging quarter, crying out they were brought thither against their wills, and that they were Xerxes his Subjects; yet were they slain, or being taken were stigmatized for disgrace. The body of Leonidas being found was nailed to a Cross. These things hapned at Thermopylae in the middle middle of Summer, while some of the Grecians in Poloponnesus were Celebrating the Games of the seventy fifth Olympiad, in the beginning of its first year, where Callias was Archon at Athens, as we are told from Diodorus Siculus, of whose History digested according to the years of their Solemnities, that part now extant beginneth with this Expedition; at which time also Philosophy was translated out of Ionis to Athens by Anaxagoras the Clazomenian, Scholar to Anaximenes the Milelian, who now being twenty years old began to profess it in that City, way being made for Learning there, by the Library collected through the Industry of Pisistratus.

40. Xerxes having now had experience of what Demaratus had said to him, asked his advice for carrying on the War; being in great doubt what to do, after he had heard how they of Sparta were able to Arm well nigh eight thousand men of such temper as the former, and that the other Lacedemonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant. Demaratus being of this opinion, that all the Land forces would assemble together at the Isthmus, to defend that entry into Poloponnesus, advised him to send three hundred Ships well mann'd to spoil the Country of Laconia, thereby to keep the Lacedemonians and their Neighbours entangled at home; while having subdued the rest, he might afterwards fall upon them, who would be then too weak of themselves to sustain his power: He farther also advised, that three hundred Vessels should seize upon Cythera the Island, which lying near the Coasts of Laconia, might serve as a place of Retreat or Rendezvous for their own security, and indamaging of the Enemy; Chilon the Lacedemonian having been wont to say, that it were better for them to have it drowned in the Sea, than to stand so as it did for their disadvantage. But Ahemenes the Brother of Xerxes stiffly impugned this advice, lest by the severing of the Fleet after such loss by the Tempest, they might prove too weak for the Grecians at Sea; and to this out of fear the King submitted, hoping his Land Army and Fleet should stand each the other in good stead, both holding one course and not lying far asunder.

Herodotus l. 8.

41. The Fleet of the Grecians stood all this while at Artemisium; as a Bulwark to Eubœa, Commanded by Eurypides the Lacedemonian, to whom the Athenians for quietness and safety gave place. But now the Poloponnesians having every one an eye upon his own Country, longed to go farther into Greece, and were only stayed by the cunning of Themistocles, till such time as the Eubœans could secure their Wives and Children, with the principal of their Goods. In the mean time, the Persians thinking to encompass them, sent two hundred Sail to come behind about the Island, they lying in the Straits betwixt it and the Main. They had knowledge of this device, and notwithstanding of the loss sustained by the Persian Fleet in the last Tempest, set sail at midnight and met these two hundred Ships with a counter-surprise, took and sunk thirty of them, and forced the rest to take the Sea, where by foul weather they were driven upon the Rocks, and all cast away. The news of this was brought to the Grecians by fifty three Athenian Ships, sent in to increase the Fleet, which doubled the joy thereof; so that elevated with new hopes, they set next day upon some Cilician Ships which were severed from the rest of the Fleet, and, damming them much, returned to Artemisium.

42. The Persians taking this in great indignation, and fearing the anger of Xerxes, resolved to redeem their credit with some notable exploit, and for that purpose the next day in the form of a Crescent invaded the Grecians. They cheerfully gave them battle, and the Fight endured from Noon till Night, ending with equal loss to both parties: For though more of the Persian Vessels were lost, yet the lesser damage fell as heavy upon the other, which being smaller could less bear it, though they fought most manfully for their Liberty and Country; the Athenians deserving best amongst them and amongst the Athenians, Clinias the Father of Alcibiades, a famous man in the next Age. Amongst the Persians the Egyptians fought most bravely, and these things happened at Sea those same three days in which the Land Action was at Thermopylae, in both the Straits the Greeks endeavouring to hinder the Enemies access into their Country. But shortly after that they had intelligence by one sent out on purpose, what was become of Leonidas and those with him, they would needs depart from Artemisium, and draw their Navy, much battered in the former Fights, more inwards and nearer home. Themistocles seeing this resolution, before they weighed Anchor, persuaded them to kill up the Cattel of the Eubœans, and bring the meat on Shipboard, rather than to leave them a Prey to the Enemy, and engraved upon stones upon the Shore, and at the watering places where he knew the Ionians would come, an Exhortation to Revolt to the Greeks; and side with their Mother Country, or else stand neutral in the Fight, or Fight coldly. This he

43. From Artemisium they failed to the Coast of Attica, and at the desire of the Athenians took up their harbour at the Island Salamine: The Persian Fleet removed to Artemisium and the Coast adjoining to Elfeatis. Xerxes now having passed the Streights of Thermopylae, marched through the Country of Doris into Phocis, which being forsaken of its Inhabitants he waited, and when he came to Panopea a Town thereof, he divided his Army into two parts. With the one he invaded Greece, and the other he sent to rife and burn the famous Temple of Delphos; but as it's said, this party was almost wholly destroyed without humane help, by Thunder and Lightning, and two Rocks, which breaking off from the Mountain Parnassus, overwhelmed it: Those that escaped were generally killed by the Phocians, who having fled into the Mountain for fear of Xerxes, fell upon them, so that few remained and escaped to their Friends in Boeotia. Xerxes now marched through Boeotia, the Country of his Allies, into Attica, with intention to do his utmost against the City of Athens itself.

A Party sent by Xerxes to destroy the Temple of Delphos, consumed with Thunder and Lightning.

The Athenians remove.

44. In the mean time, the Grecian Fleet lying at Salamine, though strengthened with a new accession of Ships at the Coast of Trazene, could hardly be contained there; for every one being solicitous for his own Countrey, and despairing of Attica and the rest of Greece without the Assistance, was busy in fortifying this neck of Land, and labour'd thither to bring the Navy, whence there might be safe retreat into Peloponnesus if need were. This the Athenians understanding, were fore troubled, as having justly expected that the Peloponnesians would joyn with them, and the rest of the Associates in defending Attica, as they had fought for them at Artemisium; but making the best use of it they could, they begged of them so long to stay there till they could provide some way for themselves. Having obtained this, they published an Edict by the procurement of Themistocles (who improved the Oracle formerly mentioned to this purpose, and invented other devices) that all fit by Age should come aboard, and transport their Wives and Children out of the City with their Slaves, and what they could; which was done, most carrying them to Trazene, where they were kindly entertained; and that Aristides, a man famous for wisdom, justice, and integrity, but lately banished for a time by the Ostracism, by the potent faction of Themistocles, might return home; by the same procurement another Order was made to recall all whoeever were banished, that they might now in time of need serve their Countrey; and out of fear, left they should joyn themselves to the Enemy.

Plutarch at JE.

45. In the Fleet now at Salamine were three hundred fifty eight armed Ships, besides other Vessels of less importance, of which an hundred and eighty were provided and furnished by the Athenians; sixteen only by the Lacedaemonians; the Corinthians sent forty; the Inhabitants of Argina thirty, which were notable for swiftness; the Megarians twenty; they of Chalcis furnished as many, having the Vessels of the Athenians; the rest were supplied in lesser numbers by the Chians, Nazcians, Melians, and Scirrhians Islanders. Whilst the Officers were in Council about the place of Battel, News came that the Enemy was entered Attica, waiting all with Fire and Sword; for having in Boeotia burned the Towns of the Thebians and Plataeans, who had forsaken their Habitations, he hastened into Attica, where consuming all things he entered Athens, three months after he had passed over his Forces into Europe. The Castle, some few who would not leave their ancient Seat held out to the last, and were all put to the Sword; having refused quarter upon a vain confidence of the Oracle, that the City should be defended with wooden Walls, and thinking they fulfilled the same by fortifying themselves with Boats and Palliades: the Temple of Minerva in the Castle he burn'd to ashes. The Message being brought, the Captains departed every man to his Ship, decreeing nothing, and all the rest of the Peloponnesians determined to fall to the Assistance.

46. This resolution might have proved fatal to all Greece, had it not been prevented by the wisdom of Themistocles, who being flattered up by Mnesiphilus of Athens, followed Eurymachus the Admiral into his Ship, and obtained of him again to assemble the Council. Here he overcame him by his mildness, who lifting up his Rod in an heat to strike him, he had him strike so he would not hear. When he came to speak of staying at Salamine, one Alcibiades upbraided him with the loss of his Country, saying, It was not fit that such an one should give Council to them, that had their remaining to them: To whom he boldly replied, that though they, the Athenians, had lost their Houses and Walls, dead things, and not to be valued with their liberty; yet they had a City left them, than which there was none greater in Greece, viz. two hundred Ships which as yet was present, and ready to help their Associates: But if they would depart and betray them, he would have them know they should presently hear, that the Athenians had both a free City and Territories as good as that they had left, meaning Siris, a Town in Italy, in their power. Eurymachus hearing this, and fearing to be deprived of the Athenian Fleet, so necessary for their support, inclined to his opinion, inasmuch that the Grecians resolved to stay and prepared themselves for the Fight; but the Persian Fleet drawing down to Phalerus the Athenian Port, and the Land Army to the Sea side, the Peloponnesians were so affrighted thereat, that having all their minds upon the Assistance, the advice of Themistocles was not at all regarded, and they resolved to weigh Anchor and to be gone that night, and notice hereof was given to the Mariners.

47. For now Xerxes his Fleet was drawn down to be repaired, and increased by a new accession of Ships, that it was altogether as considerable as before the Shipwreck at Sepias, and taking all Nations as he passed along with them, his Land Army contained as great a number as heretofore at Thermopylae. The King came down from Athens to Phalerus the Port, and called a Council to deliberate what should be done. All the Captains were for a Sea Fight, the Kings of Tyre and Sidon being first asked their opinions by Maradonius; only a woman, Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, a wife and valiant Person, who had followed Xerxes in this expedition with five Ships, with grave and important Arguments dissuaded a Sea Fight, and advised him to enter Peloponnesus with his Land Army, for thereby he would presently dissolve the Greekish Fleet, and finish the War. Though this advice followed would have been enough, and Xerxes could not but commend it, yet the major and worse part carried it, and it was resolved to fight the Grecians out of hand at Salamine. The Anchors then were weighed, and the Fleet made thitherwards; but Night coming on, suffered them not that day to reach the Island.

48. At this time were the Peloponnesians ready to depart homewards, and thereby the Estate of Greece to be ruined, by their breaking their united Power, and reducing themselves into their particular and inconsiderable Conditions, had not Themistocles, born for the preservation of his Countrey, relieved it by his wisdom in its great necessity. There was one Sicinus a Persian, who, taken Prisoner, was a great lover of Themistocles, and taught his Children: Him he sent privately to the King, to tell him that he, preferring his good before that of the Grecians, gave him now first to understand that they were about to flee, and advised him not to suffer it, but prevent them and let upon them whilst they were disordered, and the Fleet was severed from their Land Army. Xerxes gladly hearing the message, as believing it to proceed out of Themistocles his affection to him, communicated it to his Officers, and while the rest could be furnished with Soldiers, sent two hundred Ships about the Island to block up the Streights, so that none of the Enemies might escape. Themistocles communicated what he had done to Aristides, who approving of it, went to persuade the Greeks to Fight; when presently, while their minds hung in suspense, came a Ship of Tenedos from the Persian Fleet, and acquainted them with what was done in the Streights; so that Necessity completed what was but half effected by the speech of Aristides.

Plutarch at JE.

49. Then prepared they themselves unanimously to the Battel. Themistocles made a speech unto them, wherein he shewed where their concerns lay, exhorting them to Fight manfully for their Country and Liberty, for their Parents, Wives, Children, and whatsoever was dear to them; with which, being provoked, they applied themselves to their Ships, and put forth the Fleet into the Main. Xerxes placed himself on an high Throne to behold the Fight over against Salamine, and had some with him to write down the particulars thereof. A bloody Fight indeed was fought with great earnestness on both sides, the one fighting under the eyes of their King, who marked every passage and accordingly was affected, and the other for as much as could be dear to them in so dangerous a condition. Herein the Greeks had the advantage, that they were more exercised in Sea matters, and having all they had lying at the stake, they did it with the more earnestness, and in that they fought with greater order: The Persians, with so great a multitude of Ships, fought in disorder and hindred one another, and if the Vessels flew, were all lost; whereas their enemies, by their skill in swimming, saved themselves. At length the Ionians, solicited as was said, by little and little withdrawing themselves from the Fight, the rest what by that discouraged, and overcome by the pertinacious valour of their enemies began to flee, the Athenians pressing hard upon them, and destroying many of their Ships: Of such as fled towards Phalerus, many were intercepted by the Argonauts, the Emulators of the other in deservings well of Greece; such

SECT. 2. such as escaped them, and got to the Port, thence withdrew themselves to the Land Army.

50. Of all the Gracians, the Athenians and Eginetans deserved best, and amongst them Themistocles, the Captains of the Fleet each one, when upon their Oaths they pronounced who merited most, naming him after themselves. Amongst the Perfians the valour of Artemisa the Queen was most conspicuous, acknowledged by Xerxes himself, who thereupon said, that his men were turned women, and women became men: She was saved as it happened, and escaped to Phalerus. Many noble Perfians fell, amongst the rest Arishignus the Kings Brother; but few of the Gracians. Xerxes exceedingly discouraged with this great loss, considered of his safe retreat out of Europe, fearing the Ionians might break the Bridge laid over the Hellepont; yet that he might colour any such intention, he began a new project by casting earth into the Streights, to join the Island Salamine with the Continent. But Mardonius knowing his temper, and bethinking himself in what case he himself might stand for being the first adviser to the War, went to him, and exhorting the loss, the Land Army being left intire, at length proposed to him to leave him three hundred thousand men, with which he would engage to revenge him upon Greece, and reduce it all under his power if he pleased to depart himself into Asia, being nothing tainted in honour for that things had not so well succeeded in this Encounter, because the miscarriage was procured by the Cowardice of the Egyptians, Phoenicians, Cilicians, and others no better than Slaves; the Perfians having gallantly enough behaved themselves; and he, their Prince, having subdued already the greater part of Greece, and taken Athens itself, against which the War was principally intended.

51. He liked very well the motion, but still dissembled the matter, answering that he would refer it to his Council, which he accordingly called, and asked the advice particularly of Artemisa. She approved of Mardonius his Opinion, for that if he should subdue Greece it would be to the King's advantage, and if he miscarried it would be no disgrace to him, who in his own person had accomplished the main design of the expedition, in taking and wasting Athens. He was pleased therewith, sent her before hand away with his Sons he had brought with him, and gave liberty to Mardonius to make choice of what, and how many forces he pleased; all this being done the same day with the Fight at Salamis. The Night following, in great fear and disorder, the Fleet loosed from Phalerus, and fled again towards the Hellepont, which the Gracians seeing pursued them as far as Andros one of the Cyclades, and took in there, for that they could then no more discern them, and that Island had been of the Perfian Faction. Here it being debated in the Council of Officers whether the Enemy should be any further pursued, Eurybiades the General, for several grave and urgent reasons dissuaded it, a Bridge being rather to be laid for him; inasmuch that he convinced the rest; and Themistocles, who as Herodotus saith, was formerly for the pursuit or else dissembled, for reasons which followed, changed his opinion, and refrained the Athenians.

52. And further foreseeing that through their inconstancy and known ingratitude, he might have cause in time to come to use Friends; that now he might make one of Xerxes, and therein also further provide for the good of his Country, he betook himself to his wonted craft and policy. He dispatched away to him his former Trusty Messenger, to acquaint him how careful he was for his safety, in dissuading the Gracians from pursuing him, and to advise him by all means to make towards the Hellepont, ere the Bridge should be broken down, which he thought would be within a small time. He being much affrighted hereat retreated presently with all his Forces the same way he came into Thessaly, where delivering to Mardonius three hundred thousand men picked out of the whole Army, and settling other matters, with a small and obscure Train fittest for haft (all the rest being commanded to follow) he hastened through Macedonia and Thrace to the Hellepont, where he arrived after forty five days. Here, whether he found the Bridge whole and so passed over it, or (what the Gracians have believed) broken in pieces by Tempests, and so passed over obscurely in a Fishers Boat, observable is the great change upon him, who with so great pride had formerly bearen the Sea, and cast Fetters into it. His Army following was a great part consumed by the Plague, Famine, and other casualties, so that the Fowls of the Air continually followed it, the way being full of Carcasses. And being shipped over to Alydes, very many died by intemperate use of dyer, and drinking too much in the dysentery, wherewith they were sorely grieved. Those that remained, by slow Journeys reached their King, lying at Sardinia.

to the Hellepont, with a partie of sixty thousand men taken out of Mardonius his Army, who finding at his return the inhabitants of Potida in Macedonia to have revolted, fearing the Palleanians round about would do the same, and suspecting also Olynthus, which then was inhabited by the Borrianians, he besieged both Towns, of which the latter he took, and killing the Towns-men gave it to one Crioborus of Chalcis to govern, after which, they of that place inhabited it. He then more strongly besieged Potida, but after three months having layn before it to no purpose, many of his men being lost in the Sea, which broke in with an unusual Tide, he rose up and departed to Mardonius, who, for that Winter was at hand, had taken up his quarters in Thessaly, and the adjoining places of Macedonia. The Perfian Fleet being returned to the Coast of Asia, wintered at Came, for the greatest part, onely some Ships at Samos, whither in the Spring they all failed, being increased to the number of three hundred by the addition of the Ionians, on whose Coast now they lay to keep them in obedience, being little desirous of failing any more Westward, for the experience they had lately had of the Gracians at Salamina; and yet being in as little fear of their coming to them, whom they expected to be kept in awe, so as not to stir far from home; because of Mardonius.

54. They stirred not indeed about providing any Land-forces wherewith to oppose Mardonius; but very busie they went at Aegina in rigging their Fleet; over which Leutychides King of Sparta (issued from Procles, and put into the place of Demeratus,) was made Admiral: Xanthippus Father to Pericles being General of the Athenian Fleet, which contained the most Ships. While they abode here, came six men from Chios, who having conspired against Strabes their Tyrant, upon discovery of the Plot, fled, beseeching them that they would undertake the freeing of Jonis; and so far they prevailed, as to get them to sail to Delus; but no further would they go, because unacquainted as yet with the affairs of Asia, they feared the Perfians; so that both parties stood in awe of each other.

55. Mardonius thinking of his promise made to his Master, consulted the Oracles; but they refusing to answer, he sent Alexander King of Macedonia, now in great grace with the Perfians, through the marriage of his Sister to Babares, in ambassage to the Athenians, to take them off from the society with the rest of Greece. He knew they gave the most mortal blows in the Battle at Salamina, and thought, that if they could be taken off, the rest would be conquered with little or no difficulty. The fame of this Ambassage flying abroad, came to Sparta, which nestled the Lacedemonians, and made them with all speed to dispatch away Ambassadors of their own, to prevent the alliance so dangerous to all Greece, and the Athenians refused to give audience to Alexander, till they were arrived, that they might also be present thereat. Alexander told them that Xerxes had given order to Mardonius to signify to them how willing he was to remit what was past; to restore them their Territories, and more than them if they would; to leave them to their own freedom, and repaire their Temples at his own charges, if they would enter into a League of amity with him; otherwise they could not be ignorant how great inconveniences they drew upon themselves from so potent a Prince, able to send other Armies if they now with Mardonius should be overthrown: to these things spoken as from Mardonius, the Ambassador added as a friend, that they should not let slip such an opportunity. After him the Ambassadors of Sparta spoke, and shewed how unworthy a thing it would be for the Athenians of all others, to forsake the publick cause, they having been the Authors of the War, and their Ancestors so renowned for setting others at liberty; wherefore they hoped that they would not be accessory to the slavery of all Greece. Their answer was to Alexander, that so long as the Sun should hold his course, they would never enter into alliance with Xerxes, but resist his Forces with their own; and him they desired, whom they respected as a Friend, not any more to bring such an unwelcome message, lest he might suffer something from the angry people. To the Spartans they answered to this purpose, that they would never any of them as long as they lived enter into confederacy with the Perfian: they thanked them for their kind offer to maintain their Wives and Children in case of necessity, which they hoped they should not have much cause to need, so as to be troublesome to them; and desired them to hasten away to them their supplies, for that they believed the Barbarian would not lose time after the report of their answer, but presently invade them; and they thought it most convenient to meet him in Beotia.

56. Mardonius having received this answer from Athens, in great wrath march-

Sect. 2. ed thitherwards out of Theſſalie. When he came to Thebes, the Inhabitants advised him to go no farther, for that he should never subdue Greece united together, but stay there in a commodious place, and corrupt with money those that were most prevalent in each City, whereby he might divide the Græcians into factions, and so easily mastering the dissenters, subdue the whole Country. But he not hearkening to this advice, proceeded, hoping by Fires made in the Islands, to give notice to Xerxes still lying at Sardis, that he was again got into Athens, which the Inhabitants upon his approach, and the Peloponnesians deferring to fend their succors, again quitted and departed to Salamine. He entered Athens, the tenth Month being now completed after Xerxes had the possession of that City, and having it done, sent to Salamine to the owners of it, once more offering them the same conditions he had formerly propoſed by Alexander of Macedonia, hoping, that upon this extremity to which they were once again reduced, they might change their stubbornness for a more complying disposition.

57. But they were so far from hearkening to what he offered, that they sined one Lyridas a Senator, for saying it deserved to be taken into consideration, and to be propoſed to the whole body of the People, and his Wife and Children were used in the same manner by the women. Then sent they (together with the Megarians and Plataeans) seriously to expostulate with the Lacedæmonians for the non-performance of their promise, whereby their Country was again exposed to the will and pleasure of the Enemy, and plainly to tell them, that except their associates would better stand to their word, and dispatch away their succors in time, they must needs provide for themselves apart, for as much as yet a way was open for their entry into confederacy with the common Enemy. The Ambassadors found them celebrating annual Games, and understood that the Peloponnesians were only intent upon their perfecting the Wall at the Isthmus, having no regard at all to them, whereof they highly complained to the Ephori. They promised them an answer the next day, but deferred from day to day, until after ten days the wall of the Isthmus was perfected.

58. After this time came a man of Tegæa to them, and blaming them for their neglect of their allies, convinced them of the vanity of the Wall, in case the Athenians should join with Mardonius, for they could with ease convey him otherwise than by the Isthmus into Peloponnesus, wherewith being startled, in the dead time of the Night, and without privacy of the Ambassadors, they sent out five thousand men besides seven thousand of the Heilots or publick Slaves, under the conduct of Cleombrotus Tutor to Plistarchus the young King. In the morning the Ambassadors came again to them expostulating as before, whereto the Ephori answered, that their Succors were already on their way, whom then the other understanding the matter, followed, and with them other five thousand gathered out of the places bordering upon Sparta. Mardonius having intelligence how things went in Peloponnesus from the Argives, who all this while, were of his party, was something abashed, having till now had some hopes of the Athenians their compliance, for which reason he had spared their Territories. But now he destroyed all he could both in City and Country, and forſaking Africa as a Region dangerous to his Army, by reason of the unevenness of the Ground, and hard to be quitted suddenly in time of danger, he returned into Boeotia a Champain Country, and in alliance with him, where in the Territories of the Thebans he pitched his Tents at the River Asopus, bringing much damage to his friends round about, in taking up such things as were but necessary to the sustenance of his Army. The Spartans in the mean time lying at the Isthmus, the other Peloponnesians after their example came also thither, whence they marched to Eleusine. Thither came the Athenians from Salamine, and joyined with them, whence they followed Mardonius into Boeotia, and fate down over against his Camp at the foot of the Mountain Cithæron.

59. The Greeks brought into the Field eleven Myriads or eleven hundred thousand, according to Herodotus, from which number (a) others take the odd thousands, and make them just one hundred thousand. The number of the Persian Army amounted to thirty Myriads or three hundred thousand, besides the Greek Auxiliaries, which he conjectureth to have been about five Myriads more; the three hundred thousand are owned by Plutarch, another (b) numbereth but two hundred thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse; but Diodorus on the contrary saith, that besides these Forces drawn out of Xerxes his Army, Mardonius had out of Macedonia and Thrace, and the associate States, about twenty Myriads, riads, and that his whole Army contained fifty Myriads or five hundred thousand Men. Mardonius when the Græcians were encamped, sent a party of Horse to assail them, which objecting cowardice to them, and provoking them, very light skirmishes ensued, wherewith the Megarians were first put to it, being on disadvantageous Ground, but being relieved by three hundred stout Athenians, all others refusing, a sharp encounter followed, in which Melissus, who commanded the Party of the Persians, was slain. A great contest followed about the Body, the Persians labouring with all their might to redeem it, all the Persian Horse coming into the Quarrel, and then the whole Army of the Græcians; but at length they were fain to return without it, and it was carried in triumph about the Greekish Camp. This as it brought great Sorrow to the Persians, so the other were much elevated in their Minds thereby, and removed their Camp into the Territories of Plataea, whither Mardonius also followed them, and encamped over against them, both parties neglecting to fight (only excepting such Skirmishes as was made by the Persian Horse) for ten days.

60. On the eleventh, it being palpable that the Greekish Army daily wasted by the revolt of many of their Countrymen, and yet that the Persian groaned under its own Burthen, Mardonius called a Council of his Officers to consult what was to be done. Artabazus the Son of Pharnaces, a man of great Nobility, and an emulator of the General, contended with him, urging that the best was to decline the Fight, and march to Thebes, where they might have plenty of Provision, here wanting, and whence by sending Money into the principal Cities of Greece (according to the advice formerly given by the Thebans) they might dispatch the War with Ease. But Mardonius being more hot and earnest, thinking his Army to be for the present stronger than the Enemy, resolved to fight, not suffering himself by any persuasions to be removed from his Purpose, and because of his Authority the rest daring not contradict it, it was resolved to fall on the next morning by break of the day. Notice hereof was given by Alexander the Macedonian to the Athenians, who advised them in case Mardonius should not fight, to stay it out; for the Persians were straitened for Provisions. The Athenians bring this News to Pausanias the General, who being something struck therewith, he desired them to change places, because they were better acquainted with the Persian manner of fighting since the Battle at Marathon, and the Spartans were more used to the Thessalians and Boeotians now opposed to the Athenians; they soon condescended hereunto, but Mardonius having notice of it, made his Persians change place with the Boeotians and the other; and though Pausanias again reduced his men into the former place, yet was neither this hid from Mardonius, who still to prevent him did the like.

61. Mardonius upon this sent and upbraided Pausanias and his Spartans with cowardize, especially seeing he had made a challenge to fight with them, with his Persians, either a certain number of each, or all together, both which were refused. Then sent he his Horse upon them, which with Darts fore troubled the whole Army, and most of all in that it hindered the fetching of Water, that the Græcians were constrained to change the place, and resolved to pass into an Island compassed about with the River, and near the Walls of the City, which was very convenient for watering, and lay also well for Provisions. By night they removed, but most missing of the place went to the Temple of Funo in the Highway to Plataea, and there encamped themselves, whom the Spartans being commanded to follow, much trouble arose thereupon by the means of one Amphiaraus a valiant man, who for some time would not stir with his Regiment; crying out, it was contrary to the Læonick Discipline to fly from the Enemy, and supposing Pausanias and the rest durst not forsake him. But towards morning he came off from his resolution, and so all marched to the Temple of Ceres, situate upon the River Moloe, being followed close by the Persian Horse.

62. The Sun being risen, Mardonius grievously inveighing against the cowardice of the Græcians, and Artabazus for his late opinion, marched with his whole Army, as to pursue the Enemy flying, and all his Horse began fore to press upon the Backs of the Spartans and Tegæatans, joyined with them at the Chappel of Ceres, so that then ensued a sharp Fight betwixt them, and betwixt the Athenians who came into their Succour, and such Greeks as were confederate with the Persians. The Tegæatans charged the Persian Infantry, in which after much toyl and Bloodshed, Mardonius fighting on a white Horse in the midst of one thousand choice men, was slain by Armenus the most valiant Spartan. After his death, his men discouraged, were slaughtered in great numbers, and put to the rout, Señt. 2. which Artabazus seeing, fluffed for himself with a party of forty thousand commanded by him, and fled towards the Helleſpont: the Greeks that aſſiſted Mardonius, though nothing inferior to their Countrey-men for valour, were put to flight; and three hundred of Thebans, who moſt ſtoutly behaved themſelves, were ſlain upon the place.

63. In the mean time the Corinthians, Megarians, Phliasians, and the reſt, who had taken up their ſtation at the Chapel of Funo, hearing of the Victory of their Friends, haſted to the place all out of order, the Corinthians over Hill and Dale the neareſt way; but the reſt through the plains, who were circumvented by the Theban Horſe, and many of them cut off. The Persians fled into their Camp, which they had fenced with a Rampire for ſecurity, whither they were followed by the Spartans, who laboured with all their might to ſtorm the place, but were ſtoutly repulſed by the Defendants, till the Athenians coming in, and better exerciſed in ſuch attempts, brake into the Camp. The Tegetans followed with great violence, and took, and plundered the Pavilion of Mardonius with his braſen Manger, and then followed an unſpeakable ſlaughter of the Persians, ſo that of thoſe three hundred thoſand left to Mardonius by Xerxes, excepting thoſe forty thoſand, which fled with Artabazus, not three thoſand remained, one hundred thoſand according to Diodorus, without mercy being put to death within the Rampire. Of the Grecians not many were ſlain, according to Herodotus, who reckoneth thirty one Spartans, ſixteen Tegetans, and fifty two Athenians, mentioned at large by him; but Plutarch mentioneth one thoſand three hundred and fixty of the Greekiſh Army to have been ſlain, and Diodorus increaſeth the number to above ten thoſand. The Mantineans and Eleans came after the Victory, at which they were ſo aſhamed, that returning home they baniſhed their Captains as Authors of the delay. The Conquerors thence marched to Thebes, where the Inhabitants gave up the Authors of their revolt to the Barbarians, whom being carried to Corinth, all but Antagimus that eſcaped, he there put to death.

64. Whiſt theſe things were thus done in Boeotia, the Greekiſh Fleet of which Leutyches the Spartan King was Admiral, harboured at the Iſland Delos: Hi-ther came three Ambaſſadors from Samus, deſiring aid againſt the Barbarians, and their Tyrant impoſed upon them, ſhewing that it was moſt equal that Grecians ſhould one vindicate the liberty of another, and that this Enterpriſe would be without difficulty, for as much as if the Ionians did but once ſee their Fleet, they would revolt from the Persians, of whom ſuch as were amongſt them would either fly, or might eaſily be made a Prey: Laſtly, if the Ambaſſadors were miſtruſted as not repreſenting things according to their Commiſſion, they offered themſelves as Hoſtages, till the truth might be cleared. Leutyches taking an Oath of them that they came impowered from the Samians, retained Hegeliſtratus (be-cause his Name he took for a good Omen) who had been the mouth of the reſt, and ſending the other two before, followed the next day to Samus. The Sea-men that were there, ſtricken with great fear at the report of the Fleet approaching, diſmiſſed the Phenician Veffels, and fled with the reſt to the Continent, hoping to keep them ſafe under the protection of the fixty thoſand Foot left on the Coaſts by Xerxes to keep Ionia in obedience, over whom Tigranes was General, a man of a moſt proper and amiable perſonage.

65. The Persians having drawn their Ships under the Foot of the Mountain Mycale, near the Temple of Ceres Eleuſinian, and barricaded with great Stones, Wood, and other Materials, came the Grecians with their Fleet prepared for a Fight. But underſtanding what was done, Leutyches coming near the Shore, by the voice of a Cryer aloud (as Themistocles had done before) endeavoured either to make the Ionians revolt, or at leaſt to render them ſuſpected to the Enemy; which being done, preſently he landed all his men, reſolving to try the event of a Land Batle. The Persians ſuſpecting the Samians, diſarmed them, and ſent the Mileſians to keep the paſſages leading up into the Mountain. As the Armies were going to meet, a ſudden Rumour was ſpread abroad through that of the Grecians, that Mardonius with his Forces were cut off, which elevated their Spirits, and made them to Charge with great alacrity, which was alſo increaſed; for that they were now to fight at the Temple of the ſame Goddeſs, as they heard their Friends had done with Mardonius in Boeotia. Then charged they the Persians in a double Body, the Athenians with the Corinthians and others, on the Plain by the Sea-ſhore; the Lacedemonians, and others joyned with them, through the mountainous and precipitous places, who whileſt they were getting up, the Athenians fell on, and calling on one another to endeavour to deprive the Lacedemonians of the the Honour of the Victory, charged the Enemy ſo furioſly, that at length they beat them back, and forced them into their Camp, whither alſo they brake in with them.

66. Hereupon enſuing a bloody Fight, all the reſt fled except the Persians, who fighting with great reſolution, were yet cut off and defeated upon the coming in of the Lacedemonians and the reſt. Two of the Sea-Captains were ſlain, two eſcaped, and with the reſt fell Tigranes, the General of the Foot, and of the Greeks periſhed nota few. The Samians, though diſarmed, and other Ionians came in and helped their Friends, and the Mileſians ſet to guard the Paſſages of Mycale, fell down upon the Persians another way, and made great ſlaughter of them. So was Ionia rent from the Persian Empire again, and joyned to the Grecians. After this performed by Land, the Conquerors burnt all the Persian Ships in the Haven, and being enriched with great Spoil returned to Samus. It was found out afterwards that this Victory at Mycale was obtained on the ſelf ſame day as the other at Plataea in Boeotia, the later in the Morning, and the former at Evening, which cauſed the wonder how intelligence could be given to theſe that fought at Mycale of the ſucceſs of their Countrey-men ſo far off. This hapned often in following times as will be ſeen, although ſome have thought that no report was brought any way to the Army of the Victory of Plataea, but that it was fo given out on purpoſe as a Stratagem by Leutyches to animate his Souldiers, who then being wholly ignorant of any ſuch thing, he invented that which afterwards proved accordingly. Theſe two Battels, and Victories, hapned on the third or fourth day of the Moneth Boedromion, in the ſecond year after the invasion of Greece by Xerxes.

67. The Grecians lying at Samus fell into diſpute about tranſlating the Ionians, and Æolians, out of Aſia into Greece, for that they could not be always in a readineſs to defend them, and they could not ſubſiſt of themſelves; and the Spartans moved that thoſe who had revolted to the Persian ſhould be caſt out, and they placed in their rooms; but the Athenians fearing to be deprived of the right of their Colony, which yet the Ionians acknowledging themſelves, might own the reſt of the aſſociates for their patrons, upon ſuch a change, daſhed the project. Then were the Samians, Chians, Leſbians, and others, who had revolted, religiously and ſolemnly ſworn to the obſervation of the League, and the Grecians departed towards the Helleſpont to break the Bridge there, which when they found broken to their Hands, they conſulted about returning home. The Athenians were for going into the Cherroneſus of Thrace to recover it out of the hands of the Persians, and, though the Peloponneſians returned, proceeding in their reſolution went and beſieged ſeſus an Æolian Town, ſituate in the Cherroneſus, over againſt Abydos. Before this Town they continued till the Autumna was far ſpent, and then pinned out the Inhabitants, who ſorloot the Town, but were overtaken, and either ſlain, or made Priſoners, amongſt the later fort of which was Attagetes the Governour, who becauſe he had violated the Sepulchre of the Chapel of Proteſſians, a great Saint in that place, ſaw firſt his Son ſtoned before his Face; and then was hanged by command of Xanthippus the Athenian Admiral. They returned the Navy home to Athens, and nothing was done further this year, which was the ſecond of the ſeventy fifth Olympiad, and the ſeventh of the reign of Xerxes, of the World three thoſand five hundred twenty fix, and before Chriſt the four hundred and ſeventy ſeven.

68. Xerxes all this while lay at Sardis, and thither thoſe few that eſcaped from Mycale betook themſelves. In the way Maſtiſes Brother to the King fell ſoul upon Artaſtes, one of the Captains of the Fleet, amongſt other reproachful words telling him that he had in this behaved himſelf more cowardly than a Woman; whereupon the other drew his Dagger, and had ſtabbed him, but that one Xenagoras an Halicarnarſſean interpoſed himſelf, whom for this ſaving of his Brother Xerxes rewarded with the Government of Cilicia. Whiſt he lay ſtill at Sardis he fell in love with the Wiſe of Maſtiſes, but he being too honeſt for his adulterous intentions, he married her, and his Brothers Daughter Artaſtes to his Son Darius, hoping to enjoy her this way, which Ceremony being over, he returns home, leaving part of his Forces to continue the War with the Grecians. In his (a) Fight he burned all the Temples of Aſia except the Ephesian, out of indignati- on at his late bad ſucceſs, and amongſt the reſt the Oracle of Diadem Apollo at Monght the Branchidians, who becauſe they betrayed the Treasures of their God to him, durſt not ſtay behind, but followed him. (b) Some ſay he went to Suſa, others to Ecbatane, a (c) third, that by Babylon into Persia. That in his way back (c) Diadem,

69. Being returned to Susa, he fell from the Mother to the Daughter too, being in love with Artaxata his Daughter-in-law, whom incestuously he used constantly. She begged of him a Coat, which with much art and industry Amestris his Wife had made for him. By her wearing of this the Queen knew how matters went, and thence followed the destruction of the whole House of Majestes, for on Xerxes his birth-day, when he used not to deny her any request, she asked Majestes Wife to be given up into her Power, which he doing, she cut off her Breasts, Nose, Ears, Lips, and Tongue, and in this case sent her home. Majestes enraged at this barbarous usage, conspired with his Children how to be revenged, and resolved to fly into Bactria, of which he was Governour, then to stir up that Province, and the Sace with whom he was very gracious, into rebellion against his Brother. But Xerxes coming to the knowledge of the matter, sent a party after him, which cut him off with his Children, and all his retinue. These things happened about a year after his return, with which endeth the History of Herodotus the Father of history (as Cicero called him) seeing he is the most ancient of all Heathen Writers now extant.

70. The same year being the third of the seventy fifth Olympiad, and the eighth of the Reign of Xerxes, a year after the finishing of the Median War, so called by the Gracians, the Lacedæmonians sent Paulanias, famous for his Generalship at the Battel of Plataea, to set at liberty such Greek Cities as yet were under the Persian, who accordingly with fifty Gallies set sail out of Peloponnesus, and taking thirty more out from Athens, commanded by Aristides, first went to Cyprus, where he set at liberty such Towns as were yet held by Persian Garrisons, and thence to the Hellepont, where he took Byzantium, and therein many Noble prisoners of the Persians, whom he delivered to one Gangylus an Eretrian, to be kept as he pretended, to be put to death, but indeed to restore them to Xerxes. For he sent this man secretly to the King, and bargained for his Daughter to be given him in Marriage to betray Sparta and all into his Hands. He gladly received the Message, and wrote back again to him by Artabazus the Son of Pharnaces whom he sent to the Sea-Coasts to hold Intelligence with him, and for that purpose gave him the Government of Dasyliu, recalling Magabates who was over that Province. But Paulanias growing more insolent, hereupon was suspected, and afterwards at length discovered, and punished for his Treason, as farther is to be discovered in it's proper place.

71. In the third year of the seventy seventh Olympiad, and the sixteenth of Xerxes, Diodorus ad Olymp. 77. an. 3. Demotion being Archon, or chief Magistrate of Athens, the Athenians made choice of Cimon the Son of Miltiades for their General, and with a considerable force sent him into the Maritime Coasts of Asia, with order to relieve the Associates, and set at liberty such as were still under the slavery of Persian Garrisons. He bends his course towards Byzantium, and took Eione and Scyrus, inhabited by Pelagians and Dolopians, and divided the Grounds thereof by lot; then casting in his Mind greater designs, sailed back to the Piræus, and furnishing himself with more Ships, increased his Navy to the number of two hundred, to which he added of the Associates one hundred more, and with all this Power failed towards Caria. Here all the Maritime Greek Cities revolted to him, and what did not, he subdued by strong Hand, which having done, he failed to Lycia, where he had the same success, and now requiring Ships to be provided by such as had joyned themselves in Society with the Athenians, he thereby mightily increased his Navy.

72. The Persians now levied both a Land and Sea-Army, the former with in themselves, and the latter out of Phœnicia, Cyprus, and Cilicia, the General being Tirraustes the base Son of Xerxes, who by some other is said to have only had command of the Fleet, and that Phœnædatus was over the Land-forces, though this place by another is given to Ariomandes the Son of Gobryas. Cimon having made discovery that the Persian Fleet Rode nigh to Cyprus, failed thither, and with two hundred fifty Ships made Head against three hundred forty, whereupon ensued a sharp Fight, both Parties fighting with great courage and animosity, till at length the Athenians overpowered the other, and spoiling many of their Vessels, took about one hundred with the Men in them, the rest escaping to Land at Cyprus, the men saved themselves by Flight, but the Ships fell into the Hands of the Gracians. Cimon not not contented with this Victory, failed towards the Land-Army of the Persians, then lying upon the River Eurymedon. To deceive the Enemy, he put his most valiant men aboard those Vessels lately taken in the Fight, adorned and clothed after the Persian fashion, so that the Persians not doubting at all but that it was their own Elect, kindly welcomed these counterfeiters as their Friends. Hereby Cimon received as such, landed his men by night and fell upon the Enemies' Camp, whence ensued great fear and tumult, his men presently killing all they meet, and amongst the rest Phœnædatus Nephew to the King by his Brother. Of the common sort many were slain, others sorely wounded, and shortly all put to flight, yet they knew not by whom, not suspecting the Gracians to have any Land-Army, and therefore concluding themselves surprized by the Persians upon whom they bordered.

73. Suspecting therefore this Storm to come from the Continent, they betook themselves to their Ships, and the Moon then not shining, and the Night being very dark, the Error was the more increased, so that not discerning any thing, they ran upon their own Ruine, and great slaughter was made of them on all sides. All things being thus in confusion, the Gracian General fearing the fragging of his Soldiers too far for Booty, according to former order, that when he set out a Light they should all come back to that place, gave out that sign by the Ships, upon sight of which they withdrew themselves thither. Notwithstanding these two Victories, which in some sense seemed to excel those of Salaminis and Plataea, being fought on the same day, yet would he add one thing more as a Supplement to them. Understanding eighty Phœnician Ships (expected as Plutarch saith, by the Navy at Eurymedon, which was the cause why he set upon it so soon, being unwilling they should joyn) to be arrived at Hydrus, he failed hastily thither, where as yet the News had not arrived, but now the Phœnicians suspecting the truth, and thereby discouraged, he easily overcame, took and sunk all their Ships, and therein the greatest part of themselves miscarried. Hereupon ensued a certain agreement betwixt the King and the Gracians.

74. The next thing considerable concerning Xerxes, is his Death, placed in the fifth year after the former translations, by Diodorus. There was one Artabanus an Hyrcanian by birth, of great power about him, as Captain of his Guard, who consulted about making him away, and transferring the Kingdom to himself, and for that purpose inveigled Mithridates the Eunuch the King's Chamberlain, by whom being let in by Night with his seven Sons, they strangled him in his Bed. Hereigned twenty one Years, or twenty with odd Moneths, though some there be that cut off nine Years from that number. Their ground is, for that Themistocles the Athenian being banished his Country, came to Artaxerxes, then the new King of Persia, according to Thucydides, so that Xerxes must at that time have been dead. Now the same Author placeth this flight of Themistocles betwixt the Siege of Naxos, which the Athenians subdued, and the former exploits of Cimon, so that his Expedition must have happened also not in the days of Xerxes as we have fixed it according to Diodorus, but in the reign of Artaxerxes his successor: and Eusebius placing the flight of Themistocles in the fourth Year of the seventy sixth Olympiad (though Diodorus in the second of the seventy seventh) hence it must follow, that the beginning of the Reign of Artaxerxes must be placed higher by near to nine Years. The authority of that grave Author is in no wise to be despised, yet notwithstanding, this shortening of the Reign of Xerxes which must necessarily follow, is not agreeable to the Testimony of other Writers: especially it is to be considered what difficulty will arise hereby to the Chronology of the sacred Story, it being most probable, that the seventy Weeks of Daniel commencing in the seventh Year of Artaxerxes, and at the death of Jesús Christ; which cannot be, if their beginning be to be assigned nine Years higher. This may incline us to believe, that some reason Diodorus had (who could not but have opportunity to see and compare several Histories) not to follow Thucydides, and makes us rather subscribe to the number of Years by general consent ascribed unto the Reign of Xerxes.

SECT. III.

From the death of Xerxes, and the beginning of Artaxerxes Longimanus, to the death of Artaxerxes Mnemon, containing the space of one hundred and three Years.

1. XERXES left three Sons, Darius, and Artaxerxes, both of them at the time of his Death resident in his Court, and Hystaspes, who was absent in his Government of Bactria. Artabanus having murdered their Father, presently in the dead time of the Night went to Artaxerxes, and made him believe that his elder Brother Darius had made him away, out of ambition to reign himself, counselled him to provide for his own safety and honour, before he should establish himself, and offered him the Guard to rid him of him, whereby he being persuaded, sent and slew his Brother. When this was done, Artabanus called his Sons together, telling them this was the time of obtaining the Kingdom, and drew his Sword with an intention now also to kill Artaxerxes. But he being only lightly wounded, laid so about him, that he slew him upon the place, as we have it from one; though others with more reason defer the time of Artabanus his Death, to whom also seven Months in the Empire are attributed by * Eusebius.

2. It is probable, that for that time the Treason of Artabanus not being discovered, or for some reasons winked at, he might by a Vicegerency govern the Kingdom. By his means came Artaxerxes to it in his youth, a Prince of a great Spirit, and yet of a mild Nature, Surnamed μακρόχρως, or Longimanus, because his right Hand was longer than the other, in the fourth year of the seventy eight Olympiads, or in the beginning of the seventy ninth, Lyfiteus being then Archon at Athens. A. M. 3540, four hundred sixty three Years before the birth of Christ. Within a while Artabanus laid in wait for his Life also, communicating his design to Megabyzus, who had married the Daughter of Xerxes, and for her loose life was fallen into a discontent, Megabyzus swore secrecy as well as he, but revealed the whole matter, so that Artabanus finding not the same success as in his other Treasons, was sent the same way and by the same means with which he intended to dispatch Artaxerxes. Now came out the whole truth concerning Xerxes and his Son Darius; and, Spamitres (or Spamitres) the Eunuch, who was accessory to the Murders, was tortured to Death. Justin telleth us, how the King fearing the number, and power of Artabanus his Sons, commanded his Soldiers to be ready armed the next morning, both for a Muster, and to exercise them. Amongst the rest appeared he according to his place, with whom Artaxerxes desired to change his coat-armour, pretending his was too short for him, which to do, he first putting his off, the King took the advantage and ran him thorough with his Sword.

3. After his death, his party being strong, great troubles ensued, which ended at length in the destruction thereof, three of his Sons falling in fight, and Megabyzus who opposed them being forely wounded, for whom now great lamentation was made throughout the Court, till at length he escaped the danger by the skill and industry of Apollonides the Physician, native of the Island Cor. The Bactrians also, according to Ctesias, revolted, with another of the King's Officers named Artabanus, who seemeth to have had some other command than over Bactria. For we are told elsewhere, that Hystaspes the Son of Xerxes was Satrapus or Governor of that Province, and thence may almost conclude him to have been the principal cause of the Revolt, out of indignation that being the second Brother, the youngest of all the three should be preferred before him. Two Battels were fought in this quarrel, in the latter of which the Wind being full in the Faces of the Bactrians, so disturbed them, that whereby Artaxerxes became Victor, and reduced all that Country into Obedience. Artaxerxes having thus revenged his Father's and Brother's death, and brought Artabanus and his complices to condign punishment, and recovered Bactria, settled the affairs of his Kingdom. He took care of his revenue, settled the Militia, displaced suspicious Governors of Provinces, and carrying all things with much moderation and Justice, gained great Authority from his Subjects. In the mean while the Egyptians hearing of the death of Xerxes, and in what disturbance the affairs of the Persians were, out of desire to recover their liberty, hearkened to the Counsel and persuasions of one Inarus King of Libya, the Son of Plammetichus, so that the greater part of the Country revolted, and making him their Prince, sent about to crave aid; and amongst others to the Athenians. They thought it their interest to impair all ways possible, the interest of Persia, and concluding it not amiss to get some footing in Egypt, resolved upon sending three hundred Ships, and prepared for the setting of them forward with all earnestness. Artaxerxes hearing on the other hand how things went in Egypt, determined to overmatch the Revolters in Provisions for the War, and for that end levied Forces throughout his Dominions, Rigged his Fleet, and omitted nothing requisite for an expedition of that moment.

4. He thought fast of going down himself, but being overruled by his Friends sent Achamenes his Brother, according to Ctesias, but according to Diodorus, Achamenes the Son of Darius, and his great Uncle, with an Army of above three hundred thousand foot Diodorus, or four hundred thousand Foot, and eighty Ships, who marching as far as the River Nile, there pitched his Tents, refreshed his Soldiers, and prepared all things for a Batel. The Egyptians assisted by the Libyans expected the Athenian Fleet, which at length arrived, and got possession of the River. Presently after this a Land Batel ensued, in which, though the Persians for a time prevailed by their Multitudes, yet the Athenians, who were now acquainted with their manner of Fighting, pressing fore upon that Wing with which they joyned, did such execution as put it to flight, at which all the rest out of Fear betook them to their Heels. Great slaughters were then made in the pursuit, the greatest number of the Barbarians fell, and the rest betook themselves to a Fort called White-wall, whither the Athenians pursuing, took two parts of Memphis, and besieged them in the third division called by that Name; of four hundred thousand that came into Egypt, Ctesias writeth one hundred thousand to have been slain, and with them their Captain, killed by the Hands of Inarus, whose body was sent back to Artaxerxes. That Achamenes the Son of Darius was slain with many Persians, * Herodotus tells us by an anticipation of the Story.

5. Artaxerxes understanding what bad success his Affairs had in Egypt, and knowing the main blow to have been given from the Athenians, sent Megabyzus with a great sum of Money to Lacedaemon to hire that State to make War upon them, and give them something to do at home, to divert them from the assistance of his Rebels. The Lacedaemonians would not be bribed to fall out with Athens, and refused to hearken to any thing else the Ambassador offered on his Masters behalf, so that he recalled him home, and gave in charge to Megabyzus the Son of that Zopyrus who recovered Babylon to Darius, to prepare for another expedition, with whom he also joyned Artabazus, making choice of them both out of respect to their great valour, and skill in Military matters.

They by the Spring having got together an Army of (above three hundred thousand men, saith Diodorus, two hundred thousand only saith Ctesias) marched down into Cilicia, where, and in Phoenicia they rested their men, and caused the inhabitants of these places, together with the Cyprians, to provide a Navy, which being done, to the number of three hundred Ships, they furnished them with the ablest Soldiers, and all sorts of Weapons, and whatsoever was requisite for a Sea-fight, and in this preparation, together with the exercising, and training of their men, spent they almost all the Summer. In the mean while the Athenians laboured to storm the White-wall wherein the Persians were besieged, but they made such effectual resistance as they kept them out all this year. When Winter was over, Megabyzus and his Colleague led down their Army through Syria and Phoenicia, the Navy Coasting all along not far off; and at length came to Memphis, where the fear of them presently loosed the Siege of their Country-men, whom joyning to themselves they gave Batel to the Egyptians and their Associates. Many fell on both sides, but most of the Egyptians; at length Megabyzus wounded Inarus in his Thigh, and put him to flight, who betook himself to Byblus, a Town situate in an Island of Nile, called Protophis, and with him such Greeks as had escaped the Fight, after which the Egyptians returned into Obedience, making their Peace with Megabyzus.

6. Megabyrus pursuing them, besieged the place, which yet was so defended that they held it out a Year and six Months in despite of him. The Athenian Fleet lay in the River before the Town, which the Persians at length considering, and how it was possible by Ditches to drain the Water, and derive that course thereof another way, set about it, and so drained the Channel that the Island was now joyned to the Main, and the Ships rested on dry Land. Now Diodorus saith: the Egyptians forsook their Confederates, and returned to obedience: which the Athenians understanding, and how their Ships by this Stratagem of the Enemy were rendered useless, burnt them all, and nothing affrighted with so great a danger in which they were involved, called upon one another with exhortations not to commit any thing unworthy of their former noble Achievements, so that excelling those their Country-men, if possible, who lost their lives at Thermopylae, they resolved to fight. The Persian Commanders seeing their Courage, and considering their own losses already great, having lost many thousands, though they had recovered the Island, yet gave them these terms to return with safety out of Egypt. Their number being something above six thousand, they returned home by Cyrene above their expectations, having consumed six Years in the War to no good purpose. Inarus taken and Crucified; Artaxerxes then recovered all Egypt except some fenny parts, near which Amartyus reigned, who by reason of the difficulty of the place, and the fierceness of the People, could not be reduced into order.

In the mean time, whilst the Athenians travelled homewards, came fifty Ships more to their relief, which being utterly ignorant of what had passed, took up their harbour at Mendesium, one of the Mouths of Nile. Here they were fet upon by the Persians on Land, and the Phenicians by Sea, and lost most of their Vessels, a few only escaping home, and such was the end of this expedition of the Athenians with their associates into Egypt.

7. Artaxerxes in the seventh Year of his Reign made a Decree in the behalf of the Jews, that whosoever of them would, might go up with Ezra to Jerusalem and inhabit it. He and his Counsellors contributed much Treasure, and gave them liberty to Collect what they could, and commanded his Treasurers beyond the River Euphrates to furnish him yearly with what he wanted, as far as one hundred Talents of Silver, one hundred Measures of Wheat, one hundred Baths of Wine, one hundred Baths of Oyl, and Salt without measure, for the Sacrifices and other Uses, according to the discretion of Ezra. He commanded that all things should be done according to the mind and will of the God of Heaven, lest his Anger might break out against the Kingdom of him and his Sons: the Priests and Levites he made free from all impositions, and gave Power to *Esdra*s to Constitute Judges and Governours over the people, for the settlement of the Politie or Commonwealth.

Ezra 7. 12.

8. Now though here in this Edict be no express mention of repairing the Walls of Jerusalem, or of the Request of Ezra in that behalf, yet is it probable enough that he would desire it, because of the often incursions of their Enemies, the Samaritans, and others, neither could their habitation in the City be secure, nor the work of the Temple go on with safety: and in what could all that Treasure be spent but in Fortifications? So that we may even conclude sufficient Licence and Authority to be included in this Decree, and that Ezra began to build the Walls, but was either hindered by other occasions, or the negligence of the Jews, or (more probably) the molestations of their Enemies; who because the Licence was not expressed, took thence occasion to interrupt the work till thirteen years after it was renewed, and perfected by the procurement and industry of Nehemiah, who obtained a confirmation rather of the former Edict, than any new Decree; So though Cyrus had first of all granted Licence for the rebuilding of the Temple, yet because the work was hindered by the Enemies of the Jews, there was need of another Edict granted out by Darius. As the decrees of these two Kings were in effect the same, so also those were only put in execution afterwards by Nehemiah, because the execution of it, as to the rebuilding of the Walls, was either remitted by negligence, or by malice of the Bore-

Daniel 9. 24

9. If so, the beginning of the seventy weeks of Daniel, fifty may be taken hence, ending most probably in the death of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Seventy weeks saith the Angel, are determined upon thy People, and upon thy holy City, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the Vision and Prophecy, and to anoint the most holy. Know therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the Command, to restore, and rebuild Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven Weeks, and threescore and two weeks: and the Streets shall be built again, and the Wall, even in troublous times. And after sixty two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, but not for himself: and the people of the Prince that shall come, shall destroy the City and the Sanctuary, and the end thereof shall be with a Flood, and unto the end of the War desolations are determined. And he shall confirm the Covenant with many in one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the Sacrifice and the Oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolate. Thus the Oracle, in which is contained a Prophecy concerning the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and the coming of Christ, who should bring unconceivable benefits along with him, and yet at length be put to death, not for himself, but others, and this should be all accomplished within seventy weeks of years, which contain four hundred ninety. Lastly, it foretels, that for that horrible sin of the Jews in murdering the Messias, they should lose both Principality and Priest-hood, and be punished with perpetual Exile, and the utter and unrepairable desolation of the City.

10. Many are the opinions concerning the beginning and end of these seventy weeks amongst Chronologers. Some begin them in the first year of the Empire of Cyrus, and end them in the Nativity of Christ. Others fetch their rise from the second of Darius Noshus (Successor to Artaxerxes) and conclude them with the destruction of Jerusalem, by Titus Vespasian. Some make them Commence from the twentieth of Artaxerxes (when Nehemiah obtained another Decree of him) and to conclude with the passion and death of Christ; and others will have them begin in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and end in the desolation of the City by the Romans. But many there are who rejecting all these, with best reason, fix the beginning of them in the seventh of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and their conclusion in the death of Christ, in which termination most of the Learned, both ancient and modern, agree.

11. For if we seriously consider the account of time, and judge of it according to the best approved Authors, the three former opinions will be found either to exceed, or come short of the number. From the beginning of the Persian Empire to Christ's Nativity passed about five hundred thirty years. From the second of Darius Noshus indeed to the destruction of Jerusalem, near upon four hundred ninety years intervened; but concerning any Edict made by that Prince, there is not a word in Scripture. From the twentieth of Artaxerxes Longimanus, to the death and passion of Christ, are found four hundred seventy six, or four hundred seventy seven, which come too short by thirteen of the four hundred ninety, and betwixt the twentieth of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and the destruction of Jerusalem, are found but about four hundred fifty, which come far short of the true account; as also the Chronology of such as would fetch the rise of the four hundred ninety from the first of Darius Medus, and the second or sixth of Darius the Son of Hystaspes. And although the Angel mentioneth the Punishment to be inflicted on the Jews, yet doth he not comprise it in the four hundred ninety years, the end of which he signalizeth by the anointing and sufferings of the Messias, but assigneth half a week or of seven years for the accomplishment of those Plagues, which in such a quantity of time were to be inflicted upon his murderers.

12. But if we reckon from this seventh of Artaxerxes Longimanus, down by Vlad Ladozic, his Successors in the Persian Empire, the Polomies of Aegypt, after that of Alexis, under the Great, and then by the Assymonians or Jewish Princes till we come at length to Herod the Great, and so to Christ, the just number of four hundred ninety we shall find accomplished at his death, with such small difference, as is pardonable to so many Authors handling so many things. Or if we reckon by the years of the Olympiads and the building of Rome, we shall find Christ to have died in the four hundred ninthieth year after the promulgation of this Decree. The seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus fell in with the second and third of the eightieth Olympiad, according to Eusebius, and the two hundred ninety fifth, or the two hundred ninety sixth of the City, from which continuing to the second year of the two hundred and second Olympiad, and the seven hundred eighty fifth of the City, (in which Christ was crucified) four hundred eighty nine years, or four hundred ninety are precisely found; so that farther we shall not enquire about these seventy weeks, having therein already satisfied what this design and work requireth, leaving the further inquiry thereof to the studious Reader, and the judgment to the Learned.

13. In the fifteenth year of Artaxerxes the Athenians having recalled Cimon, whom for ten years they had banished by the Ostracism, sent him with a Fleet of two hundred Sail against Cyprus subject to the Persian. Sixty of these Ships he sent into Egypt to the aid of Ameyreus, who still was up in the marshes, and with the rest he set upon Citium a Town in the Island. At this time were Artabazus and Megabyzus still Generals of the Forces of Persia: the former lay with three hundred Ships in the Road of Cyprus, and the other with a Land-Army of three hundred thousand men quartered in Cilicia. Cimon when he had besieged Citium sent some Messengers to Delphos to enquire something of the Oracle, but ere they got to their Journeys end, he died before the place, either of Sickness, or by some Wound, both which are affirmed. When he saw he should dy, he counselled his men forthwith to depart, and conceal his death, and they doing so, it hapned that neither the Enemy, nor Associates knew any thing of it. At this time came back the Fleet sent into Egypt, so that all joyning together again, they sailed to Salamine a Town in Cyprus, where they fought with the Phenicians and Cilicians, who were come to aid their Friends of Cyprus. In a Sea-fight they sunk many of their Vessels, took one hundred with the men in them, and pursued the rest as far as Phenicia. The Persians with that part of the Fleet which yet remained, fled into Cilicia, where Megabyzus lay, but the Athenians followed them with speed, and landing fell upon them, and making great slaughter, amongst the rest slew Anaxicrates the Sea-Captain, who most gallantly fought whilst life lasted. Then the Greeks victorious got them to their Ships and sailed home.

14. The King understanding what loss he had received in Cyprus, called a Council to deliberate what should be done thereupon; at which, when all was considered, it was resolved that it was requisite to procure a Peace if possible. He wrote then to his Captains about Cyprus, to make peace upon as good terms as might be; according to which order Artabazus and Megabyzus sent to Athens to treat about it. The Athenians not being averse from hearing to them, both sides sent their Commissioners with full Power to conclude; at which time also the Argives sent to Artaxerxes to demand of him whether the confederacy into which they entered with his Father remained, or they were accounted by him as Enemies; to which he answered, that he did not doubt of it's continuance, and as for his part he accounted no City more friendly to him than that of Argos.

The Articles of Peace concluded with the Athenians were, That all the Greek Cities in Asia should be free: though in the Peace with Lacedemon it was agreed they should be under the Persian; that the Persian Generals should not come within three days journey of the Sea, that none of Persian Subjects should come with a long Ship between the Cyanean and Chelidonian Islands. The Athenians on the other part took an Oath, not to invade the King's Territories. For the Joy conceived about this Peace, they built an Altar of Peace, and graced Callias the principal of the Embassage with the greatest Honours. Cimon was dead, and with him in a manner the true gallantry of the Greekish Nation; for none of their Captains after him did any thing to purpose against the Barbarians (as they termed all except themselves) but being drawn by their Orators to intestine differences, and none after him being left to take them up, they fell one upon another, and so afforded an happy occasion to the Persian to breathe himself, and for a good time to effect his own security with the impairement of their interest. For though Artabazus afterwards (as will be seen) passed over his Army into Asia, and made a short War with the Persian Commanders on the Sea-Coasts, yet without doing any thing of much consequence, was he recalled by Seditions at home, leaving the Persian Officers behind him, who exacted Impositions from the Cities confederate with Greece: whereas whilst Cimon was in command, not to much as a Carrier appeared in these quarters, nor an Horse came within four hundred furlongs distance of the Sea.

15. In the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, Nehemiah his Cup-bearer the Son of Hachabiah the Levite received a message, that the remnant of the Captivity left in Judah were in great affliction and reproach; that the Wall of Jerusalem was broken-down, and the Gates thereof burnt with Fire. Because of this he wept, fasted, and mourned certain days, and praying to God to make the King favourable to him, obtained to be sent with ample Commission to build up the Walls. Now was no new Edict promulgated in behalf of the Jews, which had been done sufficiently thirteen years before by the consent of the Princes: only Let ters were written to the keeper of the King's Forreft, to furnish Nehemiah with wood sufficient for building of the Gates and Walls of the City, for the Temple, and an house for himself; and the Governors beyond the River were ordered to convey him over till he came into Judah. By virtue of this Authority he came to Jerusalem, and notwithstanding the indignation and opposition of the Enemies of the Jews, by his great diligence and valour, finished the work of the Wall in fifty two days. From the new Moon of the month Nisan, which followed this repairing of the Walls, to that new-Moon of the same Month in which Christ suffered, passed four hundred seventy five Jewish years, which make up four hundred ninety Lunar years, consisting each of twelve Lunar Moneths. This being not without a providence, that as from the going out of the decree to the death of Christ intervened four hundred ninety Solar years; so also from the rebuilding of the Walls to his death, should intervene so many consisting each of twelve Lunar Moneths. This gave occasion to many eminent men both Antient and Modern to follow the opinion of Africanus, in placing the beginning of the seventy weeks in the twentieth year of this King, and concluding them with the death of Christ: although he reckoneth from that time to the fifteenth of Tiberius four hundred seventy five years; whereas there are to be accounted but four hundred seventy two; and Christ died not in the fifteenth year of his Reign, but was then baptized.

16. Nehemiah not thinking it sufficient to repair the Walls whilst the frame of the State was out of frame, restored both the Ecclesiastical and Civil Polity, thereof. Taking notice how all ranks of men, and especially the Priests were out of order, no certainty being of their Pedigrees; he caused to be sought for, and read, the Register of those who returned with Zorobabel, from which whosoever could not prove his descent from some Priestly Family was cast off from the Priesthood. Twelve years staid he at Jerusalem, governing with great moderation, and self-denial, and reforming abuses both in Religion and State. The Rulers of the People dwelt at Jerusalem, the rest of the People cast lots to bring one of ten to dwell therein, for that it was little inhabited, and nine parts to dwell in other places, the People blessing all such as willingly offered themselves to dwell in Jerusalem. Then returned he to the King, from whom he yet obtained leave to come again into Judah, where he seemeth to have lived until the sixteenth year of Darius Nothus, in which the first part of the seventy weeks ended, consisting of forty nine years, viz. seven weeks, which are thought to be those of which the Angel spake, that the Street should be built again and the wall, even in troublous times.

17. After Artaxerxes had made peace with the Gracians, he fell into civil and intestine Broils with Megabyzus, who had done him such service in Egypt and elsewhere, if credit be given to Ctesias, from whom we have a relation of these transactions. This Megabyzus, after he had quieted Egypt, and committed it to the Government of Sartanus, departed thence and went to the King, leading along with him Inarus and some Greekish prisoners, after he had obtained a promise from him, that no punishment should be inflicted on them, though Ameyris (or rather Amestris) the King's Mother had so layn upon him to deliver into her hands not only them, but Megabyzus himself her Son in Law, being enraged for the death of Achamenes, who in the former Expedition was slain by the Ionians. For five years he endured her importunity without yielding, but at length being wearied and overcome, he gave up the Greeks and Inarus into her power. His Body he nailed overhwart to three crosses, and beheaded fifty of the Greeks, which were all he could take. That Inarus was crucified Thucydides witnesseth, though nothing of this time or manner; and Herodotus reporteth, that his Son Thannyras was restored by the Persians to the Principality of his Father.

18. Megabyzus being forely moved with the usage of his prisoners, concealed his displeasure for a time; but getting leave to depart to his Government in Syria, whither he had privately sent some Greeks beforehand, broke out into open Rebellion, and got an Army together of one hundred fifty thousand men. Against him then was sent Osiris with two hundred thousand, who joyning Battel with him wounded him in the Thigh, but received two wounds from him, one in his Thigh and the other in his Shoulder, with the anguish whereof, and loss of Blood, he fell from his Horse and was taken prisoner; and though his men well behaved themselves, yet were they overthrown, and Megabyzus getting the Victory used him very curiously, and sent him back to the King who desired it. After this was sent more Forces commanded by Mexifpener Nephew to Artaxerxes, by his Brother Artarius the Governour of Babylon. He also giving battel to Megabyzus, was wounded by him both in Shoulder and Head though not mortally, and being put to flight Megabyzus obtained another famous Victory.

19. Things going thus, Artaxerxes dealt with him by Messengers, then Artaxerxes the Eunuch Governour of Paphlagonia, and Amestris also advised him yet to be reconciled to the King, afterwards Artaxerxes himself, Amestris his Wife, and Artaxerxes (now twenty years of age) were sent to him to persuade him to go home: being persuaded, after his return the King signified to him by a message, that he freely pardoned him all that was past, but going on a time a hunting with him, when a Lion set upon the King, as he raised himself up Megabyzus slew him, whereat Artaxerxes was in a great rage, that he had stricken him before he could touch him, and commanded his Head to be cut off. But by the intercession of Amestris, Amestris, and others, his life was spared, yet was he banished to Cyrra, a Town upon the red Sea, and Artaxerxes the Eunuch into Armenia for speaking freely to the King in his behalf.

Five years he then continued in exile, at the end of which feigning himself to be a Pisagaz (which in the Persian tongue signifieth a Leper, at whom no man might come) he fled away and came to his Wife Amestris at his own house, by whom scarcely being known, he was by her means and the help of Amestris reconciled once again to the King, who made him eat at his own Table as formerly, and so continued in great favour till his death at seventy six years of age, for which the King was much troubled.

20. Whilst the Greeks were busy with one another in the Peloponnesian War, of which now several years had passed, Artaxerxes sent Artabernes a Persian to the Lacedæmonians, with a Letter written in African Characters, in which, amongst other things, he desired to know plainly of them how they stood affected, for that he was utterly ignorant of what they thought, many Ambassadors coming, and no one of them agreeing with another, wherefore he desired, that if they intended to declare themselves, they would send some of their own back with Artabernes. What was effected hereby is not known, but we find elsewhere, that the Lacedæmonians entered into a League with him in one main matter, contrary to that formerly made with the Athenians. For whereas it was provided first in the one, that the Greekish Cities in Asia should be left to their own liberty, in the other they were expressly left under his Dominion; such influence had then the Civil Wars of Greece upon the matters of Asia; perhaps because the Lacedæmonians were jealous of the Ionians, as the Colony of their adversaries the Athenians, who, if not now, entered into War with them, were much suspected, jealousy abounding betwixt them. Not long after this Message, Artaxerxes died, having reigned according to Diodorus forty years complete, according to Sulpicius Severus forty one, but after Cæsar forty two, amongst which opinions 'tis probable that he died in the beginning of the forty second year, after the death of Xerxes, in the second year of the eighty ninth Olympiad. A. M. 3582. four hundred twenty one years before the birth of Christ.

21. Artaxerxes had only one legitimate Son by his Wife Damaspia, named Xerxes, but seventeen by Concubines, amongst which were Sogdianus Oebus, and Artices. Xerxes succeeded his Father, but was slain by Secundianus, as he was drunk, in the forty fifth day after his death. Secundianus then became King, but causing Bagorazus the Eunuch to be stoned for something done about his Fathers Body, incurred the displeasure of the Army, which because of this, and his Brothers death, could never be taken off by all the gifts he bestowed on them. Being jealous of his Brother Oebus, whom his Father had made Governour of the Hyrcanians, he sent for him; but he refused to come, and so did several times, till he had got a considerable Army. For Arberius General of the Horse revolted to him, then Arxanes the Viceroy of Egypt, and Artaxerxes coming out of Armenia caused him to take the Cidaritis (or Citaris) a Cap peculiar to the Kings and Priests of Persia.

Oebus thus taking the Royal Ensign and Title of King, changed his name into Darius, and was also most commonly called Darius Nothus. By the advice of Parysatis his Wife, he enticed by all means Secundianus to come to him, not sparing Oaths, or any other ways to get him into his Hands, and so far prevailed, that though Menofanes the Eunuch counselled Secundianus not to trust himself, yet he came to him, and being cast into Ashes he died the same way as Darius the Son of Hystaspes formerly made away his Emulators, though some think this Darius to have been the first inventor of this Punishment, and that it is falsely ascribed by Valerius Maximus, to the Son of Hystaspes. Then reigned he alone by himself after his brother had reigned six months and twenty dayes. The three Eunuchs, Artaxerxes, Artabernes, and Arbous were in great power with him; but especially, he was advised by his wife, by whom he had two Children, Amistris a daughter, and Aspases a son (called afterwards Artaxerxes) before he came to the Kingdom. Afterwards he begot of her another son, called Cyrus, from the Sun; and others to the number of thirteen. But all the rest died young, except these two and his fourth son named Oxendras.

22. After this Artices his own brother, both by father and mother, and Artiphilus the son of Megabyzus revolted from him. Artaspas was sent with an Army against them, who falling upon Artiphilus, was worsted in two battles; but in the third overthrew him, and corrupting the Greeks that fought for him, drew away all his Company, except three Alieghians; so that upon the Oath of Artaspas for his security, for that Artices could not be found, he yielded himself to the King. He was minded to put him to death, but Parysatis his wife persuaded him to spare him for a time, for Artices seeing him unpunished would also be moved to yield himself, and then he might rid himself of them both together, which accordingly came to pass, both being cast into the ashes; though Darius was hardly brought by her persuasions to make away his brother: now also Pharnaces, who with Secundianus had slain Xerxes, was put to death, and Menofanes being apprehended shunned the same punishment by laying violent hands upon himself.

This Rebellion was followed by the revolt of Pisathmes the Governour of Lydia, against whom Tissaphernes and others being sent, he met them, having in his Army Lycon the Athenian, with such Greeks as he had brought with him, who being corrupted by the Kings Captains revolted from him, so that with fair words he was drawn in, and carried to the King, who cast him into the ashes, and gave his Government to Tissaphernes, and the Cities with the regions adjoining to Lycon for a reward of his treachery. After this followed the treason of Artaxerxes in great power with Darius, who conspired about killing him, and transferring the Kingdom to himself. For this purpose being an Eunuch, he caused his wife to make him a beard, that he might seem, no other than a perfect man; but the matter being revealed by her, he was delivered into the hands of Parysatis, who put him to death.

23. Aspases (afterward called Artaxerxes) the eldest son of Darius, married Statira, the daughter of Iadarnes, a man of prime rank amongst the Persians, and Terituchmes the son of Iadarnes, who after his death succeeded in his Government, married Amistris daughter to the King. She had a sister named Roxana, who being very beautiful, and well skilled in shooting, Terituchmes fell in love with her, and having to do with her detested his wife, inasmuch as he resolved to murder her by the help of three hundred men, with whom he practiced to revolt. Whilst he thought hereof, one Udiastes, a man in great power about him, being promised great matters if he could deliver the Kings daughter from so great a danger, slew him; but the son of this Udiastes, who was Armour-bearer to Terituchmes, and was not present at his death, after he had notice thereof cursed his father, and seizing upon the City Zaris delivered it up to Terituchmes his son. Then did Parysatis bury alive the Mother, Brethren, and Sisters of Terituchmes, and commanded Roxana to be cut in pieces alive. Darius would have had her to have made away Statira his daughter-in-Law together with the rest, but through the importunity of Aspases her husband, the spared her; of which Darius told her, that afterwards she would sorely repent, as it came to pass.

From the second year of this King, * Sulpicius Severus, and * many learned men with him, count the beginning of the seventy weeks of Daniel, ending them with the destruction of Jerusalem, because the number of years do agree, and the Angel maketh mention of that desolation; though nothing be spoken in any place concerning any going out of a Decree during the reign of this Prince, from which those weeks must needs have commenced. They must needs allow the work now to have been carried on by the solicitation of the Prophets Haggai and Zachariah, which had been interrupted for one hundred fifteen years, ever since the second year of the return of Zerubbabel and Jesha, at which time they began to build. But now at that time, and before this, lived Malachias the last of the Prophets, who exhorts not the people to the building of the Temple as the others did, which is an evidence of the finishing of it before; but reprehends those corruptions which * Nehemiah in his second Government had observed amongst the Jews, viz. marriages

marriages with strangers, unjust detention of Tithes, and corruption of Divine worship. And because the succession of Prophets was no more to be expected; in the later end of his Prophecies he exhorts the people to keep the Law of Moses, until such time as the great Prophet the Messias should be revealed, before whom John Baptist was to come, in the spirit and power of Elias. The ending of the Canon of holy Scripture is by Enchirius placed in the thirty second year of Artaxerxes Longimanus. After these Prophets the Hebrews held the men of the great Synagogue to have succeeded; but the latter Jews reckon the three last Prophets amongst them, and Ezra as the President of the Council.

24. Against this Darius the Medes rebelled, but were after some time subdued again into obedience. At this time the States of Greece being plunged deep in the Peloponnesian War, he made his advantage thereof as much as he could, siding with the Lacedemonians against the Athenians, who did him most hurt in Asia, both by their great skill and practice in Navigation, and being allied to the Ionians, whom as their Colonies they helped against him; so that much intercourse, and great transactions passed betwixt Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, and those of Sparta, which are involved in the affairs of Greece. In the seventeenth year of his reign he sent his son Cyrus (born since he came to the Government) down to the Sea-side as Satrapa, or Lieutenant, with a kind of power over the other his Lieutenants there, and Captain General of all the forces which were wont to muster at the plains of Castor: giving him in charge to assist the Lacedemonians in the War against the Athenians, and by his help did they recover to the hopes of their former fortune. When he had continued in his charge a year or two, he grew so high that he killed his two Cousin-Germans, Autobasides and Mitranes, because they came not to him with their hands folded under their Clothes, which Ceremony was once observed in the presence of a King. Their Parents of this complaining highly to his father, and alleging how unjust it was to continue at such practices, he sent for him to come to him, alleging he was not well, lying then incamped in the Country of the Medes, against the Cadusians, bordering thereupon, who had revolted.

25. Leaving the command of the Cities, with all his Treasure, and the assignment of his Tributes to Lyander the Spartan, he went up, taking along with him Tissaphernes as his friend, with three hundred Greeks, under the leading of Xenias the Parthian. His father lived not long after he came to him, whom in his sickness, Parafitis his wife having ruled him all his life, loving Cyrus above her eldest son, urged him to leave him his Successor, as Darius the son of Hystaspes did Xerxes, for that he was born to him being a King, and the other but a private person. But he thinking it not just refused to do it, but left him those Cities over which he had made him Governor, and his Kingdom to Asaces, or Artaxerxes his eldest son, and so died after he had reigned nineteen years, in the fourth of the ninety third Olympiad, the twenty seventh of the Peloponnesian War now ending. A. M. three thousand sixty; four hundred three years before the birth of Christ.

Asaces then, by the pleasure of his father, or his interest in the great ones, obtained the Kingdom, and changed his name into Artaxerxes, being for the excellency of his memory surnamed Mnemon. When he had made sure his possession, his wife Statira thinking it time then to revenge the death of her brother, and the rest of her kindred, caused Udastres, who flew Teristachmes, to have his tongue drawn backwards through his neck, and cut off, and got his son Mitridates, who had delivered the Citie Zares into the hands of Teristachmes his son, to succeed in his Government. Not long after his fathers death Artaxerxes went to Pasargada, there to be initiated by the Persian Priests in the royal mysteries. There was a Temple dedicated to some warlike God-desse, thought to be Diana, whose Temple he that was to be initiated entering must put off his own Clothes, and put upon him a Garment worn by Cyrus the Great, before he came to the Empire; there was he to eat such a quantity of Figs, to drink Milk mingled with Vinegar, and perhaps used some other unknown Ceremonies. Whilst the King was about these things came Tissaphernes unto him, and with him a Certain Priest, who having been appointed the instructor of his brother Cyrus, had taught him the Magical Arts. He accusing him of treasonable practices, had more credit given to him, because Cyrus had resolved to set upon the King in the Temple, and kill him as he should put off his Clothes; some say he was apprehended upon this accusation, others, that he came indeed into the Temple, and being hid by the priest, was discovered and taken. Sect. 3.

26. The King was minded to put him to death, and out of reverence to his Family caused him to be bound in Golden Chains, but their mother took him in her arms, wrapped him in her hair, laid her neck to his, and with great lamentations and intreaties prevailed for his pardon, and sent him back again into his former Province of Lydia, and the Sea-coasts. When he came there, not at all contented with this command, nor so much as remembering that he was saved by his mother's intercession, as that he was taken and bound by his brothers, burned more than ever with a desire of reigning. And to this purpose, as secretly as he could, gathered forces of the Greeks; and under one pretence or other, laid out for foreign aid both far and near, hoping to surprize his brother. The Ionian Cities given up now into the hands of Tissaphernes revolted to him, all except Miletus, the Inhabitants of which he finding to practice the same, killed some, and drove away the rest, who flying to Cyrus, he besieged the City both by Sea and Land, endeavouring to restore them. Then wrote he submissively to his brother, desiring he might have the Government of those Cities rather than Tissaphernes, and herein he was furthered by his Mother, who lying as it were his Lieger at Court, made the best of all things. Hence was Artaxerxes deluded, suspecting nothing, but accounting these forces to be kept together against Tissaphernes, betwixt whom and Cyrus he little regarded though there were a War, and the rather, because Cyrus sent him the Tributes due from the Cities, which Tissaphernes had formerly kept in his hand.

27. Clearchus at this time being banished from Lacedemon, came to Cyrus, who after conference with him admired the man, and gave him ten thousand Daricks, wherewith he levied an Army, and passing out of Cherronesus warred upon the Thracians that inhabited above the Hell-spont, thereby greatly promoting the affairs of the Greek Cities, inasmuch that they willingly furnished him with money to maintain his Forces which were only raised for Cyrus, though thus employed for a cover to the design, and till he could be in a readiness. There was also one Arifippus a Thessalian a guest of Cyrus, who being overpowered by his Country-men of the contrary faction came to him, and requested him to spare him two thousand Mercenaries and three months pay, alleging that thereby he should be able to overcome his adversaries. He granted his request, and doubled both the number of men and sum of money, desiring him withal, not to agree with his adversaries till they two had conference together; and so this Army in Thessalie (though not discovered) was kept on foot and maintained for him. Further he sent to Proxenus the Boeotian; his friend, to bring unto him as many men as he might, under pretence of warring against the Pisidians, who spoiled his Country; and Sophanes the Symphian, with Socrates the Achaean, who likewise were both his Guests, to come to him with as many men as they could make, under colour, together with the banished Milefians, of making War upon Tissaphernes.

28. When he was now resolved to march up into the higher Provinces against his brother, and for that purpose must gather all his Forces together, he gave out, that his purpose was to chase the Pisidians wholly out of the Country, and so, as for that intent, assembled both his Barbarian and Gracian Troops. He commanded Clearchus with the Army held to come unto him, Arifippus to compound with his adversaries, and send him his Forces, and Xenias the Areadian (whom he had appointed General of the Mercenaries that lay in Garrison in the Cities) leaving only so many as should be necessary to keep the Cittadels, gathered those Forces together, and brought them to Sardis, being about four thousand armed Foot. He sent for those that lay before Milefians, and invited the banished men to his service, promising, if his affairs succeeded, not to give over till he had restored them, which they gladly accepted of. Proxenus came with fifteen hundred heavy-armed and five hundred light-armed foot. Sophanes the Symphian brought one thousand armed, Socrates the Achaean about five hundred, Pafion the Megarian three hundred, and as many Palatris or Targetiers.

29. He had before this sent to Lacedemon, desiring of that State, that as he had formerly aided them against the Athenians, to they would not refuse now in his need to do the same for him: boasting in his letters, that if they sent him Foot-men, he would provide for them Horses, if Horse-men, Chariots, if they had before of their own certain pieces of ground, he would give them whole Villages, and he would not count but measure their pay to them. it but just and agreeable enough to their own interest (not considering against whom they engaged) decreed aid to be sent to him, thinking hereby if he overcame, to ingratiate themselves with him; but if Arsaxerxes should get the better, to excuse themselves well enough, as having decreed nothing against him absolutely. The Ephori then presently wrote to their Admiral, to do whatsoever he should command, who accordingly went to Ephesus and joyned himself with Tamos the Byzantine and Admiral to Cyrus, with whom he failed into Cilicia, and there prevailed that Syennesis the Prince of that Country hindered not Cyrus as he passed by Land against his Brother. Tissaphernes conceiving that these preparations were greater than fitted the War against the Pisidians, with a party of five hundred Horse, hastened to the King with all possible speed, who as soon as by him he had the intelligence, made contrary preparations. Cyrus after he had committed the care of Lydia to some Persians of his Kindred, and given the charge of Lydia, Æolis, and the parts adjacent to Tamos of Memphis his faithful friend, he presently set forwards toward Cilicia and Pisidia, it being bruted up and down that some of these people had revolted. From Sardis he marched through Lydia, and after four encampings, came an hundred and twelve miles and an half to Colosse, a great, rich, and well inhabited City, where he stayed seven days, and Menon the Thessalian came to him with a thousand Armed Foot, and five hundred Dolopian, Ænian, and Olynthians Pelatais. From thence he marched in three Encampings seventy five miles and an half to Celene, a great and rich City of Phrygia, where he rested thirty days, and Clearchus the Lacedæmonian came to him with a thousand Armed Foot, and eight hundred Thracian Pelatais, and two hundred Cretian Archers; and Solus the Syracusan brought a thousand Armed Foot, and Sophenatus the Acædian, the same number. Here he also mustred the Greeks, and found them to be eleven thousand Armed, and about two hundred Pelatais or Tartegiers.

30. From Celene he marched, in two Encampings, ten Parasangs, or thirty seven miles and an half, and came to Pelte, where he stayed three days; and thence, in two Encampings, forty five miles, and arrived at the Market of the Ceramanians, a City full of People, and the last in the Country of Mysia: And hence, in three Encampings, he marched thirty Parasangs, an hundred and twelve miles, and reached to the Plain of Cayster, a City well peopled, where he rested his Army five days. Here the Army made much ado for pay, being more than three months behind, which he was enabled to pay them with a month over, by the coming of Epixasia, Wife to Syennesis, King of Cilicia, who brought good store of Treasure with her. From thence, in four Encampings, he proceeded seventy five miles as far as Tyrium, a City full of people, and hence, in three Encampings, seventy five miles, and arrived at Iconium the last City of Phrygia. He stayed here three days, and then marched, in five Encampings, through Lycæonia an hundred and twelve miles, which Country he suffered the Greeks to spoil as Enemy. Now he sent away the Cilician Queen by the nearest way into her own Country, and with her Menon the Thessalian and his Regiment, to make way for his passage into that Country.

31. Cyrus with the rest, marched through Cappadocia twenty five Parasangs, or ninety three miles and an half in four days, and came to Dana a great and wealthy City, where he put to death two Persians for Treason against himself. From hence attempt was made to break into Cilicia, but the Streights were so narrow, that one Chariot could but pass at once, and withal exceeding steep, so that if resistance was made it was impossible, which Syennesis the King was laid to be ready to make at the height of the Streights; and the Army for that reason staid in the Plain. But the next day word was brought that he had quitted the passage, after he perceived Menon's Troops to be got into Cilicia beyond the Mountains, and heard how a Fleet of Lacedæmonian Gallies were with those of Cyrus, under Sail to pass from Ionis thither, under Conduct of Tamos. Then ascended he the Mountain without any opposition, from which descending, in four Encampings, he marched ninety three miles and an half, and came to Tarusus and a great rich City of Cilicia, where was the Palace of Syennesis, and through which runneth Cydanus, a River two hundred foot in breadth.

32. The Inhabitants thereof, except such as bought and sold, fled with their King to the tops of the Mountains, leaving the City to be sacked with the Palace by the Soldiers, enraged for the loss of an hundred of their Companions of Menon's Regiment. Cyrus sent for the King to come to him, who refused it, till overcome by the persuasions of his Wife, and then he gave him great sums of money ney to uphold his Army, and received back such gifts as were accounted most honourable amongst Kings, as an Horse with a golden bit, a Chain of gold, Bracelets, a sword decked with gold, a Persian Garment, and Freedom of his Land from spoil; as also restitution of Slaves taken in spoil by the Soldiers wheresoever they could be found. Here the soldiers now imagining that they were lead against the King flatly refused to go any farther, it being, as they said, no part of their agreement. Clearchus went about to force his men to proceed, but they, as soon as he offered to go forwards, cast stones at him and at his carriage beasts, whereby he was forced to betake himself to a fair and politic way; and to effect it (which with trouble enough he did) Cyrus gave out that he went against Abrocamas an Enemy of his, who laid upon the River Euphrates about twelve encampings from thence, that if he found him there, he would be revenged on him, and if he fled away they should deliberate what to do. Hereupon, though they suspected the matter, yet they resolved to hold on, and upon demanding more pay, he promised them half as much more as formerly they had: viz. a Darick and an half instead of one Darick to every Soldier. All this while no man heard in publick they were led against the King.

33. From Tarusus in five encampings he marched about eighty three miles to Iffos, the last City of Cilicia, well peopled, large, and rich, and situated upon the Sea, where he remained three dayes. Thither out of Peloponnesus came to Cyrus thirty five Lacedæmonian ships, under the command of Pythagoras, together with Tamos, who brought from Ephesus twenty five of Cyrus his ships, wherewith he had besieged Miletus, and Cherisophus the Lacedæmonian whom Cyrus had sent for, and who brought with him seven hundred armed Foot. Whilst the Army lay here, the Græcian Mercenaries that served Abrocamas, viz. four hundred armed Foot revolted and came to Cyrus. From hence in one encamping he came about eighteen miles to the Streights of Cilicia and Syria, defended with a wall on each side, betwixt which ran the River Kerfos a hundred foot broad. The distance betwixt the walls was three furlongs, admitting no passage by force, and the way toward the Sea being narrow and fenced with strong walls, and the upper nothing but inaccessible Rocks, in either wall there being set a gate. This passage Cyrus suspecting to be stopped by Abrocamas, sent for his ships to transport so many men as might force it: but he upon hearing of Cyrus his coming into Cilicia, returned with all speed out Phenicia to the King though reported to have an Army of three hundred thousand men.

34. From the Streights he marched in one encamping eighteen miles, and upwards, and came to Myriandrum a City of Syria, inhabited by the Phenicians, upon the Sea, being a place of traffick, where many ships of burthen then rode in the Haven. Here he remained seven dayes, and Xenias the Acædian Colonel, with Pasfon of Megara shipping themselves sailed homewards, discontented, as was thought, because Cyrus suffered Clearchus to keep their Soldiers, which refusing to go any further against the King, removed into his Camp, with intent to return into Greece. From thence in four encampings he marched seventy five miles to the River Chatos, a hundred foot broad, which was full of great tame Fish, which the Syrians counted gods, and therefore suffered them not to be harmed no more than Pigeons. The Villages where in they encamped belonged to Paristis, being assigned her for her maintenance. Thence in eight encampings he marched a hundred sixty eight miles to the River Euphrates, whose breadth was three furlongs, and upon which was built the great and rich Citie Thapsacus, where the Army remained five dayes.

35. Here it was openly declared to the Greeks that they were led against the King, for which they were very angry with their Officers, who, they said they were sure, knew it before, for not acquainting them sooner with the design; and refused to stir one foot forwarder, except upon promise of as much as their Country-men had, who formerly waited on Cyrus to his father. He promised to give every man five pounds in silver (of the value of fourteen pounds, eleven shillings, eight pence, sterling) as soon as they came to Babylon, and to continue their whole pay, till they should be sent back into Ionis, to which conditions most of them yielded, and Menon prevailing with his Regiment to pass over the River first, whilst the other were yet in consultation, thereby to gain greater favour with Cyrus, all the Army followed, not a man being over above the breasts in wading over, so that this passage seemed to be miraculous, and to portend more good to Cyrus than followed, the River giving way to

Sect. 3. to him, which they of Thaſſus reported never to have been paſſed over on Foot before, but only with ſhipping, which Abrocanus had burnt to hinder him in the paſſage. Thence in nine encampings he marched fifty Paraſangs, or one hundred eighty ſeven miles and upwards through Syria, and came to the River Axax. Here they ſtayed three days, and made proviſion of Viſuals, and then departing thence, marched through the Wilderneſs of Arabia, one hundred thirty miles in five encampings, having Euphrates on the right Hand, and proceeding through this Country came to the River Malca, where they ſtayed three days in making proviſion for the Army; whence in thirteen encampings they marched through the deſert ninety paraſangs, or three hundred thirty ſeven miles and an half, and came to the Straights.

36. Proceeding in their Journey hence, they might diſcover the footings, and dung of Horſes; for a party had been ſent of about two thouſand, which going before the Kings Camp, burnt up the Fodder, and made havock of all things profitable for uſe. Now came Orontes a Persian to Cyrus, whom having fought to betray him in times paſt, and pardoned by him, attempted now to do the like, but was diſcovered, and put to death. Marching ſtill forward they proceeded in three encampings forty five miles through the Country of Babylon. In the third encamping at midnight Cyrus ſet his men in order, thinking his Brother to be near, and would give him battle the next morning. The Gracians were in number ten thouſand four hundred Armed, and two thouſand four hundred Targetiers, the Barbarians with Cyrus were ten Myriads (or one hundred thouſand) beſides about two hundred Sythed Chariots. From hence in order of Battle he marched ſome twelve miles, thinking the King would have fought that day, becauſe at the end of this half days Journey he found a Trench caſt five Fathoms broad, and three deep, running up forty five miles into the Country, as far as the Wall of Media, where the four Channels begin that derived out of the River Tigris, fall into Euphrates. This Trench the King cauſed to be made after he heard that Cyrus was ſturring, who now paſſing it without any diſturbance, he and all his Army were ſtrongly perſwaded that the King determined not to Fight; whence he had not ſo great care of his March the next day, and the third day after he advanced ſitting in his Chariot: the moſt of his Army marched conſulently, many of the Souldiers having their Arms laid upon the Wains, and carriage of Beaſts.

37. Now it was time, the Market was full, and the place of encamping where they ſhould quarter was at hand, when Patagias a Persian, one of the faithfulſt of Cyrus his Train was ſeen to come upon the Spur, his Horſe dropping with Sweat, crying out in the Persian and Greek language that the King was hard by, with an huge Army, ready and prepared for Fight. This news made a great conſuſion, all thinking they ſhould be charged in that diſorder, Cyrus leaping from his Chariot, put on his Curace, and mounting on horſeback, took his Dart in his Hand, and commanded the reſt to arm, and every man to take his place. Clearchus ſtood in the point of the right Wing, by the River Euphrates, Menon and his Regiment held the point of the left, and Cyrus himſelf the midit with fix hundred horſemen armed with great Curaces, and Taſes, and all of them with Caſks, except he alone, who ſtood waiting the Fight with his Head unarmed, according to the cuſtom of Persia. The King had with him ninty Myriads (or nine hundred thouſand) and one hundred fifty Chariots, having on both ſides Sythes prominent, and bearing ſtraight forth from the Axle-trees, and ſome from the former ſeat of the Chariot with their points turned towards the Ground, that they might cut in pieces whatever they met and ſtruck upon: His purpoſe was to ſend them with high ſpeed againſt the Ranks of the Gracians, to break and rent them aſunder.

38. The Kings Army came on an equal and flow pace, in great ſilence, quietneſs, and order, which amazed, and diſcouraged Cyrus, and the Gracians, little expecting any ſuch thing. Cyrus now galloping up to the right Wing, cried out to Clearchus to lead the Gracians againſt the middeſt of the Enemies battle, becauſe the King was there, ſaying that if he were overcome, there would be no more for them to do. Clearchus ſeeing the middeſt of the Battle, and hearing from him that the King, by reaſon of his multitude which ſtretched out the Body, was far without the point of the left Wing of the Gracian Phalang, would not for all that draw away the right wing from the River, fearing to be confronted, and incompaſſed on both ſides: but answered, he would have a care that all things ſhould go well. The word was betrayed before they joyined ſo that they were forced to change it to Support the ſaviour, and victory, after the giving of which the Gracians ſinging the Psalm, and running on with a ſhout, the the Barbarians, before they came within an Arrows ſhot, turned their Horſes and fled, the other following the Chace with all ſpeed, and crying to one another not to haſte too much, but to follow in good order. The Chariots void of Guides were carried, ſome upon the Enemies themſelves, ſome upon the Gracians, who upon a forecaſt opened, and let them paſs through, only ſome were overthrown by fear, who notwithstanding were reported to have had no harm, nor yet any other Gracian in this whole fight, one only excepted, who was ſtruck with an Arrow in the left ſide.

39. Cyrus beholding this fight much rejoiced, and was now worſhipped as King by thoſe about him; notwithstanding he followed not the Chace, but keeping by him his fix hundred Horſe, obſerved what the King would do, who being in the midt of his Phalang, without the point of Cyrus his left Wing, and ſeeing no man to fight againſt him on the contrary part, wound, and turned his Battle to the left hand, to overwing, and encampaſs in his Enemies. Cyrus perceiving it, and fearing, left coming on the backs of the Gracians he ſhould cut them in pieces, galloped forth, and met him in front, and charging with his fix hundred, overcame, and put to flight the fix thouſand that were ordered before him, and with his own Hands (as was reported) flew Ariaxerxes, one of his Generals. His fix hundred purſuing hotly were diſperſed, except a few that were left with him, for the moſt part ſuch as uſually ſat at his Table, with which being accompanied, he helped the King, and the Troup about him, and after he had ſaid I ſee the man, flew out directly againſt him, ſtruck him on the Breaſt, and wounded him through the Curace, as Cteſias of Gnidus the Kings Phyſician related, who reported alſo that he cured the Wound. Whileſt Cyrus thus fought, one with a Dart hit him a fore blow under the Eye.

40. The King and Cyrus with their followers in defence of either of them thus coping together, Cyrus was ſlain by the King, as his flatterers ſaid, as others by a Carian, though Cteſias writeth his death to have hapned after the King had withdrawn himſelf to an Hill, being firſt wounded beſides the Eye, and then diſpatched by a thruſt into his left Leg, by a Caunian of a baſe condition, who with other of his Companions had thruſt himſelf, it being now dark, in amongſt his followers. Here he died in the battle of Cannax a place diſtant from Babylon five hundred Furlongs, or ſixty odd Miles, a man in the opinion of ſuch as had acquaintance with him, of a moſt Kingly diſpoſition, and moſt worthy a Crown of all the Persians that ſucceeded Cyrus the Great. Clearchus before the Fight adviſed him to keep himſelf behind the Army, and not to venture into danger, to whom he replied as one who wiſhed him to carry himſelf unworthy a Kingdom whileſt he fought for one. In the opinion of Plutarch, not ſo much his raſhneſs (though inexcusable) as the lazineſs, not to ſay cowardice, of Clearchus is to be condemned, who having marched ſo many Miles for no other purpoſe than to place him in the Throne, not ſo much endeavoured his ſafety and Conqueſt, as his own eaſe and ſecurity: The event of the Fight ſhewed, that none of thoſe about the King would have endured the leaſt brunt from the Gracians, and that after they had been put to flight, and he with them, or elſe killed in the place, the Victory and Kingdom muſt have remained to Cyrus. But this advantage was loſt by Clearchus, who ſo placed his men that Ariaxerxes could not have deſired a more convenient order, on his part, they being at greateſt diſtance from him and his Army, inſomuch that he neither perceived himſelf overcome by them, and Cyrus was ſooner ſlain than they could reap any fruit of their Victory. This Battle was fought about the beginning of the fourth year of the ninety fifth Olympiads, Epanetus (or Xenetus) being Archon at Athens, in the third ending, or fourth beginning of Ariaxerxes.

41. Ariaxerxes commanded the Head, and right hand of Cyrus to be cut off, and following the Chace, chanced upon his Camp, which they plundered, and took thence his Phoecean Concubine, called the wife and beautiful, whoſe name in her own Country was Mitto, but by Cyrus called Aſpasia, whom the King moſt loved, and kept amongſt his three hundred fixty Concubines. Now were he and the Gracians near four Miles aſunder; the laſt giving Chace to ſuch Enemies as ſtood before them, as if they had been Conquerours of the whole Army; the other rifling the Camp of the Gracians, as if his Army had gained the Victory. After this both parties rallied again for a new engagement, but the Barbarians received not the Gracians, but fled with greater ſpeed than before. Having perſued them ſome way, the Gracians made an Holla, and reſted themſelves, wondering they ſaw not Cyrus, being ignorant what was befallen him.

The Gracians having the better in the battle, are ignorant of Cyrus his death.

Sect. 3.

Then after some consultation what was to be done, they returned to the Camp about Supper time, where they found the most of their Goods rifled, and especially the Meat and Drink, and the four hundred Wains laden with Meal and Wine, which Cyrus had prepared to relieve them, in case the Army should at any time be driven to want. The most of them therefore were supperless, having also wanted their Dinner that day: for that the King came in fight before they could refresh themselves. Thus this day ended, and together with the Story, the first Book of the Ascent of Cyrus commonly ascribed to Xenophon as the Author.

42. The Gracians hearing of Cyrus's death were much troubled, and offered Arius (a Persian, who followed Cyrus, and commanded his left Wing) to place him in the Throne; but he refused it, for that, as he said, there were many Persians in all respects better than he, who would never endure that he should be King. Artaxerxes sent a Message to them to lay down their Arms, and to repair to his Gate, there to submit themselves to his mercy. The Coronels were divided in their opinions concerning it, and gave several answers according to their apprehensions, but Clearchus, for all a doubtful one, viz. that if they might be accounted as his Friends, they should be better Friends having Arms, than delivering them up to any man; if no remedy there was but War, they should better make War with Arms, than without, after they had rendered them up. And whereas he offered them Truce, as long as they abode in the same place, but threatened War if they stirred thence, he replied only, that they would expect accordingly. Then resolved he, after he knew Arius's answer, and how he invited them to march back again into Ionia, for that the Sacrifice killed about marching against the King was not propitious, to join the Army unto his, which accordingly he did, Arius, and the Officers of the Gracians taking an Oath to be Friends, Confederates, and not to betray one another. The League was entered into on this manner: They killed a Boar, a Bull, a Wolf, and a Ram; and the Gracians dipped the point of a Sword, the Barbarians of a Spear in the Blood of these Beasts, being poured out into the hollowness of a Target.

43. The length of the Journey from Ephesus in Ionia to the place of the Battle was ninety three encampings, five hundred thirty five parasangs, sixteen thousand thirty Furlongs, two thousand Miles and above, which though very long, yet resolved they to take another and longer way through Paphlagonia, because the former was destitute of Provisions. Then set they forward that way, marching more slowly for the better gathering of necessaries, and after the King had somewhat recovered of his Wound, he pursued them, and pitched his Tents hard by theirs; but with the noise of them his men were so affrighted, that some of the nearest to them removed their Tents, and on the next day setting their men in order for Battle, he who before had made such large demands, sent and offered them Truce, and covenanted to let them have free passage through his Territories till they came to the Sea, and afforded them Provisions for their money, which was also granted to all the Mercenaries who served under Arius (or Arius's) and Clearchus. Then proceeded the Greeks on their Journey, and the King returned to Babylon, where rewarding those that had best deserved on him in the last Battle, he judged the Service of Tissaphernes to have been most eminent, therefore as a reward (amongst several other noble Gifts) he gave him his own Daughter to wife, and the government of such places as formerly had been under Cyrus, binding him to him thereby so, as he proved ever most faithful to him.

44. Tissaphernes seeing how the King was incensed against the Gracians, promised him to destroy them all, if he were but furnished with Forces to that purpose, and could but withdraw Arius from them, by whom he doubted not but they might easily be betrayed. The King accepting his offer, gave him leave to chuse of the most valiant of his Army as many as he would, with which he followed after, and incamping near to them, sent for Clearchus and the other Coronels to come to him, pretending he had somewhat for their good to say to them. They with the Captains of the several Companies going to him, with two hundred more (who went to buy Victuals) he secured the Coronels called into his Tent, and killed the Captains at the Door with the other two hundred, of which one chanced to escape with the News thereof to the Camp. The Coronels were sent to the King, who put them all to death except Mennon. The Soldiers at first greatly terrified, having now no body left to command or lead them, by the advice of Xenophon made choice of other Leaders, amongst whom Cheristophis was chief, and he himself was one, being elected into the place of

The Soldiers make a new choice, in which Xenophon is one.

Proxenus, who being his ancient Friend and Guest sent for him, and promised him if he would come, to make Cyrus his Friend, who, as he esteemed him, would be more to be prized than his own Country. He communicated the matter to Socrates the Philosopher and his Master, who, for that Cyrus's interest seemed cross to that of the City of Athens, seeming to stand with the Lacedaemonians, advised him to consult the Oracle of Delphos. Thither he went, and enquired how he might best accomplish his Journey, to which was answered, that he must Sacrifice to those Gods to whom he ought to Sacrifice, which he reporting again to Socrates, he blamed him for so propounding his Question, alleging he ought to have asked whether he should travel or no, and nor as one resolved already to do it; but seeing it was so, he must do as he was bidden, and accordingly he followed Cyrus to Sardis, where Proxenus presented him to him.

45. The Gracians marching on towards Paphlagonia, where dogged at the Heels by Tissaphernes, who being afraid of the valour of desperate men, never durst engage in any Battle with them, but only flanked them or fell in upon their Rear, as he could have opportunity, and yet followed them as far as the Borders of the Caraduchians, after which, seeing he could not do them any considerable hurt, he departed with his men towards Ionia another way. The Caraduchians a warlike Nation and at Enmity with the King, and much exercised in slinging of great and massie Stones, much disturbed the Gracians in their passage of their Country, and in the passing the Mountains thereof were spent seven days. With great difficulty and danger having passed it, they went over the River Centritis into Armenia; of which Artabazus being then Governour, entered into league with them, and suffered them quietly to pass; but in travelling thorow the Mountains they were near all being overwhelmed in the Snow, the discerning of ways being taken away thereby. The whole Army had perished also by extrem cold, had they not light upon some Villages near hand, wherein being furnished with plenty of necessaries, they refreshed themselves. The Houses stood within the Ground, into which the men descended by Stairs, and their Cattel by descents made for that purpose. Having here stayed eight days, they journeyed thence to the River Phasis.

46. Having continued four days at this River, they marched through the Country of the Tacchi and Phasiani, by whom being opposed, they fought and made great slaughter of them, and then seized upon their Villages, which were plentifully furnished with such things as they wanted, they there rested fifteen days. Thence marching through the Territories of the Chalcidians, in seven encampings they came to the River Harpessus, and thence coming into the Plains of the Tasutini, they there refreshed themselves three days, and proceeding, in four encampings they arrived at a great City called Gymnasia. The Prince of this Countrey entering into a League with them, furnished them with Guides to the Sea, of which, after fifteen days being got up to the Hill Chenius, they got a fight a far off, at which the Front shouted so for joy, that those in the Rear thinking they had been set upon by some Enemy, prepared themselves for a fight, and there laid they a great heap of Stones as a Monument to Posterity, of the Spoils obtained from the Barbarians, and the immortal memory of their Expedition.

47. Then came they into the Country of the Maeri, with whom they made a League, by taking and receiving a Spear, according to the custom of these Barbarians. Having got over their Mountains they came into the Territories of the Coleri, where a great multitude opposing them, they made no small slaughter of the Inhabitants, and made a great Spoil, where they found a kind of Honey, of which whosoever did eat, became according to the quantity eaten, drunken, mad, or as dead, but the next day at the same hour returned to their right Senses, and after three or four days arose as having received some Medicine. Thence in two encampings they came to Trapezond a Gracian City well inhabited, situate upon the Euxine Sea, being a Colony of the Sinopeans, placed in the Colebian Country. Here Adon with his Companions are reported to have arrived with their Ship Argos. They sacrificed to Hercules and Jupiter, and celebrated Games of Exercise, and hence was Cheristophis sent to Byzantium to provide Ships for the transportation of them home, and for him here they staid thirty days, but after that term he returning not, their Provisions growing scarce, though they had made excursions both by Sea and Land, they put on Ship-board (having obtained a little Shipping of the Trapezuntians) the Sick, all those above forty Years of Age, with the Women and Children, and passed in three dayes to Ceraunt a Græcian City situate upon the Sea, being also a Colony of the Sinopeans in the Colchian Countrey. Here they remained ten dayes, and taking a muster, found eight thousand six hundred remaining of those that ascended with Cyrus into Perſia, the rest being consumed by the Enemies hand, or Snow, or sickness. Here also they divided the money that arose out of the fall of Captives, the tenth part of which the Officers took into their hands, being severd as an offering to be made to Apollo and Diana of Ephesus; every one keeping and preserving a share for his gods.

48. From Ceraunt they came into the Countrey of the Melyneans, the veriest Barbarians they had met with in the whole Journey, which they passed by force in eight encampings, and in three more that of the Tibarens through which they came to Cotyora a Græcian Colony also of the Sinopeans. Thus far the Army marched one foot, the whole length of the retreat from the place of the battel in the Babylonian Territories hither, being a hundred twenty two encampings, six hundred twenty parasangs, ten thousand eight hundred twenty furlongs, one thousand three hundred fifty two miles and something more. At Cotyora they continued fifty dayes, making excursions upon the neighbouring people of Paphlagonia. Then the Heracleans and Synopeans, a Colony of the Milesians in Paphlagonia, furnished them with shipping, into which they put themselves and their baggage, and sailed away, Cherisophus meeting them with a few Vessels. Holding on their course they sailed by Fajon's shore, where the Ship Argo is said to have anchored, and by the mouths of the Rivers Thermodon, Halys, and Parthenius, by which after they had passed, they arrived at Heraclea a Græcian City and Colony of the Magareans, situate in the Territory of the Maryandens, and came to anchor near the Cherronefus or Peninsula of Acherousia, where Hercules is said to have fetcht the Dog Cerberus out of Hell; the marks being there shewn of his decent, and the depth of the place, being more than two furlongs.

Heraclea.

49. Here the Souldiers, through the perswasion of Lycon an Achaian, making unreasonable demands of money from the Heracleans, they shut their gates upon them, and provided for their own defence, which bred a sedition in the Army, so that they parted alunder. The Arcadians and Achaens being more than four thousand five hundred all heavy armed, sailed away first, having got shipping of the Heracleans, that falling suddainly upon the Bithyrians, they might prevent the rest, and make the greatest prey. Cherisophus a little before chosen General, having one thousand three hundred armed, and seven hundred Peltaists, (who were the Thracians that followed Clearchus) marched on foot from Heraclea, and as soon as he entred Thrace, led along by the Seacoast being now sick, and presently dead of a Medicine he took in an Ague. Xenophon with one thousand seven hundred Armed, three hundred Peltaists, and forty Horse, taking shipping, landed in the confines of Thrace, and marched through the midst of the Land. With great difficulty passed they through the Countrey on foot, the Thracians of Asia and Bithyrians, grievously afflicting them, till meeting together again, they resolved no more to part, and decreed it should be death for any one to move such a thing. Then came they safe, though with great difficulty, to Chrysopolis a City in Chalcedonia, whence without much trouble home returned home, others were employed by Seuthes the King of Thrace; and after that Thymbro joyning them to the rest of the Græcian Forces, made War with them against Tissaphernes.

The Carduchians, Chalybes, Chaldeans, Macrons, Cholcans, Mosmanns, Coi, and Tibarens, were free people, and under no man's subjection. Paphlagonia, was ruled by Corylus, the Bithyrians by Pharnabazus, the Europæan Thracians by Seuthes. The total number of the Ascent and Descent, was two hundred twelve encampings, one thousand one hundred fifty parasangs, thirty four thousand two hundred fifty five furlongs, four thousand two hundred eighty one miles and more. The time of the Ascent and Descent one year and three months. Thus these Strangers waiting all things, ignorant of the Countries through which they passed, over precipitous Mountains, straight and (almost) impassable wayes, notwithstanding the malice of Enemies, sharpness of air, and difficulty of the Soil, by the wonderful Providence of God, and singular prudence of Xenophon, returned home into Greece, as we have it described by Xenophon himself, though the seven Books of this Expedition, notwithstanding the constant opinion of Antiquity, are adjudged by a late Learned Man (by reason of the disagreement of their manner of writing from his other works) from him, and are ascribed to Themistogenes the Syracusan, whom* elsewhere he mentioneth to have related these matters. However this Service performed to Cyrus cost him the loss of his Countrey, being for that banished by the Athenians his Countrymen; but the Lacedæmonians taking pity of him, gave him some Lands in the Countrey of Elis and the Territories of Triphylia, whence we may very well fetch an account of his writing that elegant Treatise of the form of their Commonwealth.

51. In this mean time whilst the Græcians were on their way homewards, Parysatis the Queen-mother of Perſia greatly lamented the death of her Son Cyrus, and meditated nothing but revenge upon such as had been instruments in his death, whom one way or other getting into her Hands, she killed with most exquisite Torments. The Carian, who vaunted he, and no other, had killed him, being designed by Artaxerxes to be beheaded, because he robbed him of the glory of so valiant an action, the begged of the King, that he might have the punishing him, and so delivered him to those, who for ten days tormented him; then digged out his Eyes, and lastly made an end of him by pouring melted Brass into his Ears. Mithridates guilty of the same Crime of Boasting, and thereby greatly incensing the King, who would have had all men to believe that he alone in a single Duel had slain his Brother, was condemned to be put to death after an odd kind of Punishment full of Cruelty, then in use in Perſia. The Malefactor was laid on his Back between two hollow things, in form like to Boats, so fitted together that his Head, Hands, and Feet might lye out, and the rest of the Body be contained within. Being thus made fast Meats were given to him, and if he would not receive it, he was forced to eat by pricking of his Eyes; and when he did eat, instead of Drink, Honey and Milk mixed together were poured into him, being so placed as ever to have his Eyes against the Sun. Hereby it came to pass, that his Face would be wholly covered with Flies; and doing that within the Engine, which a man needs must who keepeth constantly eating and drinking; from the putrefaction of the Excrements were Maggots and Worms bred, which creeping up into the Entrails fed upon the Body, so that the miserable man being dead, and the upper part of the Engine removed, they might see the Flesh devoured, and Swarms of Filth sticking on the Carcase: After this manner was Mithridates by degrees extinct, after seventeen days.

52. Parysatis after this, having won from Artaxerxes her Son at Dice, the Eunuch Megastes, who had cut off the Head and Hands of Cyrus, caused him to be dead alive. Her study then was how to rid herself of Statira her Daughter-in-law, whom she never cared for, now hated Mortally, and emulated her by reason of her hatred against Cyrus, and her Power with the King her Husband, so as she resolved in the procurement of her destruction to hazard her own safety. Being now in an appearance reconciled, and all old things forgotten, so as they met and Supped together, she thence took occasion secretly to work her death. There was a Bird in Perſia, called Rhynchætes, in which being nothing superfluous or of excrement, all the inward parts were filled with Fat. This, as Ctesias wrote, she cut it in two with a Knife, whereof the one side was only poysoned, and then taking the clear half to her self, she gave the other which the Poyson had toucht unto Statira, who suspecting nothing, for that she see her ear her self of the Bird before her, did eat it up, and died after great Convulsions and Torment. She suspected her before her death, and possessed the King with the matter, who knew sufficiently the cruel, and implacable disposition of his Mother. He presently with Tortures examined her nearest Servants, but she kept Gygis a woman who had been accessary to the Fact, and would not give her up to him, till at length having notice that she should go out of the House by night, he surprized, and condemned her to dy the Death due to Poysoners by the Perſian Law, which was, that the Head of the Malefactor being laid on a great Stone, with another it was broken and flatted. As for his Mother he hurt her not at all, either by word or deed, but the desiring to go to Babylon, he sent her, adding only this, that he would not see that City so long as she lived. This was the state of the Domestick affairs of Artaxerxes.

fore pressed him to; but sent to Dercyllides, desiring to come to interview. After Hostages given and received on both sides, they met, and an accommodation was made on these terms: That the King should leave all the Greek Cities to their own liberty, that the Greekish Forces should all depart out of his dominions, with all Lacedæmonian Governours from his Cities, and that a truce should be for so long a time, till both parties could hear from their Superiours, concerning their resolutions herein. Then marched away the Armies to their quarters, the Persian to Tralles, and that of the Greeks to Lexocophrys.

59. Notwithstanding this truce entered into by these Captains, yet the rigging of a new Fleet went forwards in Phœnicia, and nothing do we hear concerning the confirmation of the Treaty by the King. It hapning that one Herodas a Syracusan, living with a Sea-man in Phœnicia, and taking notice how great diligence was used in preparing a Fleet, which he heard should be completed to the number of three hundred Vessels, he took the first opportunity of a ship and sailed into Greece, giving notice that such a Navy was providing by the King, and Tissaphernes, though he knew not, as he said, upon what design. The Lacedæmonians hereat startled, began to look about them, when Agefilas one of their Kings, through the persuasion of Zylander, offered himself to undertake an Expedition into Asia against the Persians, provided they would send with him thirty of his choosings, by whose advice he might manage affairs; give him two thousand men from home, and six thousand more of the associates, which being granted him, together with provisions for half a year, he sailed with Zylander (who had procured himself to be one of the three hundred, hoping by this means to reftore the Decemvirates in the Asian Cities, which he having erected, the Ephori had again dissolved) unto Ephesus with such speed, that he landed his Forces before the Persian Lieutenants knew so much of his coming, and thereby took them at unawares.

60. At Ephesus he raised new Forces to the number of four thousand, and increased his Army to ten thousand Foot and four hundred Horse, with which he took the field, a great company of rascally men, not inferior in number to the other, following the Camp out of greediness for prey. Tissaphernes sent to him to know the cause of his coming into Asia, to whom he answered, that it was to reftore the Greek Cities to their liberty; to which the other replied, desiring a cessation of Arms for so long a time, as he could send to the King, hoping to obtain from him that which he required. Agefilas gave little credit to his bare word, thinking, as indeed it was, that he protracted only the time; but swearing most solemnly, that without any deceit he would do what in him lay to procure a Peace, he also upon this condition swore to hold the Truce; but Tissaphernes having little regard of his oath, sent only to the King for new forces to join with his old ones, which though Agefilas sufficiently knew, yet kept he his Faith inviolable in preservation of the Truce; and when he denounced war against him, except he would forthwith quit Asia, he gave notice thereof joyfully to his Souldiers, and sent to the Ionians, Æoliens, and the Greeks living upon the Hælls-point, to dispatch their supplies unto Ephesus. Contrary then to the expectation of Tissaphernes (who thought he would have made for Caria) he invaded Phrygia, where setting upon the Cities at unawares, he got much booty, and without any loss came to the confines of Daschylum, where his Forlorn-hope meeting with a Party of Horse belonging to Pharnabazus, were worsted, losing twelve Men, and two Horses, till he with the Infantry coming in to their relief, the Barbarians retired with the loss of one Man, and Agefilas spending the greatest part of Summer in wafting Phrygia, marched back with his Army mightily enriched, and came back in Autumn unto Ephesus, where he took up his Winter quarters.

61. Whilst the Lacedæmonians thus acted in Asia against Artaxerxes, that Diodorus ad Ægypt, which now for a good space had revolted from the Persian Empire, to procure him to join with them in the War, who sent them one hundred Gallies, and five hundred thousand measures of Wheat for a supplie. Phorax then with a Navie consisting of a hundred twenty Sail departing from Rhodes, sailed to Cænus, where he fell upon Conon, who there had forty Ships lying at anchor, but Artaxerxes and Pharnabazus coming in to the relief of the Ships and Place with great Forces, he retired back to Rhodes, the Inhabitants of which not long after expelled his Fleet, and revolting to the Persians received Conon and his Navy. It hapned after this revolt, that those that brought the Corn from

Ægypt being ignorant of what had happened, thrust their ships into the Haven, which Conon and the Rhodiens seizing upon, hereby well furnished the City. Afterwards came in to Conon ninety Gallies more: Ten from Cilicia, and the rest out of Phœnicia, of which the petty King of Sidon had the charge. And here the souldiers of Conon mutinied for want of pay, who therefore more earnestly called for their Arrears, because their service was the stricter under so great a Captain.

62. Agefilas knowing that without Horse he could not well carry on the War, in Champain places, in the Winter-time took order about it, permitting such rich men in the City as would not fight themselves, to furnish him with each of them an Horse and a Man in their stead. Then upon the approach of the Spring, drawing together all his Forces to Ephesus, he trained and exercised them in the management of Arms, that City serving them as the Shop of War, during these Exercises. When he had thus prepared their minds, and encouraged them by rewards, and otherwise, he gave out he would march straight into the most fortified places of the Enemies Country, further to exercise them for the Fight. Tissaphernes thinking this rumor to be spread on purpose to deceive them, again marched into Caria, whither he thought indeed he meant to go; but Agefilas, as he said, invaded the Territories about Sardis, which wafting round about, on the fourth day his men stragling about for plunder, were set upon by the Enemies Horse, which slew many of them. He going in to their relief, understanding that he made something of it, so that falling on in good earnest, he got a considerable Victory near the River Paisolos, and plundering the enemies Camp, from what belonged to friend and foe, got booty worth above seventy talents, amongst which was Camels which he carried with him into Greece.

63. Tissaphernes at the time of this engagement (if we may believe Xenophon, who accompanied Agefilas in this Expedition, rather than Diodorus or Pausanias) was at Sardis, and upon that account was accused by the Persians to have forsaken and betrayed them. About this time it happened that Conon the Admiral of the Persian Fleet, having to no purpose for a long time solicited the King by letters, for money to pay his men, resolved now himself to go to him, Pharnabazus egging him on that he might accuse Tissaphernes of treachery. Leaving then his Fleet to the care of two Athenians, he came to Tasfasus in Syria, and passing down Euphrates unto Babylon, made supplication to Tithraustes, to whom he signified that he would speak with the King. But none being to be admitted to his presence, except he adored him, he transacted his business by Letters and Messengers, and prevailed to have Tissaphernes adjudged an Enemy, the Lacedæmonians to be prosecuted with War, and to chuse whom he pleased for the paying of Moneys; and with great Gifts returned he to the Sea, having Commiſſion to charge the Phœnicians, Cyprians, and other maritime Inhabitants, with long Ships, and having Pharnabazus for his Associate, according to his desire, to provide a Navie for the defence of the Seas against the next Summer.

64. The accusations of Tissaphernes were so prosecuted by Paryſatis who bore him mortal Hatred in the behalf of her Son Cyrus, that Artaxerxes made Tithraustes Captain General of the War in his stead, enjoying him to make him away, and granting Letters to all the Cities and Lieutenants to be obedient to him. He gave him two Letters at parting, whereof the one was written to Tissaphernes, being a pretended Commiſſion to him to have full and absolute Power in the War: the other to Arius Lieutenant of Larissa, commanding him to assist Tithraustes in the apprehending of him. He delivered the Letter as soon as he came to Colosse in Phrygia, whither Arius procured Tissaphernes to come, as to advise together about the War, and as he was in the Bath having laid by his Scimitar, caused his Servants to take him, and sent him to Tithraustes, who carrying him as far as Celæna cut off his head, which he conveyed to the King: He sent it to his Mother, who greatly rejoiced at the sight, with her also the Græcian women who had lost their sons or husbands through his fraud; and the whole Nation in the death of their mortal Enemy.

65. Tithraustes now sent to Agefilas to acquaint how the incendiary betwixt the King and the Græcians was deservedly punished, so that his Matter thought it reasonable that he would withdraw his Forces out of Asia, and the Greek Cities being left to their own laws, should pay their accustomed tribute to him. He denied to do any thing herein without consent of the Lacedæmonian

State,

Se<sup>c</sup>t. 3. State, whereupon they agreed that Tisbrautes paying him thirty talents for the maintenance of his Army, he should depart into the parts subject to Pharnabazus, till such time as he understood the will of his Superiors. Then led he towards Phrygia, when in the way he met with an Order come from Lacedæmon, whereby not only the power at Land, but over the Navy also was given unto him, over which he might make Admiral whomsoever he pleased. He then to gratify the Cities and those who at home studied to pleasure him, made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty Ships, over which he set Pisander his Wives Brother, a man indeed greedy of honour, and of prompt boldness, but of little experience in such great concerns.

66. Tisbrautes taking notice hereof, and how Agæflaus did not intend to quit Asia, but rather conceived great hopes of overthrowing the King, resolved there was no way to be taken but to find his Countrymen such work at home, that they must necessarily recall him. To this purpose he sent one Timocrates a Rhodian into Greece, with Gold to the value of fifty Talents, to the intent that he might therewith corrupt the leading and principal Men of the several Cities, and engage them into a War with the Athenians against Lacedæmon, which was accordingly brought about. Agæflaus in the mean time entering Phrygia, which was subject to Pharnabazus, about Aurum, spoiled the Country, and by fair or foul means took many Cities. Thence marched he into Paphlagonia, which he withdrew from the Obedience of the Persian, and received one thousand Horse and two thousand Foot from Corys the King, and after this he went to Dasylium, where Pharnabazus his Palace was, and there, it being a place plentiful of Provisions, he took up his Winter-quarters.

67. Whilst his Soldiers straggled abroad for Booty in great contempt of the Barbarians, Pharnabazus light on a party of Horse, and therefore slew one hundred. Three or four days after Herippidas (the principal of thirty Counsellors who accompanied Agæflaus) having notice from Spithridates, that Pharnabazus lay incamped in a large Village named Cave, twenty Miles off, procured of Agæflaus four thousand Foot and as many Horse-men as he could persuade to accompany him, with which beginning his march as soon as it was dark, by break of Day he fell in upon the Enemies Camp, killing most of the Myrians who kept the Watch before it. Then the Persians fled, Pharnabazus fearing to be besieged, so that he wandered from place to place like the Scythian Nomades, and Herippidas got much rich Plunder, amongst which the costly Stuff of Pharnabazus, but seeking out too austere all the concealed Prey, he took from Spithridates and the Paphlagonians all they had gotten; with which disgrace being exceedingly affected, they went away by Night to Arius lying at Sardis, who had formerly rebelled and waged War with Cyrus against the King. At this departure of Spithridates and Megabates his Son (who was most dear to him) Agæflaus was so troubled, as also at that of the Paphlagonian Forces, that nothing more vexed him of all things that fell out in this Asiatick Expedition.

68. Afterwards Agæflaus and Pharnabazus met together to treat about a Peace by the procurement of Apollonides of Cyzicus, who was guest unto them both. Pharnabazus professed that if he were not made General of the War he would revolt from the King; but if he should be, he would carry it on against the other with all his might, and to his utmost ability. Agæflaus on the other side promised he would speedily depart out of his Territories, and as long as any other remained to make War upon, would spare him and his Estate. Upon the approaching of Spring, he led down his Forces into the Plains of Thebes, where pitching his Tents near the Temple of Diana Aethyria, he levied all the Forces he could; for he intended an Expedition into the upper Countries, being confident to turn all in his passage from their Obedience to the King, his Fame being spread abroad far and near, having spent now two Years in the War. But the Gold sent into Greece the last year by Tisbrautes, had by this time wrought upon the Humours of the several States there, that they conspired together in a great and dangerous War against the Lacedæmonians, who thereupon sent to Agæflaus, setting him a Day by which he must needs be at home with his Army for the preservation of his Country. It troubled him much to leave Asia, for the Conquest of which he was in so fair a way, yet he resolved to obey the call of his distressed Country, seeing as he himself expressed in his answer to the Ephori a General then truly and justly commandeth, when he obeyeth the Laws, and the Ephori or whatsoever Magistrates else are in the City.

Agæflaus called home through the device of Tisbrautes.

At his departure he is reported to have said, that the King expelled him Asia by thirty thousand Archers, wittily intimating the same number of Dariaks stamped with the Images of an Archer, whereby he had procured the conspiracy of the Grecian Cities against Lacedæmon.

69. Having passed the Helleppole, and being come to Amphipolis, he received news of a Victory obtained by the Lacedæmonians about Corinth, whereupon he dispatched Dercyllidas presently back into Asia, by these tidings to confirm the associated Cities. In the mean time while he marched through Macedonia and Thessalia towards the Straights of Thermopylae, Conon the Athenian and Pharnabazus, Admirals of the Persian Fleet, lay about Doryme a place in the Cherfoneus, with about ninety Gallies, who having notice that the Enemies Fleet were about Gnidus, prepared themselves for an engagement. Periarchus (or Periander) the Lacedæmonian Admiral weying Anchor sailed from Gnidus with one hundred twenty Ships to Physus another place in the Cherfoneus, and thence directed his Course straight against the Kings Fleet, and at the first had the better of it, but the Persian Gallies coming in a pace to the relief of their Friends, the Lacedæmonian confederates began to shift for themselves. The Admiral thought it unseemly and unworthy of the Spartan valour to run away, and therefore directed his Ship to the front of the Enemy, where first killing many of his Enemies, at length he was slain. Then the followers of Conon pursuing the Lacedæmonians to the Continent, took fifty Vessels, and five hundred Men, the most part swimming to shore and saving themselves; and the rest of the Gallies with safety recovered Gnidus. By this Victory of Conon (who made use of the Kings Forces for the recovery of the Estate of his own Country) Athens and all Greece which heretofore were under the Lacedæmonian Yoke, again recovered their liberty. Diodorus placeth it in the second year of the ninety sixth Olympiad, when Diophantus was Archon at Athens; but Lycias in the year following, being under the government of Eubulides, and the eleventh of Araxerxes.

70. Pharnabazus and Conon for the improvement of this Victory, laboured with the Islands and Maritime Towns of Ionis, to revolt from the Lacedæmonians, which they effected, some casting out the Garrison, and maintaining themselves in their ancient liberty, others yielding unto Conon, only Dercyllidas lying at Abdus at the time of the Fight, retained that place, and Sestos over against it, still in hostility against the Persians, though endeavoured also to be reduced. In the next Spring the two Persian Generals invaded the Maritime parts of Lacedonia, which after they had waited as they might, and now were about to return, Conon perfwaded the other to let him have the Navy, with which he said he would sail to Athens, and there build up again the long Walls, and the Piræus or Haven, than which he affirmed nothing could happen more disagreeable to the Lacedæmonians. This he easily obtained, and Money also to rebuild the Walls, for which failing thither with eighty Gallies he took order; giving those fifty Talents which he had received of Pharnabazus unto the Athenians.

The Lacedæmonians having notice of this, being very fearful, the Athenian State should again recover its ancient power, sent away Antalcidas to Seribus another of the Persian Lieutenants who governed Sardis, if possible to draw him to their Party, and reconcile them to the King. After this was known at Athens, they also sent Conon and others to him, and with them joynted several other States, as the Bæotians, Corinthians, and Argives who were weary of the Power of the Spartans. Antalcidas declared how those that sent him were ready to embrace a Peace upon such terms as the King pleased, for that they would no longer contend with him about the Greek Cities in Asia, thinking it sufficient, that the rest which were elsewhere situated might be left to their own Laws and liberty: he also laboured earnestly to render Conon suspected to the King, alleging, that at the King's cost he only promoted the Affairs of his own Country, seeking with his Forces to obtain as many Cities as he could for the Athenians, to whom under-hand he went about to restore Ionis and Eolia also. Thus, after concerning the leaving of the Greek Cities to the King's disposal, so nearly concerned his affairs, that the other Ambassadors in no case admitting it, for private respects returned home, without any thing concluded of; and though Seribus durst not without Commission joyn himself to the Lacedæmonians, yet gave he privately Monies to Antalcidas to enable them to build a Fleet, whereby he might restrain their adversaries to submit to accommodation, and laying hold of Conon committed him to custody, till such time as going himself to the King he might know his pleasure concerning these things.

71. Some have reported how Conon was carried to the King, and by him put to Death, but others that he made an escape. Whilst Teribazus was yet with the King, he sent Struthas into Asia the less, to take care of the Sea-Coasts, who shewing himself very bitter against the Lacedæmonians for the Evils which the Provinces had suffered of Agesilaus, and favourable upon that account to the Athenians, the Spartans sent over Thymbro to make War upon him. He with eight thousand men took Coreffus the high Hill some five miles distant from Ephefus, whence he made excursions into the King's Dominions; but Struthas lying not far from him with a great Power of Horse, besides Foot, at such time as with a Party he was ranging about for Booty, fell upon him, killed him amongst many others, and putting the rest to Flight, took many; the other securing themselves where they might best do it. The year after the Lacedæmonians sending Ecdæmus to the aid of the Exiles of Rhodes with eight Ships, dispatched away with him one Diphridas, with order to pass into Asia, there to gather up the remnant of the Forces, with which, and as many more as he could raise, he was to protect those Cities which had received Thymbro, and to grapple with Struthas. He acted accordingly, and so ordered his Affairs, that he proved hard enough for Struthas, and amongst other commendable actions took Prisoner Tigranes his Son in Law, as he was going with his Wife to Sardis, whom releasing for a great Ranfom, he seasonably made use of for the payment of his Soldiers.

72. Whilst these things passed betwixt Artaxerxes and the Commonwealth of Sparta, he was also employed about the affairs of Cyprus which he strove to get into his Hands. There was in that Island one Evagoras of great Birth (being descended from those who first built Salamine the Principal City therein) who being lately expelled through a Sedition, returned with a little Force of Auxiliaries, and expelling Ademon the Tyrian, who then had the Power over the City, and a great Friend of the King of Persia, made himself King of Salamine, and within a short time growing very Rich, gathered Forces, and by the help of his Son Protagoras subdued almost the whole Island. But the Amazonsians with the Solians and Citians stood out against him, and by their Ambassadors solicited Artaxerxes for Aid, accusing Evagoras for the death of Agesis, who had been Confederatè with the King, and offering him their help for the possessing himself of the whole Island. He being jealous of the growth of Evagoras, and considering how convenient this Island might be, by reason of its situation, for the promoting of his Affairs at Sea, by which especially Asia could be defended, resolved to assist them, and dismissing the Ambassadors to their content, gave order to the Cities upon the Sea-Coasts to build Ships with all speed, he himself travelling into the upper Provinces for the raising of a great Land Army.

73. Till he had composed matters with the Græcians, no considerable thing could he attempt upon Cyprus, and though they favoured the cause of Evagoras in opposition to him, yet their enmity one against another hindered that effect which their Union might have produced; to the great impairment of his Affairs. The Athenians sent ten Ships to the aid of Evagoras; but it happening that Tevetius being sent by the Lacedæmonians at that time to succed Ecdæmus in the Fleet, and to defend their Interest in Asia, met with them, and intercepted them all, whereby it happened that those who were Enemies to Artaxerxes overthrew those who went to make War against him. After this these two Commonwealths contending fore with each other at Sea to their mutual damage, at length Antalcidas was sent by the Lacedæmonians to the Government of the Fleet, because they knew him to be in great Grace with Teribazus. He coming to Ephefus, left Nicæolus his Lieutenant, and according to his private instructions went with Teribazus to Artaxerxes about a Peace, towards whom he so behaved himself (to please him casting off the Spartan Gravity, and not refusing to dance before him) that the King, who before could not endure the Spartans, as counting them the most impudent of all men, embraced him with singular Respect and Courtesy.

74. He concluded a Peace with him for the Lacedæmonian State, in case the other Græcians would not consent to such overtures as the King made, and returned with Teribazus, who giving notice that all who could might accept of the Conditions which his Master proposed, they dispatched their several Deputies to him. He shewing them the King's Seals, opened the Letters wherein was contained, that Artaxerxes the King accounted it meet that the Cities in Asia, and Islands

Islands Clazomenæ (since joyned to the Continent) and Cyprus, should be under his Dominion: as for the other Greek Cities, both great and small, that they should be left to their own Liberty; except Lemnus, Imbrus, and Scyros, which having been subject to the Athenians time out of mind, he thought it reasonable they should so continue. Those that should not receive this Peace, he with the rest who would embrace it, would prosecute with War to his utmost Power, both at Sea and Land. The Ambassadors went home, and made report of what was proposed to the several Commonwealths, who grudging it much that the Cities of Asia, for whose Liberty Agesilaus had taken so much Pains, should be so unworthily again betrayed. But being necessitated to submit, they accepted of the Conditions; and the Peace was sworn to at length by all Greece, in the second Year of the ninety sixth Olympiad, and the eighteenth Year of Artaxerxes. A. M. 3618.

75. Artaxerxes being thus freed from this tedious Controversie with the Græcians, set himself to a preparation for the Wars of Cyprus, from which as yet he had been diverted. Evagoras by this time, through the assistance of Chabrias, whom the Athenians had lent to his aid with eight hundred Pelasts, and ten Gallies, had brought under the whole Island, having got together also a most numerous Army, whilst the King was kept in play by the Græcians. For he entered into Society with Acoris King of Egypt, who furnished him with great store of Money, and Hecatomus the Viceroy of Caria underhand supplied him with some for the hiring of foreign Souldiers; and the King of Arabia with others, who bore no good Will to Artaxerxes, sent a great Power of Men. He had in a readiness ninety Gallies, whereof twenty lay at Tyre in Phœnicia, which with other Cities he had got into his Hands, and the rest anchored readily furnished before Cyprus. The King gathered together both his Land and Sea Forces, the former consisting of three hundred thousand men, and the latter of three hundred Gallies. Over his Land Army he appointed General Orontes his Son-in-law, and Teribazus Admiral of his Navy, who taking up their Forces out of Phœcia and Cuma, marched down into Cilicia, whence passing over into Cyprus with great Industry they began the War.

76. Evagoras having six thousand Men of his own, many more Auxiliaries, and having hired a great Force of Strangers over and above, (Money being very plentiful with him) first with his Pinnaces well Armed set upon the Enemies Ships as they brought in Provisions, whereof some he took, others he sunk, or chased away. Hereby it came to pass, that no Commodities being imported into the Island, a great Dearth ensued in the Persian Camp; and hereby a Mutiny of the Souldiers, especially of the Mercenaries, who fell upon their Officers, and killed some of them. This put Glaus the Admiral upon a resolution to sail with the whole Fleet into Cilicia, whence he brought sufficient supply, which Evagoras seeing, and considering his Navy to be far inferior to the Persian, he got ready other sixty Ships, and procuring fifty more from Acoris (who readily furnished him with all things necessary for the War) he made up his Fleet two hundred Sayl. Then exercised he his Men often to prepare them for a Fight, and that to the terror of the Enemy who beheld it, and at length as the Persian Fleet layd by Citium he fell upon it, taking some Vessels, and sinking others, but the Admiral and other Commanders standing close to their Tackling, a sharp Conflict ensued, in which though Evagoras at the first prevailed, yet Glaus with all his Power, and with great earnestness and Valour grappling with him, he was at length after great Loss put to flight.

77. The Persians after this Victory mustered all their Forces, both by Sea and Land at Citium, and presently both ways laid Siege to Salamine. Now Evagoras, though he had had the better of it formerly in some Sallies out upon the besiegers, cooled in his Courage after this Defeat. Though the Siege was very straight and pressing, yet resolving to continue the War, he left his Son Pythagoras for the defence of the City, with full Authority, and departed by Night with ten Gallies into Egypt, where he laboured hard with Acoris the King, to persuade him to carry on the War with him, and that with all his Power. He granted him some Money; but for that he was discouraged by the late Defeat, nothing according to his Expectation, so that returning, and finding the City very much straitened and himself destitute of Succour, he was forced to send about an accommodation: Teribazus offered his consent upon these Terms, that quitting all the Cities except Salamine, he should for that pay a yearly Tribute to the King, and be at his Command as a Servant to his Lord; which though hard, he consented ted to, except the last, thinking it a great Disgrace to be at his back as a Servant, and more reasonable to be subject to him as one King to another.

78. Teribazus not admitting of this Exception, Orontes his Colleague, and emulor, accused him by secret Letters to the King, as well for other matters, as that having an opportunity sufficient to take Salamine, he did not use it, but spent his time in Treaties with the Enemy; he farther laid to his charge privately entering into Friendship with Lacedæmon sending to consult the Oracle about warring against the King, and especially alluring the Officers by Honours, Gifts, and Promises. Artaxerxes believing these things, wrote back to Orontes to arrest Teribazus, and send him presently unto him, who accordingly sent, earnestly desired to be brought to his Tryal, but being for the present committed to Prison, and the King employed in the Cadusian War, his Judgment was still delayed. In the mean time Orontes being now General with full Power and Authority in Cyprus, finding that Evagoras with great Courage still held out, and that his own Souldiers taking ill the Imprisonment of Teribazus refused to obey him, sent to Evagoras to treat of Peace, offering him the same Conditions he was formerly willing to admit of from Teribazus. He being thus delivered beyond Hope, concluded a Peace on these Terms, to pay a yearly Tribute for the Kingdom of Salamine, and as King, to be obedient to the King of Persia. And thus the Cyprian War ended ten Years after the first preparation for it, and after it had been managed two Years. Artaxerxes after all this time, and the expence of fifty Talents, leaving Evagoras in effect, in the same Condition he was before.

79. Gaus the Persian Admiral, after this War, having married the Daughter of Teribazus, fearing, left because of his Affinity, he should be suspected also by the King, and suffer upon that Account, resolved for a prevention to fortifie himself against him, by entering into League with his Enemies. This he did presently with Acoris of Egypt, and wrote to the Lacedæmonians to excite them to break the Peace, making large offers of what he could do for Greece. They had of late as before cast in their Heads how to make themselves Master of all Greece, and finding that they heard ill for the Peace concluded with Artaxerxes, in which the Interests of their Country-men were betrayed, they sought for, upon a new advice, a fit opportunity to renew the War against the Persians, and therefore now not unwillingly accepted of this Confederacy with Gaus.

ARTAXERXES in-vadeth the Cadusians to no
purpose.

80. At this time Artaxerxes made War upon the Cadusians, leading against them an Army of three hundred thousand Foot, and ten thousand Horse. He cast himself into great Straights marching into a Country uneven, rainy, and bringing no Corn, but nourishing only its Inhabitants with Pears, Apples, and such like Fruits; so that finding there no Provision, and not able to come by it from elsewhere, the carriage Beasts were killed for Meat, an Asses Head could scarce be bought for sixty Drachms, the Kings fed Meals were laid down, and very few Horses remained; the rest being all eaten up. Then Teribazus under disgrace saved the King and his whole Army; for there being two Kings of the Cadusians, he himself went to one of them, and sent his Son to the other, each of them signifying to him whom he went to, that his Colleague had sent about a Peace to Artaxerxes, having left him out, wherefore his advice was, that they should send with him Ambassadors to treat, and conclude a pacification first, which, being both deceived, they did, and a League was entered into by both apart. Then returned he homewards, and in the way, to give a good example to others, alighted from his Horse, and with Quiver and Target upon him travelled on Foot over the Mountains, and rough places, and coming at length to a place called the Kings Inn, compassed with pleasant Gardens and Groves, because of the extremity of Cold, he gave leave to the Souldiers to cut down the Cypresses and other Trees, which because they out of modesty refused, he took an Axe, and himself cut down the most beautiful. But coming home, and upon fence of his great loss, both of Men and Horses, suspecting he was contemned for his ill Success, he slew many of his principal Subjects, of whom he thought he had cause to be jealous.

81. The Cadusian War being finished, he caused Teribazus to come to his Tryal, commending the matter to three of his most eminent Judges, who upon consideration of what was alleged, pro and con, and of his former great Merits, absolved him, to the satisfaction of the King, who then bestowed on him the greatest Honours, expunged the name of Orontes his false accuser out of the Catalogue of his Friends, and cast upon him the greatest Ignominy. About the same time following Gaus slain.

Not long after Gaus the Persian Admiral, who, as before was said, had entered into Society with the Lacedæmonians, and the King of Egypt, whilst he was managing his Revolt, was slain by some that cunningly laid in wait for him. One Tachos undertook the carrying on of his design, and fortifying himself with an Army, built a City in an high Rock upon the Sea, called Lenza, where was a Chapel dedicated to Apollo; but he dying a little after, great controversy happened about the place betwix the Clazomenians and Cymeans (whereof the former obtained it) and thereby those Rebellions in Asia fell of themselves, and the Lacedæmonians, thinking it best to intermeddle no more with Persian matters, gave their minds wholly to establish their Power in Greece, got into their Hands several Cities by one means or other, and not obscurely fought after the Empire of all Greece, contrary to the form of the League, made by the means of the Persian King at the procurement of Antalcidas, amongst all the Grecians, as Diodorus telleth us.

82. Acoris the King of Egypt, who of late had entered into Society with Gaus, and before had given assistance to Evagoras against Artaxerxes, as one who laid claim unto his Kingdom, to strengthen himself raised a great Army of Strangers, and for that he gave very good pay, and fought otherways to disserve well of Military men, many Grecians gave their Names and lifted themselves in his Service. But wanting still some famous and expert General, he procured Chabrias the Athenian, a man of great Command and no less Valour; though without the content of the People. Artaxerxes made Pharnabazus (now of late his Son in Law) the General of his Forces, who furnished with Money made great preparations for the War, and sent to Athen to complain of Chabrias, who as he said, by his Service to the Egyptian, alienated the Kings Affection from that State; and desired that they would send Iphicrates to be a Captain in his Wars. The Athenians being desirous to have both the King and Pharnabazus their Friend, presently recalled Chabrias, and gave order to Iphicrates to assist the Persians.

83. Pharnabazus spent several Years in preparation for the War, of which Iphicrates being weary, told him he wondered, that he being so quick in speaking should be so slow in doing, to which he answered, that the reason was, that he himself was Master of his Words, but the King of his Actions. The Grecians were again fallen into civil Diffentions, the former Peace being not long continued through the ambitious practices of the Lacedæmonians; which Artaxerxes considering, and how needful their help was to him in this Egyptian Expedition, he sent to mediate and take up their Differences, which they all liked well and accepted, except the Thebans. At length after three or four Years spent in preparation, the Kings Forces were drawn down into Ace a Town of Syria, where being a general Muster, there were found two hundred thousand Barbarians, under the command of Pharnabazus, and twenty thousand Greeks under the Ensigns of Iphicrates; the Navy amounted to the number of three hundred Gallies, besides a great number of Vessels of Burthen. In the beginning then of Summer they marched for Acoris; the Fleet sailing along the Coasts, and coming near the Mouths of Nile, found the Egyptians furnished sufficiently for a War; warning enough having been given them by the delay of Pharnabazus, who (as other Persian Generals) having not the full disposal of things in his Power, was constrained to send to the King, to know his Pleasure concerning particulars, whose answer not being quickly obtained at a great distance, procured much sloyness in all Expeditions.

84. Neitanebis the King of Egypt (for Acoris was now dead) sent to spie out the number of the Persian Army; but his chiefest hope was in the strength of the Country, which was mightily fortified against any Invasion, by the seven Mouths of Nile, whereof each was strengthened with a Castle, and a wooden Bridge, to hinder the passage of any Ships up the Rivers. But especially he took care of Pelusium the readiest passage from Syria, stopping up such places as might be passed by Water, and drowning such as gave access by Land. Pharnabazus his Officers finding Pelusium so strongly fortified, resolved there was no passing there, and to carry the Fleet up to the Mendesian mouth of the River, where landing three thousand men, Pharnabazus and Iphicrates set upon the Castle. The Egyptians brought in three thousand Horse and Foot to the relief of it, and thereby ensued a most sharp encounter; but being at length overpowered by the number of Persians which coming in continually to the Fight, encompassed them; a great slaughter was made of them, and many taken alive. The rest betaking themselves to the Fort, Iphicrates his men broke in with them, took it, and razing it, carried the Defendants away Prisoners.

85. Iphicrates now understood by these Prisoners, that the Garrison was called out of Memphis the strongest City in Egypt; whereupon he advised Pharnabazus with all speed to Sail thither, before the Egyptians should have time to unite their Forces. Pharnabazus answered, he would first stay till all his Army arrived, by the which the taking of Memphis would be more easy; but the other replied, that if he would but let him have all the Mercenaries in the Army, he would promise to reduce the City. Pharnabazus hereupon grew jealous of his Valour, and fearing he might thereby, with his Skill and Courage bring Egypt into subjection, denied him what he required; to which refusal he opposed this solemn Protestation, that if the Persians should let slip out of their Hands this fair Opportunity, this Expedition through their Fault would prove successful. Nothing being procured hereby but Hatred and ill Words, the Egyptians by the means of this delay reinforced the Garrison of Memphis, and with all their Forces came to the Fort which the Persians had demolished; where dividing their men into several parties, they set upon the Enemy, and prevailed so much upon him, that making great slaughters, the Persian Generals, having spent much time about the Place, and now the Nile swelling, and beginning to overflow all the Grounds about them; left they should seem to strive with Nature it self, resolved to retreat out of the Country: And this was the fruit of so long a preparation, and so much Expence.

86. Being returned into Asia, the differences betwixt them brake out afresh; inso much that Iphicrates fearing lest he might be attached as Conon formerly had been, withdrew himself by Night, and returned to Athens. Thither Pharnabazus sent after him, to accuse him as guilty of the miscarriage of the Expedition, to which the Athenians answered, that if they found him guilty, they would punish him; but within a while they gave him the command of their Fleet. This year Nicoles the Eunuch slew Euvagoras the King of Salamine, and seized on the Kingdom; according to Diodorus; who in no case is to be believed, as to the Author of the Paricide; for though it be confirmed by one (A) that he was killed by an Eunuch; yet it appeareth from another, that his name was Thrafsydans; seeing it is clear from Iphicrates, that Nicoles to whom he wrote one Oration; another concerning the Office of a King; he styled by his Name; and made a funeral one concerning Euvagoras was the very Son of Euvagoras; and succeeded him in the Kingdom and is not to be reckoned amongst Eunuchs.

87. The next Year, Artaxerxes understanding how Greece was shaken with intestine Broiles, which he still looked upon as by it's help to recover Egypt; sent to compose the difference amongst the several States. They all assented to his Offers; except the Thebans, who having a design to be Masters of all Boeotia, would not enter with the rest into the League; which the Lacedemonians ill resenting; and suspecting their ambitious Practices for the dominion of all Greece, invaded them as the publick Enemies: Hereupon ensued a great and bloody Battle at Leuttra, in which the Thebans had the better, through the Conduct of Epaminondas, who so abated the Strength of the Spartans, that they sent Agessius their King into Egypt; and Antalcidas to Artaxerxes, to desire a supply of Money. But the King, either because they fought to his Rebels the Egyptians, or upon some other account, slighted the Message, and rejected Antalcidas, in so much that returning home, when he found that he was laughed at by his Enemies, and fearing the severity of the Ephori, he starved himself to death.

88. Yet still did the King endeavour to reconcile the Gracians, for that as long as they exercised mutual feud, he could not have any considerable supply from them. This Year on the former message Philiscus of Argilus was sent to them, who procured both the Thebans and their Associates, and the Lacedemonians to meet at Delphos; but the controversy resting about Messene, and the Thebans refusing to consent that it should be under the Lacedemonians; the Treatie had again the same success: which so offended Philiscus, that he left two thousand

Soldiers

Soldiers he had hired to the Lacedemonians, and returned into Asia. The Thebans not long having the Design to bring all Greece into subjection, and knowing their endeavours to be vain, except they made Artaxerxes their Friend, or at least induced him to stand neuter, resolved to send Ambassadors to him. Calling together then their Associates, they pretended the thing to be necessary, because Euthycles the Lacedemonian was already there, and dispatched away Pelopidas from themselves, Antiochus from the Arcadians, Archidamus for the Eleans, and another for the Argives, which being known at Athens, they also sent Timagoras and Leon from their State.

89. Pelopidas found the most favour at the King's Hands, pleading (and not falsely) that the Thebans had only assisted the Persians at Plataeae, and since that had never fought against that Kingdom; and that for this only cause were they invaded by the Lacedemonians, because they refused to follow Agessius against the King, having also prohibited him to Sacrifice at Aulis, where Agamemnon Sacrificed when he passed into Asia and took Troy. The late Victory of the Thebans at Leuttra, and the Invasion of the Lacedemonians Territories, did not a little add to the esteem of Pelopidas, who to inhance the renown of his Country, stuck not also to aver, that the reason why the Argives and Arcadians had of late been overthrown by the Lacedemonians, was, because the Thebans were not at the Battle. He obtained of the King, that Messene being exempted from the jurisdiction of the Lacedemonians, should be left to its own Liberty, and that the Athenians should withdraw their Ships, or else War was to be made upon them, which being read to the publick Ministers of the other Republicks, Leon the Athenian openly said, that the Athenians must find out another Friend besides the King, who replied, that if they knew any more equal thing, they should acquaint him therewith.

90. With Pelopidas was joyned in Commission Ismenias the Theban, as we have it from Plutarch. He being brought by Tubraustes a Colonel into the Kings Presence, and commanded, according to the Custom, to adore him, took off his Ring secretly from his Finger, and cast it down at his Feet, and then stooping down to take it up, as he thereby satisfied the King, and obtained his request; so he thought he provided sufficiently for the credit of himself and Country. Timagoras the Athenian communicated by Letter some Secrets to Artaxerxes, for which he was rewarded with one thousand Daricks, a costly Supper, and eighty Cows to find him with Milk for his Health; with a costly Bed and Furniture to it, and some Persians that knew how to make it, the Greeks being accounted ignorant in these things. But returning home with the rest of the Ambassadors he was put to Death; either because he accepted of these Gifts, as Plutarch believed; or for that he adored the King after the Persian manner, wherewith they counted their whole State to be reflected on, or (what is most likely) because of this intercourse betwixt him and Artaxerxes they questioned his Fidelity; his Colleague moreover impeaching him at their return for refusing his Company, and imparting all the Secret of their Negotiation to Pelopidas.

91. After the return of the Ambassadors, the Thebans sent for the Deputies of the several Cities, whom, when the Letters from the King were read, they commanded, all that would be accounted his and their Friends, to swear to the Contents of them. The Deputies answered, their Commissions were to hear, and not to take any Oath, which if they would exact from Cities, they must send to them. This they did, hoping that the particular States would not dare to refuse the Society of the King and them; but the Messengers first coming to Corinth, and that City refusing to swear, the rest followed their Example, and so this device of the Thebans came to nothing. Then fell the Gracians into great Broils again, making havock of the Territories, and Goods of one another, which Artaxerxes still looking upon as against his design for the recovery of Egypt, sent once more and procured a Peace betwixt them, whereby the Laconick, or Boeotian War (as it was called) ended, after it had endured about five years from the first beginning, in the thirty ninth Year of Artaxerxes.

92. This Peace yet effected nothing on his behalf, the interests of the several States being at this time so contrary, that they presently after broke out afresh into civil Wars; and what Forces could be spared out of Greece, being not employed for, but against him. For, three or four Years after, the Maritime Parts of Asia revolted from him, and Tachos now King of Egypt made great Provision for the War, both by Land and Sea; and hiring many Soldiers out of several Republicks in Greece, drew also to his party the Lacedæmonians, who had conceived displeasure against Artaxerxes, because he made Messene to be comprehended in the general Peace. At the same time had he then to deal with the Egyptians, the Greek Cities in Asia, and the Lacedæmonians; and besides them several of his Lieutenants in Asia revolted; amongst whom were Artabazanes of Phrygia (who had lately seized upon that Country after the Death of Mithridates) Manfolus of Caria, a powerful Prince, having many strong places, especially Halicarnassus, in his Power; with whom joined Oromes of Mysia, Autophradates of Lydia, and of the Ionian Race, the Lycians, Pisidians, Pamphylians, Cilicians: and besides these the Syrians, Phœnicians, and almost all that bounded upon the Sea. The General Command over all was given to Oromes. By this so general a defection, half of the Tributes were withdrawn from the King; and the other Half sufficed not for warlike preparations.

93. But Oromes having got the chief Command, and therewith received a years pay for twenty thousand men, betrayed those that had entrusted him with so great a Power. For, promising himself no small matters from the King, he first sent up to him those that brought him the Money, and then betrayed many Towns, and a Band of Mercenaries to those who were sent from him for that purpose. At the same time things went in the same course in Cappadocia, accompanied with some memorable Circumstances. Artabazus the King's General invaded that Country with a numerous Army, and Datames the Governour thereof, who had revolted, meeting him with a great Party of Horse, and twenty thousand Foot, pitched his Tents against him. The Captain of Datames his Horse was his Father in Law, who to ingratiate himself with the King, and to provide for his own safety, having first agreed with Artabazus, by Night passed over with all his Troops unto him. But Datames not at all discouraged hereby, exhorted his Mercenaries to constancy, and promising them a large Donative, presently led them against the Revolters, whom he fell upon, just as they were joyning with the Enemy, and with great Violence made great slaughter of both. Artabazus being ignorant of the matter, suspected that the Revolters went about again to betray him, and return to Datames, and therefore gave order to his Souldiers to fall upon the Horse approaching; whence Mithrobarzanes (for so was the Revoltor called) being shut up in the midst, whilst one part laboured to repel the Traytor, and the other to be revenged upon him for his Treachery, was reduced into great Straights, and out of extreme despair made great Slaughter on both Sides, till at length having lost ten thousand men, the rest were put to Flight by Datames, to whom some returned and asked Pardon; others betook themselves to a place, whence being not able to stir they were killed, to the number of five thousand men.

94. Whilst these things were thus carried on, Rheomithres was sent into Egypt to Tachos for aid, from whom obtaining five hundred Talents, and fifty Gallies, he returned to Lemæa, a City in Asia, where lending for many of the Officers of the Revolters he laid Hands on them all, and sent them up to the King, by which Treachery he reconciled himself unto him. Tachos by this time had prepared all things for the War, having obtained out of Greece two hundred Gallies, tenthousand most valiant Souldiers, and out of Egypt it self raised eighty thousand Foot. Agesilans the King of Lacedæmon he also procured to come to him, promising him the Command of all his Forces. Upon the report of his landing, all sorts of Presents were dispatched to him; but the Courtiers finding no Train, nor any thing of State about him, only an old Man, little of Stature, not at all trimmed, but with coarse and old Cloathes, sitting on the Shore upon the Grasse, they greatly despised him, and were seized with wonder at his poorness of Spirit, when they beheld how amongst the Presents, taking the Meal, Calves, and Geese to himself, he gave the sweet Meats and Oyments to be divided amongst the Slaves. And Tachos himself gave him not the chief Command according to his Promise, deriding him for the smallness of his Stature, and saying, that the Fable was fulfilled in him, the Mountains are in Travel, and a Mouse is brought forth; to which with Anger and Scorn he answered, that afterwards he should have cause to think him a Lyon.

95. With Tachos also was Chabrias the Athenian, though not sent from the State as was Agesilans, but on his own account, who advised him wanting Treachery, to command his richest sort of Subjects to furnish him with as much Money as they could spare, and he would repay them out of his yearly Tributes, which course he following got great store of Money, and yet injured no man.

Nectanebus King of Egypt.

To him he committed his Fleet, to Agesilans the Conduct of the ten thousand mercenary Græcians, to Nectanebus his Son (or rather the Son of his Brother, or Sister, being called his Nephew;) referring to himself the command over all; and though Agesilans advised him rather to manage the War by his Lieutenants, and stay in Egypt, he yielded into Phœnicia, the Spartan following him, though against his Dignity and Disposition. Coming into Phœnicia, he sent Nectanebus against the Cities in Syria, to whom came a message from the Viceroy of Egypt left there by Tachos, signifying that he had revolted, and now invited him to seize upon the Kingdom; to which he consenting, drew presently to his party, all the Officers by gifts, and the Souldiers by large Promises. Tachos now being in fear of his own Servants, and Agesilans whom he derided, betook himself to Sidon, and thence to Artaxerxes, by whom he was courteously entertained, though not declared General in the Egyptian War, (and so by the help of Agesilans recovered his Kingdom) as Diodorus writeth.

Agesilans having served him, in his return death.

96. Another King besides these two was made by the Egyptians of Mendesium, of whom ten thousand arose, and for him made War upon Nectanebus. The Cafe being such, Agesilans took part with Nectanebus, whom he thought more to favour the Græcians, took the other Prisoners, and confirmed him in the Kingdom, who importuning him to stay and winter with him, he refused, hasting homewards, for that he knew the Lacedæmonian State to be at this time engaged in a War, destitute of Treasure, and yet to keep Strangers in constant pay for want of their own men. Nectanebus when he would not stay, dismissed him with great Gifts and Honours, giving him two hundred and twenty, or two hundred and thirty Talents for the maintenance of the War at home, with which taking Ship, he sailed homewards, though in the midst of Winter; making haste, lest through his absence the State should do nothing the next Summer; but being carried by Tempest into a desert place, called the Haven of Mendæus, lying betwixt Cyrene and Egypt, he there fell sick and died. His Friends laying his Corps in Wax, for want of Honey, carried it to Lacedæmon, where it was buried according to his worth and dignity.

Artaxerxes dying having before his death made Darius King, who plotting against him,

97. About the time of his Death died also Artaxerxes the King of Persia, after he had reigned forty three Years. He had one hundred and fifteen Sons, of which three only were legitimate; Darius, Artaspes, and Ochus; the rest being begotten of Concubines, of which he kept three hundred and sixty, with which yet he could not be contented without the addition of Aossa his own Daughter, his own Mother to please him, becoming a Bawd to his incestuous affections. When he was grown old, perceiving his Sons to strive about the Succession, and especially Ochus (who although the youngest, hoped by the means of Aossa to procure the Kingdom of him) fearing lest after his death he might do as his Uncle Cyrus had formerly done, contrary to the custom of Persia, which ordinarily admitted not of two Kings at the same time, he made Darius the eldest, now fifty years old, King, whilst he lived, lest his Death should involve the Empire in civil Broils. It was the fashion for him that was made King, to ask, and receive something at the hands of him that made him, according to which Darius asked Aossa to Wife, which formerly having been Concubine to Cyrus, Artaxerxes took, and afterwards married. He out of Indulgence to him first granted his request, for that she being a free woman, and no Slave, might chuse whether she would have him, and hoping she would refuse; but she willingly accepting of the thing, and he then repenting of what he had rashly promised, consecrated her as a Nun to Diana, that she might live for the remainder of her days a single life. Darius hereby incensed, through the provocation of Tiribazus, (who bore Artaxerxes malice for defrauding him of his Daughter Amistris, whom he promised to him, but married her himself) entered with fifty of his Brethren into a conspiracy against the Life of his Father, and the Plot being revealed by an Eunuch, was put to death with his complices.

Report to death.

Ochus his wicked Practices for the Kingdom.

98. Darius being removed out of the way, Ochus was more inflamed with a desire of reigning, to which he was more incensed by Aossa his Sister. But he feared two of his Brothers; Artaspes legitimate, and the elder, and one Aspases, who though base born, and the younger, yet was much esteemed for his Wit-dom, and especially beloved by his Father. Both of them he resolved to destroy; the former by his cunning, and the latter by down-right cruelty; for he hired some who never ceased to tell Artaspes, as a great Secret, that his Father was resolved to make him away by a cruel, and shameful Death, and so often inculcating it unto him as speedily to be done, drove him to that fear and desperation that Plutarch in Artaxerxes, Justin lib. 2.

SECT. 4. that he poisoned himself, Artaxerxes mourned for him, but knowing the kind of his death, and suspecting the cause, yet through extreme Age was unable to search into the matter and find it out: only he embraced Arjames more affectionately than ever, and not obscurely signified that he only could trust, and rely upon him. Ochus judging then that no delay was to be used, procured Harpates the Son of Teribazus (who fell in the Treason of Darius) to murder him. Artaxerxes was already so spent with Age that he seemed to want but the least furtherance to his Death, so that word being brought him of the death of Arjames, he was not able to bear it, but died Heart-broken with Sorrow, after he had lived ninety four Years, in the forty third of his Reign; in the third of the one hundred fourth Olympiad. A. M. 3844. about three hundred and sixty before the Birth of Christ. He was esteemed mild and loving towards his Subjects, which Opinion was mightily confirmed by the Cruelty and Paricide of his Successor.

SECT. IV.

From the Death of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and the beginning of Ochus, to the Death of Darius Codomanus, Containing the space of thirty two Years.

1. Ochus Succeeded his Father, after whom he was also named Artaxerxes, and whose Name the Persians put upon his Successors for a memorial of his mild and prosperous Government. Some think him by the Persians to have been called Ochofueros, or Achofueros; and that he is to be taken for that Achseuerus, or Ahsueverus the Husband of Esther, mentioned in Scripture, who by the seventy, and Josephus after them, is named Artaxerxes. Some have thought Cambyses to have been the Man, but he reigned only seven Years, whereas above twelve are given to Ahsueverus. Neither could Darius the Son of Hystaspes be he, if the Fews with others rightly accounted the Book of Esther to have been the last in Order of all the Canonical Scripture of the Old Testament, and for that Psalmist his Wife is thought to be Astia, the Daughter of Cyrus, it cannot be, because he never put away Astia, on whom he begat Xerxes, and although some plead hard for Xerxes because his Wife is called by Herodotus, Amestris, which they take in the Persian Tongue to be only Hann-Esther, yet 'tis apparent out of the same Author, that she was the Daughter of Otanus a Persian Satrap, by Religion an Heathen, and of a most cruel Disposition. Besides, Ahsueverus in the seventh Year of his Reign was at Sulban; but Xerxes in the seventh of his Reign was absent in the War with Greece, and though the Greeks corrupted foreign Names, and might call Xerxes him, whom the Persians named Artach-sista, or Artachas-ta, yet not one in his own Language called Achofueverosch. Neither is it probable that Longimanus could be the man, who is both in Sacred, and prophane Story called Artach-sista, and Artaxerxes; but no where Achseuerus. The same may be said of Nothus, who both by Nehemiah and Greek Writers is called Darius, and of Artaxerxes Mnemon, concerning whose Wife Strabo, such things are written as can neither agree with Psalmist nor Esther. Now if that of Esther be the last Canonical Book; and Nehemiah lived to the time of Darius Nothus, then is it probable, that Esther lived in the Reign of his Son, or Grand-son, and cannot so conveniently be assigned for a Wife to any as to Ochus.

2. Ochus knowing of how great Authority his Fathers Name was to his Subjects, and how contemptible he should be after his Death was known, procured of the Eunuchs, Chamberlains and Colonels to conceal for ten Moneths, and in the mean time sending about the Royal Seal, commanded in his Father's name, to proclaim Ochus King. When all owned, and obeyed him as King, he then confessed his Fathers Death, and commanded a general Mourning, according to the custom of Persia, and presently taking away all Competition, filled the Court with the Blood of his Kindred, and Relations, no regard being had, either to Sex or Age. Amongst the rest he put to death his (6) Sister Ochus, being also his Mother-in-law, with cruel Torments, and his Uncle with his two Sons and Nephews, he caused to be set in an empty place, and killed with Darts, who seemeth well to have been Father to Sisgambis (Mother to Darius the last Persian King) whose eighty Brethren together with their Father, Curtius reporteth to have been murdered by Ochus.

3. From Ochus revolted Artabazus, against whom were sent some of the Persian Satrapes with seventy thousand men, and yet by the help of Chares the Athenian he overthrew them, and rewarded Chares with a great sum of Money, which he laid out in the paying of his Souldiers. Ochus knowing of this, expostulated seriously with the Athenians about it, who hearing that he intended with three hundred Ships to assist their Enemies (with whom they were now engaged in the social War) presently clapt up a Peace with them. Artabazus being forsaken of the Athenians, betook himself to the Thebans, who ordered Pammenes with five hundred men to pass over into Asia to assist him; by whose help Artabazus again overthrew the King's Forces sent against him in two great and bloody Battels, which got no small Credit to Pammenes, and his Boeotians. Yet a few Years after, when the Thebans were engaged in the Phocian War, and reduced to extremity for want of Money, they sent to Artaxerxes Ochus, and obtained of him three hundred Talents, which he granted as it seemeth to put an obligation upon them to assist him in the War, which he renewed against the Egyptians.

4. Although Egypt had long before this revolted from the Persian Empire, yet Ochus not at all affecting War had kept himself quiet; for, having sent some Armies thither, by the Treachery, or ignorance of their Captains, they miscarried, so that having several times badly sped, though despised on that account by the Egyptians, yet being a lover of his ease and quiet he submitted to the Disgrace. But now at this time (about the eleventh Year of his Reign) the Phenicians and Cyprians taking Heart, and rebelling also, he resolved to chastise them all with Arms, and that in his own Person; and making great Provision of all things for the War, raised three hundred thousand Foot, thirty thousand Horse, and three hundred Gallies, besides Vessels of Burthen. The first Tempest of the War fell upon Phenicia, which revolted upon this Occasion. A famous Citie there was therein named Tripolis, consisting, according to it's Name, of three Cities distant a Furlong from each other, and inhabited by Tyrrians, Sidonians, and Arcadians, in which the assembly General of the Phenicians met and resolved of their most important affairs. Herein the Persian Satrapes and Ambassadors, behaving themselves very uncivilly, and abusing the Sidonians, they thereupon resolved to rebel, and persuading the other Phenicians to side with them for the obtaining of their Liberty, sent to Neftanebus King of Egypt to desire him to receive them into Confederacy against Ochus. Then to begin their Hostility they cut down the Paradise wherein the Kings of Persia, when they came that way, used to divert themselves; burnt the Hay which the Satrapes had gathered for use in War, and punished such Officers as by whom they had been abused.

5. Ochus having notice of this, longed to be revenged of all the Phenicians, but especially of them of Sidon; and gathering his Forces together at Babylon, set out thence against them. In the mean time whilst he was on his way, the President of Syria and Mazæus Governour of Cilicia, with joyn't Forces fell upon the Phenicians; but Tennes King of Sidon, having received out of Egypt a supply of four thousand Cracians, over which Mentor the Rhodian was General; with them and his Citizens together, fell upon the Satrapes, worsted, and expelled them out of Phenicia. Whilst things were thus carried there; another War arose to the Persians out of Cyprus, wherein were nine Cities of good account, having the lesser Towns in their Subjection, and each of them a King; but all Subjects to the Persian, all which now, imitating the Phenicians, revolted. Ochus receiving tidings hereof, wrote to Adrieus Prince of Caria (who being newly come to the Government, was by the tenure of his Principality a Friend

Friend and Associate in War to the Persian Empire to provide Forces both for Sea and Land against them, who accordingly with great expedition making ready forty Gallies and eight thousand Mercenaries, sent them into Cyprus, under the conduct of Phocion, the Athenian, and Evagoras, who heretofore had held the Island as King. These two landing their Men, laid close Siege to Salamine both by Land and Sea, and the Island having been quiet of late, and for that reason abounding with Riches, great numbers flockt out of desire of Plunder from Syria and Cilicia, inasmuch that the number of the Besiegers was doubled. Hereupon all the other Cities submitted themselves; only Protogoras held out still, and Evagoras thought by force to re-invest himself of that Kingdom, devolved upon him from his Ancestors: But at length Protogoras also submitting, obtained Salamine still; and Evagoras contented himself with a large Dominion given him in Asia, which ill governing, he fled again into Cyprus, and there taken was put to death.

Mentor the Rhodian offers to betray Sidon to him.

6. The King was on his March towards Phœnicia, when Mentor the Rhodian understanding what strength he had, and how unable the Rebels were to make resistance, sent one to him privately, offering to betray Sidon into his Hands, and to do him especial Service in the Conquest of Egypt, being very well skilled in that Country and the River. Ochus not only offered him indemnity, but a large reward, if he would perform what he promised, and placing his greatest Felicity in the recovery of Egypt, sent to the chieft of the Græcian States, to desire aid. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians signified their desire to retain Amity and a good Correspondence with him, but at present could yield him no assistance; but the Thebans sent him one thousand men, the Argives three thousand, and the Greeks in Asia willing to shew their readiness, furnished him with six thousand. Before their arrival the King was got into Phœnicia, and late down not far from Sidon, which the Inhabitants had by this time strongly manned within, and fortified with a threefold large Ditch, and high Walls, besides a Fleet of one hundred Gallies. For they exceeded by far all their Neighbours in Riches.

Mentor King of Sidon joins with him, and yet put to death by Ochs.

7. But Tennes their King had associated himself with Mentor to betray the City, whom leaving therein with command of a Part thereof for the better carrying on of the Treachery, he himself with five hundred Soldiers went out, pretending to go to the publick convention of the Phœnicians, having with him one hundred of the prime Citizens as his Counsellors. These he brought straight to Ochus, who put them all to death as Authors of the Rebellion, and after them five hundred more, who came as Suppliants with Olives in their Hands, after he had understood from Tennes that the City should be surrendered to him without any Conditions, thereby to strike a Terror into the other Towns. After this, Tennes easily prevailed with the mercenary Egyptians to let him and the King into the Town, which being done, and Ochus having it in his Power, judging him now to be of no use to him, he commanded him also to be slain. The Sidonians before the King approached had burnt all their Ships, left any private Person should convey himself away during the Siege. Now seeing themselves betrayed, and their City full of the Enemy which swarmed on every side, they set fire to their Houses, and therein burnt themselves with their Wives and Children, so that (accounting Slaves) above forty thousand are thought to have perished in the Flames. The King sold the Rubbish thereof for many Talents, much Gold and Silver being found therein, because it had flourished with great Riches. By this Tragedy of Sidon the other Cities being terrified, yielded themselves unto the Persian.

Sidon taken and burnt by the Inhabitants.

8. The (a) Auxiliaries out of Greece being come to Ochus after the taking of Sidon, he set forward with his whole Army towards Egypt, (b) taking Pericho a City of Judea (as it's probable) in his way, and drawing many Feus along with him in his Expedition. Coming (c) to the Lake Sirbonis, he lost part of his Army in the Whirlpits and Bogs, through ignorance of the place, and at length arrived at Pelufium the first frontier-Town, which was held with a Garrison of one thousand Men. Now the King divided the Græcian Forces into three Bodies, and over each constituted a Captain of their own Nation, and joynd a Persian with him: the other Forces he kept in his own Command, being greatly intent about the main buisness. On the other side Nectanebus was not a whit discouraged, having in pay twenty thousand Græcians, and as many Africans, besides sixty thousand of his own Egyptians, and an innumerable Company of Boats for the River. But by his Conceitedness and want of Skill he mis-carried, having formerly prospered whilst he used the Conduct of the Græcian Captains, but now his Fortune changing upon his sole managing the War, for which he thought himself sufficiently able. After then he had fortified his Garrisons, with thirty thousand Egyptians, five thousand Greeks, and half of the Africans, he seized upon such places, as were most advantageous for passage into the Country.

9. Things standing thus betwixt them, Nicostratus the Captain of the Argives getting some Egyptians for Guides, passed with the Fleet through a Ditch, and in a place something remote and out of sight landed his men, and pitched his Tents; which being known by the Garrison, a party issued out, and fell upon them; but the Græcians after a sharp contest, slew their Captain, and of them about five thousand men. Nectanebus upon report made of this Defeat was greatly discouraged, fearing all the rest of the Persian Army might be easily transported, and suspecting lest the Enemy should bend his utmost strength against Memphis the Metropolis, was especially concerned for it, and with that party which accompanied him returned thither. In the mean time Lacertes the Theban, General and principal of the Græcian Captains drained the Chancel by cutting a Ditch, and passing over his Soldiers, raised a Battery against Pelufium, by which the Walls being much broken, the defendants raised still Palliades in the place, and the Græcians within stoutly defending the Fort, a great Contest hapned for several days. But as soon as they heard of the Kings departure, they desired a Parley, and Lacertes interposing an Oath, that upon yielding of the place, they should depart with such things as they brought out of Greece, they presently yielded. Then Artaxerxes sent Bagoas an Eunuch of great authority with him, with a party of Barbarians to take possession of Pelufium, who meeting the Græcians took from them many things contrary to the agreement. This they received in great disdain, and called upon their Gods as Witnesses of the Oath, which to keep Lacertes fell upon the Barbarians, put them to flight with the loss of some, and defended his Country-men, for which being accused by Bagoas, the King defended what he had done, and punished the Authors of the Violence.

10. Pelufium being taken, the other Towns were easily reduced by this stratagem of Mentor the Rhodian, the third Captain of the Græcians. These places being held by Garrisons consisting of two sorts of Nations, Græcians and Egyptians, he caused this Rumor to be spread abroad, that Artaxerxes had resolved to deal mildly with all those who should deliver up any Towns, but such as should withstand him, he would prosecute with as great severity as the Sidonians, and he gave in charge to the Sentinels to let as many Citizens go out as would. By this means this report was presently spread all over Egypt, and thereupon mutinies followed betwixt the Strangers and Natives in every Garrison, each endeavouring first to betray their trust, and gain credit of the Conquerors by their speedy Treachery. Accordingly when Mentor and Bagoas laid Siege to Babastis, the Egyptians secretly sent to the latter to yield to him the Town upon security of a free dismissal. The Græcians suspecting the matter, pursued the Messenger, and getting from him the whole truth, in a great rage fell upon the Egyptians, whereof some they slew, others they wounded, and drove the rest into a corner of the Town. The Egyptians signified this to Bagoas, and desired him with all speed to come and take possession of the Town, and in the mean time a Messenger was sent to Mentor from the Græcians, who advised them as soon as Bagoas should enter the Town to fall upon the Barbarians. As soon therefore as part of his Soldiers with him was entered, they shut the Gates, and killing all the Soldiers, took Bagoas himself Prisoner.

11. Bagoas (a) seeing his only hope to be in Mentor, earnestly besought him to be the means of his deliverance, promising him to do nothing for the future without his approbation, who procuring his release, and having the Town delivered up into his own Hands, as he got the credit of the enterprise, so engaged he Bagoas to him, who entered by Oath into Friendship and endearedness, which he also kept to the last, and by which Union they both became afterwards the most powerful of all the King's Officers. After the surrender of Babastis, the other Cities made their Peace, but Nectanebus lying at Memphis, and seeing what Progress the Enemy made in his Conquest, would not endanger his personal safety for a Kingdom, but packing up all his Treasures got him away into Æthiopia. Then became Artaxerxes Master of all Egypt, and demolishing the Walls of the greater Towns, spoiled the Temples, and got much treasure. He carried away the Writings of the Priests, which afterwards Bagoas restored to them for a great sum of money, he (b) derided Apis and all their gods, and for that the Egyptians had for his dulness (c) called him an Ass, he sacrificed Apis being taken by violence, to an Ass, making his flesh also be dressed up for meat. Then rewarded he the Gracians with great munificence, according to their particular merits, and making Pherenastes Satrapa of Egypt, he returned laden with glory and spoil unto Babylon, taking (d) in his way a great number of Fews captive, of whom some he placed at Babylon, and others in Hircania upon the Caspian Sea.

12. Ochus rewarded Mentor the Rhodian with one hundred talents of silver, and much costly household stuff, and making him governor of the Coasts of Asia, gave him full power to make war upon his Rebels. He used his power moderately towards Artabazus and Memnon, who formerly had revolted, and now were fled to Philip King of Macedonia: those he reconciled to the King, and sent for them both with their families; for Artabazus had by the Sister of Mentor and Memnon eleven Sons and ten Daughters, by which number Mentor being much affected, not only procured him his pardon, but preferred by degrees all the youths to honourable command in the Army. After this promise of pardon he allured Hermias the Eunuch Governor of Atarnus into his hands, whom casting into prison, he took his Ring and therewith signed letters, wherein was commanded in his name, that such as had command of any Castles or Towns should deliver them up into the hands of the bearers, which was accordingly done, and then sent he Hermias up to the King, who caused him to be hanged. Aristotle the Philosopher and Xenocrates the Chaldeonian, (whom he had sent for to him) made their escape out of such places as the Persians had got into their hands. Afterwards Mentor either by force or policy, reduced all such Captains as had revolted.

13. Philip the son of Amyntas at this time reigning in Macedonia, grew very potent, and besieged Perinthus, a Town in Thrace, situate upon the Propontis, with thirty thousand men, and very strong provision for War; so that he straightly pressed the inhabitants, giving them no rest through his continual attempts. This Artaxerxes Ochus taking notice of, and being very jealous of his sudden growth, commanded the Satrapas of the Maritime Coasts of Asia to relieve the Perinthians as effectually as might be, which they fo performed as he missed of his design; and this afterwards was objected as a sufficient cause, amongst others, for the invasion of Asia.

14. In the reign of Ochus, as some think, hapned those things which are said to have been done in Fudat, during the reign of Artaxerxes, and to have given an occasion of imposing a Tribute upon that Country. After the death of Eliashib the Priest, his son John succeeded him in his Office according to his birth-right, who had a brother named Josbua. This Josbua being in great favour with Bagoas, the Kings General, had a promise from him that he should have the Priesthood, by which he was so heartened as to strive with John in the Temple, and so far provoked him as he slew him there. Bagoas hearing this, endeavoured to enter the Temple, and when he was forbidden asked if they counted him more impure than the Carkeys that lay within, and getting in by force, took these occasion to punish the Fews seven years for the death of Josbua. For two Lambs being daily offered in the constant sacrifices, he imposed upon every one a Tribute of fifty drachms, which amounted to the yearly rate of sixty Attick Talents. But if these things hapned in the time of this Artaxerxes, and he be taken for Asiuerus, then must this murder have been committed towards the beginning of his reign, and this Tribute of seven years been exacted before Mordecai the Few came in favour, which was after the fall of Haman, in the twelfth year of Asiuerus.

15. During the reign of Ochus, in his ninth dear, died Maufolus the petty King of Carria, more famous after his death than whilst living, to whom his wife Artemista succeeding, because he left no Children, burned with such affection towards him, that reducing his bones and ashes into powder she drunk it, desiring to become a quick and breathing monument of her husband. She proposed great rewards to such Orators as would speak eloquently in his commendation, in which did several notable men of that time. For the preservation of his memory she raised such a monument as deserved to be reckoned amongst the seven wonders of the World, and in the work whereof the most exquisite artificers that then could be found were employed. Scopas on the East

East part, Bryaxes on the North, Timothæus on the South, and Leochares on the West, who notwithstanding Artemisia died of melancholy before the work was completed, yet proceeded to the finishing of it, intending it as a monument, not only of Maufolus (upon which account the * Romans called their most exquisite pieces of Architecture Maufolea) but also of the excellency of their Art; to transmit their own names as well as his posterity.

16. Bagoas had risen to that power with Ochus, that he ruled all things at his pleasure, the King doing nothing without his consent. Yet either mimbouting of his security through the cruel disposition of the King, or willing to have a greater power, owing Ochus also some displeasure for killing the Egyptian God Apis (he belonging to that Country) he poisoned him by the means of a Physician, after he had reigned twenty three years. Being dead, he cast him to the Cats to be devoured, another being buried in the Royal Sepulchre, in his stead, and that he might express his cruel disposition, of his Thigh-bones he caused sword hilts to be made. In his stead he made King his youngest son Artes, killing all his other sons, that the new King being destitute of kindred and friends, might yield the more obedience to himself. In reality he now reigned, usurping all, except the meer Title; but Artes beginning to look to himself, when he had ground to suspect that he intended to call him to an account for his wickedness, he made him away also with all his Children in the third year after he had set him up.

17. All the Children of Artes perishing with him, and the Royal family thereby being desolate, Bagoas made choice of one (a) Codomannus his friend, and placed him in the Throne, whom some Authors would have not at all to be descended of the Royal line, being a Carrier of Letters, but others make him the son of Asfanes (brother to Ochus) by Siggambis his sister, according to the custom of the Persian marriages. Whilst he was a private man in the Caspian War he shewed himself valiant, killing an Enemy, who challenged any one of Ochus his Army to a single Combat, and thereby for the present procuring great rewards, honour, and the Government of Armenia, after Artes his death came to be remembered by the people, which made choice also of him for their King, and that nothing of Royal Majesty might be wanting to him gave him the name of Darius. Not long after his perishment Bagoas repented him of what he had done, and being much verled in King-killing, provided a potion to send him, after Ochus and Artes, which he having notice of, called him to him, and in a pleasant humor offered it to himself to drink, and thereto compelled him, satisfying the people sufficiently in that he thus required him, who fought the same way to entrap him.

18 By this Darius was sent into Samaris, as a Satrapa, Sanballet, a Cathæan by birth, and so of the same Original the Samaritans themselves were. He thinking it good policy to procure Amity with the Fews, his Neighbours, married his daughter Nicaso for Manasse the brother of Faddus the High Priest.

19. Darius with the Empire of Persia was necessitated to espouse a quarrel with the greatest Monarch then known in the World, except himself, and with such a people in combination with him, as easily excelled all others in Military skill and valour. The quarrels which hapned betwixt the Persians and Græcians had been many, and as many bickerings and contests in the field had ensued thereupon, wherein as the Greeks both at home and abroad had constantly had success agreeable to their dexterity, so each foil of the Persians gave as great a stroke to their credit, inasmuch as they were slighted by the other, especially after the retreat of those that assisted Cyrus, who in despite of all Artaxerxes could do, marched through the midst of his Territories as Conquerors, and having seen the great riches of those Countreys through which they passed, carried home a longing desire after them, and an indignation that such things should be enjoyed by those who seemed not in capacity to defend them.

20. The disadvantage of the Persians was the rising of the Kingdom of Macedonia, to that high pitch of greatness to which it had been of late advanced by the abilities of Philip the present King, who though he might have pretended a cause where none was, yet there was some occasion of offence given him, though but counted a necessary ally to his rising fortune, of terrible to the Persian Empire: For when with great preparations he had besieged Perinthus a City of Thrace, Ochus gave order to his Lieutenants to assist the besieged, which was so powerfully done, as his design miscarried: Yet he having brought all Greece to his beck, and established his interest sufficiently in Europe, resolved up-

SECT. 4. on Asia, and assembling the estates at Corinth, procured himself to be declared General of all Greece for the Persian War; for which he made mighty preparations, imposing a certain number of Souldiers upon every Citie. The next Spring he sent over as before him into Asia three Captains, Parmentio, Amynas, and Atalus, under pretence of freeing the Greek Cities there, which happened the same year that Ases died, and he lived himself not long after, being stabbed by one Pausanias, as he was solemnizing the nuptials of his daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus. Hereupon Darius, who before studied how to turn the War into Macedonia, thought himself secure, depicting the youth of Alexander his son and Successor, who exceeded not the age of twenty years.

21. But Alexander being a young man of a great and restless spirit, and of wisdom and valour far above his age, overcame all difficulties both in Greece and Asia, which his Enemies had raised (getting himself to be chosen in a little time General of the one, as his father had been, and in the other suppressing betimes the sedition of the Army of Atalus, by taking of him out the way) and most vehemently burnt with a desire of the Conquest of the Persian Empire; from an endeavour after which he might by no means be diverted. Having either by fair, or foul means settled his matters in Europe, he passed over into Asia two years after his fathers death, and landed at Troas with a Fleet of sixty long ships. He first cast a spear out upon the shore, and leaped out in a frisking manner, as taking possession of the Continent. Then presently he made a visit to the Tombs of Achilles and Ajax, to whom he made a parentation, and mustered the Army he had brought over with him. Concerning the number of Forces, those that were there present themselves have not agreed in their relation, but according to the greatest probability, there were of foot thirteen thousand Macedonians, of the Associates seven thousand, and five thousand Mercenaries, besides of Odryses, Triballs, and Illyrians five thousand, and one thousand Archers, with such as fought with Darts. Of horse there were one thousand eight hundred Macedonians, one thousand eight hundred Thessalians, and of other Gracians six hundred, besides a Guard of nine hundred Thracians and Peonians.

22. Darius after he had heard how Alexander was declared General of Greece, and was much spoken of for his valour, shook off his former security and buckled himself to preparation for resistance. He got together a considerable Navy, and raised great Forces, for command of which he made choice of most expert Captains, and amongst the rest of Memnon the Rhodian, a man very excellent in Military matters, whom he sent into Phrygia with a band of five thousand Mercenaries to reduce Cyzicus to his obedience. He passed over the Hill Ida, and on a sudden set upon the Citie, and had well-nigh taken it, but the Defendants making strong resistance, he plundered the Territories adjacent, and then retreated with much booty. In the mean while Parmentio, one of the three Captains sent into Asia by Philip, and who stood close to the interest of Alexander, took by storm Syrnium, a Town of Phrygia, and sold the inhabitants. From thence he went to Pitane to attempt the same upon it, but Memnon coming upon him, struck such a terror into his men that he was forced to raise his siege. After this, Callas with a band of Macedonians and Mercenaries engaged with the Persians in a battel at Troas; but being overmatched in numbers, he was worsted, and betook himself to Rhatum. These things fell out before the passage of Alexander into Asia.

23. After (a) Alexander was landed, the Persian Captains met to consult about carrying on the War, whom Memnon advised by no means to hazard a battel, but to lay wait the Country before him, thereby to hinder his march any farther for want of necessities; and then to pass all their Forces over into Macedonia, and so to transfer the seat of the War into Europe. This whole Council was rejected as below the Persian courage, and a resolution taken to engage, for that gathering their forces together they marched into Phrygia towards the Hellspont, and pitched their Tents upon the River Gramicus (which runneth through the plains of Asia) intending it should be a defence to them. (b) Alexander in his way thither passed by Lampascus, the inhabitants of which either having already revolted to the Persian, or else suspected of such an intent he resolved utterly to destroy. As he was thus minded Anaximenes an Historian of that place, well known formerly to his father, and also to him, presented himself to him, to whom he swore in so many words, that he would not grant what he was about to ask, which the other readily apprehending desired

SECT. 4. desired of him that he would destroy Lampascus, so that with his sharpness of wit being circumvented, he was constrained to spare it against his will.

24. Alexander having with great trouble and danger passed the River Granicus, then (a) engaged with the Persians in a great and bloody battel, wherein much valour was shewn on both sides. Spithroates, a Persian Satrap of Ionis, and son in Law to Darius, a man of a great courage, with a strong body of Horse fell upon the Macedonians, whom no one being able to withstand, Alexander himself grappled with him, a fierce combat ensued, he wounding the King, who yet at length slew him. But Rofaces his brother coming in upon Alexander, gave him such a blow upon the head as broke his helmet and lightly wounded him, and a second had killed him outright but that Clitus, surnamed Niger, a Macedonian, putting spurs to his Horse, in good time cut off the hand of the Barbarian. A great conflict then ensued betwixt the principal Persians and Macedonians, and many of the former lost their lives upon the place; amongst which of special note were Aryxes and Pharnaces, brother to the wife of Darius, and Mithrobarzanes Captain of the Cappadocians. These being slain, those that opposed Alexander began to fly, and afterwards all the rest; of the hundred thousand force which the Persians brought into the field about ten thousand being slain, and of the twenty thousand Horse, two thousand. Of Alexander his Army one (b) reports nine Foot-men, and a hundred and twenty Horse-men to have fallen, but (c) another only thirty four in all, amongst which were nine Foot-men. The King by confession of all deserved most commendation for his valour, and next to him the Thessalian Horse-men. (d) Aryxes the Persian fled into Phrygia and there killed himself, because through his advice, he seemed to have been author of this overthrow.

25. Alexander after he had refreshed his Army, marched through Lydia, having Sardis delivered up to him, and came to Ephesus, where he dissolved the Oligarchical form of Government, and set up a Democratical one in its room, commanding the same to be done in all Greek Cities, which he ordered to be left to their own Laws. The Persians which escaped at Granicus were come to Miletus with Memnon the Rhodian, against which Citie he went and besieged it both by land and Sea, and by his Engines making great breaches in the walls, the inhabitants yielded themselves to his mercy, to whom he gave both life and freedom, but such Barbarians as he took he either slew or scattered them up and down in the quality of slaves. A little after he dissolved his Fleet, consisting of a hundred and sixty Ships or more, only reserving a certain number for the conveying of Engines and other instruments for a siege, amongst which were twenty Auxiliary Vessels belonging to Athens.

26. Memnon, after the taking of Miletus, with the most considerable Persian Officers, and a multitude of Mercenaries, betook themselves to Halicarnassus, the greatest and most elegant Citie in Caria, which he took upon him to defend for the King, to whom he sent as Hostages his Wife and Children, and thereupon command was given to all the Maritime parts of Asia, to obey him as their Captain General in the War. Alexander in the mean time sent his Engines thither by water, together with provision for his Army, and marched himself by Land thitherwards with his whole Force, setting at liberty in his way all the Greek Cities, which he left to their own Laws, and freed from Tribute, professing that he undertook this Expedition for the freedom of the Greeks. In his way he was met by Ada the Queen of Caria, who after the death of her Husband Idrieus, was deposed by her Brother Pexodarus. She delivered up Alinda, the strongest City in the country wherein she dwelt, into his hands, and imploring his help for the recovery of the Kingdom, adopted him for her son. He despised it not, and left her the Government of Caria, over which he declared her Queen, by which courtesy the Citie being overcome, sent him Crowns of gold, and delivered up themselves into his power.

27. Oromobates a Persian, Son in Law to Pexodarus, after his death kept possession of Halicarnassus. With whom Memnon the Rhodian and other Persians, after the taking of Miletus, joyned themselves. Alexander now besieged it, and with all his might endeavoured the taking of it by assault; but such was the pertinaciousness of the defendants, that they held him out, and making a sallie had given him a defeat, if the old Souldiers buckling their Arms to them had not come in in good time, and repulsed them with great slaughter; after which the Enemy forsook the City, and so he took it, and levelled it with the ground. The Castle he fortified with a wall, and a notable ditch, in which Thence he proceeded towards Lycia and Pamphylia, that reducing the Sea-Coasts into his power, he might render the Enemies Navy unserviceable to him, which he in a good measure performed, and came in the midst of Winter into Mylia a Region of Phrygia, where he entered into League with the Ambassadors sent to him from Phaselis, and the lower Lycia, who furnished all the Cities into his hands. Afterwards he went into Phaselis, where he stormed a Castle built by the Pisidians, to infect the Country.

The treason of Alexander's Lyceſtes.

28. Whilst (a) he here remained, he understood of a plot against his life, by Alexander Acropus, called also Lyceſtes (from Lyncus a Town of Epirus, as it is probable) who was promised by Darius the Kingdom of Macedonia, and a thousand talents of Gold besides, if he could any way procure his death. His Mother had by letters advised him to take heed of him, and the thing being confessed by Assines a Perſian, whom Darius under a shew of a Message to the Governour of Phrygia, had sent to deal with him in this matter, he committed him to custody, not thinking it safe to put him to death, left thereupon some trouble should follow, in Macedonia. From Phaselis he marched to Perga on the shore of the Pamphylia Sea, concerning which many ancient Historians reported, that it by an extraordinary providence gave way to him, and herein ſophoclus hath rather been too credulous, whereas (b) at a low water the place used to be dry, and gave way to passengers; only Alexander happening to come thither in Winter-season, and trusting all to the goodness of his Fortune, would march through before the water was fallen off, so that his men waded all the day in water up to the navel. (c) Subduing all in his passage, at length he came to the Lake of Aſcania in Phrygia, and thence in five Encampings to Celene, the Castle of which being held by the Satrapa of Phrygia, with a thousand Carians, and an hundred mercenary Græcians, after sixty dayes tresp (in which they had in vain expected relief from Darius) was yielded unto him.

(b) Strabo lib. 14.

(c) Arianus lib. 4.

29. In Celene he left a Garrison of one thousand five hundred Souldiers, and declaring Antigonus, Satrapa of Phrygia, went forward for Gordium, having written to Parmeno to meet him there with his Forces, who accordingly came; and there arrived also a supply of one thousand six hundred and fifty men out of Greece. This Gordium a City in Phrygia, had been the regal City of Midus the Son of Gordius King of this Country (concerning whom notable Stories are related) and herein was a Temple of Jupiter, wherein Alexander heard that there was a yoke belonging to Gordius, the bands of which whoſoever could untie, the Oracles promised him the Empire of all Aſia. When he had taken the Town he came into the Temple, and asked for the yoke, which being brought to him, when he could not find the ends of the thongs which were hid among the knots, left his frustrate endeavour should be ominous, he cut them in pieces, with his sword, and thereby either eluded or fulfilled the Oracle.

He cutteth in two the Gordian knot.

30. Darius this while sent a great sum of money to Memnon, whom he had declared General of all his Forces, wherewith he raising many men all over where he came, and rigging a Navy of three hundred ships, betook himself vigorously to his work. He presently reduced Chius, and sailing to Lesbos easily took Antissa, Methymnus, Pyrrhus, and Ereſus; but Lesbos and Mitylene more strongly fortified, with great loss of men. His name being blazed abroad by these actions, most of the Islands Cyclades sent their Ambassadors about a Peace, and a rumour being spread that he intended to fall upon Eubœa, a great fear seized upon the Inhabitants thereof, and many of the Græcians who envied the Fortune of Alexander, began to take courage, and conceive new hopes, amongst which were the Lacedæmonians, who alwaies had despised both his alliance and that with his Father. Thus prosperously succeeded Darius his affairs under the management of Memnon; but Providence having otherwise determined concerning his estate, Memnon died shortly after, and with him the King's success was even extinct. He was in good hope that the War would have been translated out of Aſia into Europe, necessitating Alexander to return; but understanding of his death, he consulted with Friends whether he should manage the War by his Lieutenants, or go himself in person, and give the Macedonians battle.

Atween Darius his General and him.

31. The Perſians persuaded him to march in the head of the Army, which thereby would fight with more alacrity, but Charidemus, (or Eudemus), an Athenian, a man much admired for valour and prudence (who by the command of Alexander being banished his Country, was come to the Perſian Court) advised him him not rashly to commit the Fortune of his Empire to the hazard of his own life, but keeping the chief Power in his own Hands to send some expert Lieutenant to the War. He told him that one hundred thousand men would be sufficient for this Enterprize; a third part of them being Græcians, with which he doubted not to engage to perfect what already was well begun by Memnon. The King at first gave ear to what he said; but the Perſians obstinately opposed it, and so interpreted his words as if he affected the chief Command, for that end, that he might betray the Empire to the Macedonians. Hereat he grew angry, and in his Passion upbraided the Perſians with Cowardice, which so far incensed the King, before this exasperated against him, that his Anger overtopping his Reason, he cast a Belt about him after the Perſian manner, and commanded him to be put to death, who foreseeing his Ruine, cried out as he was led away, that shortly he would repent it, and pay sufficiently for so unjust proceedings. After the cooling of his Passion he repented too late of his rashness, and considering the valour of the Lacedæmonians, bethought himself what man of worth he might find fit to succeed Memnon; but finding none to whom he might commit so great a Trust, was necessitated to expose himself to danger for the preservation of his Kingdom. Then raised he Forces in all places, which he commanded should meet at Babylon, where accordingly were found four hundred thousand Foot, and above one hundred thousand Horse, and with this number (taking his Mother, Wife, one Son of six Years of age, and two Daughters marriageable along with him) he marched towards Cilicia.

32. Alexander in the mean while placed Satrapæ over Paphlagonia and Capadocia, which voluntarily yielded themselves, and hastened towards the Straights of Cilicia called Pyle, which being quired by those that were there placed to maintain them, he easily passed, and came to Tarsus, which Arſames the Perſian also forsook, and waſting Cilicia, to frighten the Macedonian Army of Provisions, fled again to the King. Here Alexander fell sick of a Disease which (b) one wrote he got by too much Toil, (c) others assign no particular cause at all; but according to the general Tradition, (d) he contracted it by casting himself all hot and sweaty into the River Cydnus, whence such a cold seized upon his Nerves that he fell speechless, and so small hopes there were of recovery, that little probability was conceived of protracting the danger. Only one Physician named Philip an Acarnanian, who used a speedy and desperate kind of course in his practice, undertook the Cure. But by Letters from Parmeno he was lately advised to beware of him, as being corrupted by Darius for a great sum of Money to make him away. Yet he counting it safer to commit himself to the doubtful fidelity of the man, than perish by a certain Disease, put himself into his Hands, and taking the Potion, gave him the Letters of Parmeno to read, fixing his eyes upon him as he drank, whom as he saw nothing troubled at the matter, he took more courage, and recovered the fourth day after.

Quintus Curtius lib. 4.

33. Darius having notice of the sickness of Alexander hastened towards Euphrates, thinking to prevent him, and seize upon Cilicia. But he sending Parmeno before to possess himself of the Pyle, or Straights that part Cilicia and Syria, followed from Tarsus and came to Anchiale built by Sardanapalus; and thence to Solos, where he placed a Garrison, and fined the Inhabitants two hundred Talents of Silver for their affection to the Perſians. Hence he marched against the Cilicians, inhabiting the Mountains, which having brought under, he returned, and understanding how Pholomy and Alexander his Lieutenants had overthrown Orontobaces the Perſian, who held the Castle of Halicarnassus, whereby the parts adjacent were reduced to obedience, upon this good news he sacrificed to Aſclepius, and reformed the Democratical Government of the Solians. Then giving order to Philotas to lead about the Horse to the River Pyramus, he marched with the Foot by the Sea-Coasts, and came thither, whence he passed over to the City Mallos, where he had notice that Darius lay at Schibus, a place distant two days march from the Straights. From Mallos he passed to the City Iſſus, which being forsaken by the Perſians, Parmeno had seized on, and cleared the Passage thither, where he consulted whether he had better pass forwards, or there expect his supplies out of Macedonia. Parmeno persuaded him that no place could be more convenient for him to fight in than that straight one about Iſſus, because both their Armies would then be equal in effect, such narrow places being incapable to receive a multitude. After three days he passed the Straights and came to Myriander, where much Rain falling held the Macedonians in their Tents.

Sect. 4.

34. Darius in the mean while by the persuasion of some Gracians about him, had made choice of the Plains of Syria, most capable to receive his Multitudes, and opportune for the Horse to charge in; and for some time here he continued; but Alexander delaying his march, he was perfwaded by his Counsellors that he dared not to adventure any further, or look him in the Face, and because Winter approached he would lose no time, and therefore sending away his Money and Stuff of most value, with such Persons as were not fit for War, unto Damascus, he hastened into Cilicia, where he supposed Alexander to have possessed himself of the difficult passages, as not daring to try battle in open Field. Supposing that he pretended Sickness, and hid himself in the Straights, he passed over the Mountain, and went to Issus, most imprudently passing by, and leaving him at his Back. Taking this place, and therein such of the Enemy as being sick and weak were there left, he cut off their Hands, and then scaring their Arms sent them away to tell their King what they had seen; for he thought now the Enemy to have left Issus, and fled for fear of him, and for that reason hastened over the Hill Pinarus, thinking to fall upon him in the Rear. Alexander knowing for certain that he was passed by, took thence occasion to encourage his Soldiers, who now could not be overmatched by Multitudes, and sending a party of Horse to view the Straights, returned thither by Night, and repulsed himself of them. Then refreshing his men for the rest of the Night, he set a strong Watch upon the Rock, and in the Morning went down into the path, and set his Army in order for a Battle.

The Battle of Issus.

35. This being done the Armies joined ere long, and Alexander seeing where Darius was, made towards him, which when Oxyathres the Brother of Darius saw, to prevent him, he placed a Company of most valiant Horse-men before the Chariot, which cut off many of Alexander his men, who pressed forwards. But the Macedonians giving way to none in Valour, with great violence broke in amongst them, and then a mighty slaughter followed, and a great heap of Carcases lay before Darius his Chariot. Many of the most noble Captains amongst the Persians fell, some of the Macedonians, and Alexander himself received a wound in his Thigh. Darius his Chariot Horses being wounded with Spears began to fling, and threatened the overturning of him, when fearing he should be taken alive he leaped out, and mounting on Horse-back, he cast away his royal Apparel, and shifted for himself, after which his Cavalry was put to the rout and ran away. The Infantry discouraged herewith made no considerable opposition, the great multitudes being unserviceable in so fright and precipitous a place, and being put to the rout so hindred the flight, and trode one another down, that more damage accrued hence than from the meer strength of the Enemy. Of the Persian Horse Arrianus writeth ten thousand to have been slain, and of the Foot ninety thousand, with whom others consent as to the number of the Horse, but as to the Foot there is little agreement, some accounting more, and others less: forty thousand are reported to have been taken.

36. Of Alexander's men five hundred and four Curtius saith were wounded; thirty two Foot-men were slain, and of Horse-men one hundred and fifty, which some reckon less by twenty, though another increaseth them to three hundred. Alexander following the Chace was forced to pass with his Phalange over the Enemies dead Bodies, and with one thousand Horse did great execution, but was not able to reach Darius, who rode upon a Mare that had a Foal left at home, and therefore ran with more speed, he being accustomed to have some kept for such necessities. His Tents were easily taken, and therein his Mother, Wife, Son, and two Daughters; but of Money not above thirty thousand Talents; the rest being sent before-hand to Damascus. The Women hearing that Alexander was returned with the Robe of Darius, made great lamentation, which he understanding, sent Leonatus to them to put them out of fear as to his Death; to promise them the maintenance of their former dignity, and a Visit from him to be made the next morning. As soon as it was light, he went to them with Hephæstion his greatest Favourite, both whom when the Mother of Darius saw, and knew not which was the King, he made reverence to Hephæstion, as seeming to her from the worth of his Clothes to be the greater person, which when she understood to have been amiss, was troubled at it, and asked his pardon; to which he answered, smiling: Be not troubled Mother, for he also is Alexander. This Battle of Issus was fought in the Month Mamastirion, Nicostratus (or Nicostrates) being Archon at Athens, in the fourth year of the one hundred and eleventh Olympiad, the fourth of the reign of Darius, and the fourth of Alexander. Sect. 4.

37. Alexander, after this victory, marched for Syria, and sent Parmentio before him to Damascus to seize upon Darius his Treasure, which by Cophenes the Keeper thereof was betrayed into his hands, and for that he was rewarded with death by one of his Complices, who sent his head to Darius. Of Coyne here was found two thousand and six hundred Talents besides five hundred pound weight of Bullion, and a World of other riches. Of men and women thirty thousand were also taken with seven thousand beasts that carried burthens. Then was Parmentio sent to seize upon the Persian Fleet, and others to take in the Cities of Syria, which upon the report of the success of the battle at Issus was easily done, the Governours of Darius yielding themselves with their Treasures. As Alexander travelled into Syria, many petty Kings met him adorned with their Diadems, whereof some he received into friendship, and others he deprived of their principalities, as they had deserved of him. When he came to the City Marashon, he received Letters from Darius, wherein he desired the ransom of his Wife, Mother, and Children, and offered other conditions of peace; but such as rather became a Conquerour, than one that had now been thrice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing, in his direction to Alexander, the Title of King. He disdained his offers, justified his War from the invasion of Greece by the former Persian Kings, and the treachery of Darius himself; who hired one to murder him, as Philip his father had formerly been killed by some set on by them. He promised him his relations without Ransom, if he would come himself as a Suppliant for them, and safe conduct, both knowing, as he said, to overcome, and shew favour to the Conquered. And the next time he wrote he bad him remember that he did it not only to a King, but to his own King also.

38. Alexander marched to Byblus, which yielded to him upon composition, and thence to Sidon, the inhabitants of which being so hardly used formerly by Ochus, in hatred of the Persians sent for him. The King of Sidon was one Strato, who being the son of Gerosstratus the King of Aradus the Island, Governed it in his absence (he joyning his ships, as the rest of the Phœnician Kings, to the fleet of Darius) and meeting Alexander as he came into Phœnicia, put a Golden Crown on his head, and gave up Aradus, and Marathus, a great and wealthy Town, standing upon the Continent over against it, with Mariame, and all that belonged unto them, into his hands. But now because he had done this rather for that the will of the people was such, than out of his own inclination, Alexander deprived him of his Kingdom, and permitted his beloved Hephæstion to bestow it upon any of his friends. He chose to confer it upon a Sidonian by whom he was entertained; but he refused it, for that it was unlawful for any but one of the Royal stock to possess it. He wondering at the greatness of his spirit, joynd with so much honesty, bid him choose any one of the Royal Race on whom to bestow it, who accordingly made choice of Abdalmor (or Abdalmomius) a poor Gardiner who wrought for his living, but of unblameable life, and defended of the Royal family. Alexander admitting of him, said, the habit of his body could not hinder the nobleness of his stock, but desired to know with what patience he had endured such poverty, to whom he answered, That he wished he could as well bear a Kingdom, and that those his hands had satisfied his desire: whilst he had nothing, nothing was wanting to him. The King being much taken with his carriage, not only gave him the house-hold stuff of Strato, but most of the booty got from the Persians, subjected the Country adjacent unto his power, and afterwards also the City of Tyre, according to Diodorus.

39. Now was all Syria in the hands of the Macedonians, and whole Phœnicia also except Tyre, which City was seated in an Island about half a mile distant from the Continent. As he marched thitherwards, the Tyrians sent him a Crown of Gold of great value, in a Congratulatory way, and a large quantity of provisions; which he received as from friends, and friendly signified to the Messengers his intention to go into their City, to pay some vows he had made to Hercules. They told him there was a Temple of Hercules without the City, in the place called Old Tyre, wherein his devotion would be most suitably performed, and so dissuaded him from entrance, that he was enraged thereat, and threatened ruin to the City, telling them, that though they were confident in the strength of the place, and despised his Land Army, yet in short time he would make them find they were in the Continent. And in confidence that their Town, not only fenced with high and strong Walls, but also with the Sea, was impregnable, they resolved to stand out against him, being encouraged also by the Carthaginian Ambassadors, who after their yearly custom (in token of observance to their Mother City) were come to celebrate the sacred Anniversary, and promised them certain, and speedy supply by Sea, which for the most part at that time was commanded by their Fleets.

40. Alexander yet having not his Navy at hand; and foreseeing that a long siege would be a great hindrance to his designs, sent to them about an agreement; but contrary to the Law of Nations, they slew the Messengers, and cast them into the Sea, with which affront being much moved, he resolved to besiege them. Ere he could do this, such a quantity of earth or other matter was to be cast into the Sea, as to join the Island to the main land, which by reason of the depth of the water, and the force of the Current, was a task almost insuperable; but there being great store of stones and rubbish at hand in Old Tyre, he caused it to be utterly demolished, and by the hands of many thousands of his own men, and the people of the neighbouring places, set upon the work. The Tyrians (whose King Acelmicus being absent with Darius his Admiral, had left them to the Government of his son) hindered it all ways possible, and when it was near concluded, a violent wind spoiled a great part of it, but to repair it he caused great Trees to be cut down in the Mountains, which together with the boughs cast in, and earth heaped upon them, resisted the violence of the waves, and at length by the great number of hands, and incredible industry, the Island became a Peninsula. But for all this, the Tyrians having the command of the Sea, their City seemed yet to be impregnable, whereupon Alexander had thoughts of gathering together a Fleet; but in the mean time came in the Kings of Aradus and Byblus, who had withdrawn themselves with their Fleet from Antiochades the Persian Admiral, and with them the Sidonian Gallies. Besides these Vessels belonging to Phenicia (which were eighty in number) at the same time came ten from Rhodes, from Solos and Mallos three, and from Lycia ten, besides one great Gally from Macedonia. All these he pardoned, as having been necessitated to join with the Persians. And Acelmicus the King of Tyre now left Antiochades and came home; Arrianus writing that he was taken in the City.

41. From the Mountain Libanus was wood brought for the making of Engines, Towers, and Ships, in which work whilst Alexander his men were employed, some of the wild Arabians fell upon them, slew thirty, and took scarcely so many. He upon notice hereof left the charge of the Siege to Perdicas, and Craterus, and speedily with a ready Band of men went into Arabia, where when they came to the mountainous parts of the Hill called Antilibanus, they left their Hories and marched on foot. When it grew night, and the Enemy, approached, though his men were before, yet would he not leave his School-master Lysimachus being weary and spent, but still drawing him on was parted from the Army, and forced with a few about him to pass the night in a dark and cold place. But fencing many fires to be kindled afar off by the Enemy, he being nimble of body ran to one of them, and killing two Barbarians that there fate, brought away a fire-stick burning to his Companions, who therewith kindled a great fire, and struck such a terror into the Arabians, as all that night they passed in quietness. Then partly by force and partly by agreement he reduced the Country into obedience, and in eleven days time returned to Sidon, where he found arrived out of Peleponnesus four thousand Greekish Mercenaries, under the conduct of Alexander the Son of Polemocrates.

42. Having then got together a Navy of an hundred and ninety or two hundred ships, he set sail from Sidon and came to Tyre, the Inhabitants whereof refused to fight by Sea, but yet abated none of their courage, though thirty Messengers were come from Carthage to let them know, that that State being hindered by a domestic War, could not afford them any succour. They sent their wives and children thither to be out of the danger, being thereby the more willing to undergo any themselves, which they little regarded, making stout resistance, but at length the City was taken, one faith by treachery, another by a stratagem, but more by plain force; Alexander himself alone first going down from the wooden Tower he had reared, by a bridge laid upon the Wall. The Inhabitants, though the Enemy had entred, called one upon another, and fortifying the narrow passages stood out still, till the number of seven thousand (the most of those that fought) were slain. The Conquerour condemned the women and children that were found unto bondage, the young men to the number of two thousand he caused to be hanged all along the Shore, or crucified, as another telleth us, (which was accounted a fervile kind of death) because the Tyrian Slaves had formerly conspired against their Masters, and slain them all with their whole Families, leaving no free people alive, except one Sirato and his Son, to whom and his Posterity they committed the Kingdom. Fifteen thousand the Sidonians saved upon the account of Kindred (they reckoning both Tyre and Sidon to have been built by Agenor) from whom the City was again re-peopled, and to such as had fled to the Temple of Hercules, Alexander granted indemnity, amongst which the King and his Family were, with some Carthaginians which were come for the Honour of Hercules to the Metropolis. This befel Tyre in the Month Hecatombæon, when Amnicus (otherwise called Niceratus and Nicetas) was Archon at Athens, in the first year of the hundred and twelfth Olympiad, the first of Darius, and the fifth of Alexander, A. M. 3673.

43. During this Siege, the Officers of Darius which escaped from the Battle at Issus, with all those that followed them, and the youth of the Cappadocians, and Paphlagonians, attempted to recover Lydia; but Antigonus who there commanded for Alexander overthrew them thrice in several places. At the same time also Aristimenes, who was sent with some Ships by Darius to recover the Coast of Asia, lying upon the Hellespont, was wholly defeated by a Fleet of Macedonians which Alexander had sent for out of Greece.

44. Whilst Alexander lay before Tyre, another Ambassage came to him from Darius, who now offered him ten thousand Talents as a Ransom for his Relations, and all Asia betwixt the Hellespont and the River Halys in Dower with his Daughter; which Conditions that he might incline him to receive, he set before him the difficulties of passing into the eastern Countries, and laid the loss of the last Battle to the straightness of the place: he sought to terrify him by threatening to incamp him in the plain Countries, and bade him consider how impossible it was to pass the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with things of the like nature. The Proposals being brought before a select Committee of Alexander's Friends, Parmenio who was now old, and full of Riches and Honour, said, that if he were Alexander, he would accept of them, to which the King answered, that so would he, if he were Parmenio. But he returned answer to Darius, that he offered him nothing but his own, and what Victory and his own Valour had posset him of; that he was to give Conditions and not to receive any, and that having passed the Sea it self, he disdain'd to think of resistance in transporting his Army over Rivers. As for his Daughter, he said he would marry her, though without his consent, and if he would taste of his humanity, he should come and refer himself to him. Darius having received this Answer, prepared himself anew for the War.

45. Tyre being taken, Alexander invaded Judæa, resolving to bring all Palestine into subjection. At this time Fadus was the High-Priest there, whose Brother Manasse married Nicasa the Daughter of Sanballat, who had been sent from Darius to govern Samaria, being both Sons to Fohn, called in Nehemiah, Fonthaban, and Fohanan, who was Son to Fehoiada. Manasse thus marching himself, the People was displeased at it, and Fadus desired him to put away his Wife; not only the People but the Law so requiring it. Hereupon he repaired to his Father in Law, and told him, that his Wife was dear unto him; but he must either part with her or his Priest-hood, who answered that he would so bring it about, that he should not only be Priest, but an High-Priest also, being minded to build for him upon Mount Gerizim near to Samaria a Temple like to that of Jerusalem, which thing he would obtain to be confirmed by Darius. Many betook themselves to Manasse, being allured with the Newness of the thing, and the liberality of Sanballat; but Alexander at that time passing the Hellespont, the consultation thereupon was disturbed. After Darius was beaten and retired back into Persia, Sanballat revolted unto Alexander, and going over to him with eight thousand men, though now very old, desired of him leave to build this new designed Temple, persuading him it would be for his interest, that thereby the Jews being divided amongst themselves, might be the less able to resist him. Alexander yielding to his request, he returned, and falling with great industry upon the work, he died not long after.

46. This was at such time as Alexander lay before Tyre, during which Siege, he sent round about to demand an Oath of Allegiance, and Assistance from the several Cities, and amongst the rest the Messengers came to Jerusalem. Fadus or Fadus the High-Priest answered, that he had entred by Oath into

SECT. 4.

Alexander invadeth Judea.

But his wrath is appeased.

Society with Darius, and whilst he lived he might not by any means break his Faith, with which answer Alexander being moved, after the taking of Tyre (not of Gaza as Fosephus thinketh, for then he must have returned backwards) he invaded Judea. The High-Priest and People then looked for nothing but Ruine, but he imploring the assistance of God, was warned in a dream to go out and meet him, adorned with his Pontifical Vestments, with the Levites and People, as in a solemn Procession. Alexander meeting this long Train, lighted from his Horse, and adored the Priest, at which thing all the rest being amazed, Parmentio asked him the reason thereof, to whom he answered, that he worshipped not the Priest, but the God whom he served, for that whilst he was yet in Greece, and consulted about his Expedition into Asia, such an one appeared to him, advised him to it, and promised him success. Then going up to the City he ascended to the Temple, and sacrificed according to the directions of the Priest, who shewed him the Prophecy of Daniel, wherein was foretold, that a Græcian should obtain the Empire of the Persians. He accounting himself the man rejoiced thereat, and the next day offered to the People whatsoever they would ask of him, who requested that they might live after their own Laws and Customs, that on every seventh year in which they sowed not, they might pay no Tribute, and that such of their Country-men as inhabited Babylon and Media, might also be left to their own Laws, all which he readily granted them. He offered them also, if they would follow him, the freedom of the exercise of their Religion, whereupon many gave their Names to the Expedition; and then leading his Forces to the neighbouring Cities, he was friendly received by them.

47. The Samaritans met him in the way, desiring him to visit their City Scima, (situated at the foot of the Hill Gerizim, and inhabited by the Runagates of the Fenish Nation) to honour their Temple with his presence, and to remit to them also the tribute of every seventh year, they sowing not therein; for that they were Hebrews, though not Jews, as descended of Joseph and his two Sons Ephraim and Manasseh, all which he referred to his return. By this time his Officers had recovered several places that had revolted, as Callus, Paphlagonia, Antigonus, Lycæonia; and Balarus, Miletus, after he had overthrown Idarnes the Captain of Darius. Cilicia he had committed to the care of Sofrates, and the Country about Tyre to Philotas the son of Parmentio, who had delivered his charge of Cebestis to Andromachus, that he might follow the Expedition. All the Towns of Palestine he had got now into his hands, except Gaza, which Batis the Eunuch resolved to hold out against him. This was a City distant from the Sea about two miles and an half, of difficult access by reason of the depth of sand about it, the Sea near unto it being very muddy; it was large, seated upon an high Rock, and compassed with a strong wall. Hitherto, having commanded Hephæstion to go before with the Fleet, he came, and fate down before it with all his Forces.

48. Having viewed the situation of the City, he resolved that light kind of earth to be fit for receiving of mines, which he commanded presently to be attempted, and seeing that no wooden turrets could be erected by the walls because of the looseness of the sand, he made a great heap of earth and stones to be laid, which equalled the height of the walls, on which he planted his Engines for battering. By the advice of Artabanus his Prophet, he contained himself for a time without the reach of the Arrows, but the Arabians whom Batis the Governour (called Babernes by Fosephus) had hired, issuing forth set fire to the Engines, and beat away the Macedonians from the Mount, upon which he ran in with the Targeteers to the rescue, and kept his men from running, but he himself received a wound on his shoulder. Afterwards those Engines being come by water with which he had taken Tyre, he caused the whole City to be surrounded with mounts two furlongs broad, and two hundred and fifty foot high, whereby confisting both with Engines above ground and below, at length after two months it was taken, the wall being broken by a Mine, at which breach the Macedonians entered. Alexander himself led in his men, and when his former wound was not yet quite cured, received a bruise on his thigh with a stone. The defendants retired not from their places, but fighting to the last, were all slain to the number of ten thousand. The women and children the Conquerour made Slaves, and furnishing the City with a new Colony gathered out of the places adjacent, used it as a Garrison in the War.

49. From Gaza he sent Amyntas the Son of Andremo with ten Gallies into

SECT. 4.

He marched for Egypt.

Macedonia, to make a Levie of the stoutest young men, and bring them over, because the War though prosperous, wasted his old stock of Soldiers, and he could not so well trust foreigners as his own subjects. Then marched he frain for Egypt, and the seventh day after his removal from Gaza arrived at that place, afterwards called Alexanders-Camp, and came to Pelufium. Here met him great multitudes of Egyptians, who being weary of the insolence and avarice of the Persians, expected his coming, and gladly received him. Placing a Garrison in Pelufium, and commanding that the Ships should sayl up the River to Memphis, he having the Nile on his right hand, came, through the desert to Heliopolis, and thence crossing the River, unto Memphis, which when he approached, Masaces the Persian Governour met him, and delivered into his hands eight hundred Talents, with all the royal household-stuff. Here he sacrificed to all the Egyptian Gods, and celebrated Games, and then sayled down the River to the Sea; and when he came to Canopus sayled about the Lake Mareotis, betwixt which and the Egyptian Sea, he chose out a place whereon to build a City, which he would have called after himself Alexandria.

50. In this place towards the Sea and Haven stood once a Village named Rhacotis. When the figure of the new City was to be delineated, for want of Chalk, they marked out the ground with Meal, which presently was seized upon by an innumerable company of Fowls of all sorts, that from the Sea and Lake came flocking thither, and devoured it all. Hereat the King was discouraged, but his Prophets told him, that it signified the City should be exceeding populous and wealthy, and nourish all sorts of men. He himself designed in what place the Forum should be, and where the Temples that were to be Consecrated to the Egyptian and Græcian Gods, and herein used the skill of that noble Architect Dinocrates (called also Stasistrate) who was employed by the Ephesians, in restoring their Temple formerly consumed with fire. This (afterwards Famous) City was founded by Alexander in the fifth year of his Reign, and the first of the hundred and twelfth Olympiad, the four hundred and seventeenth of Nabonassar, from which year, the moneth Thuth, as also the fifth of Darius, the supputation of the years of Alexander is begun by Ptolomy the Mathematician, and a Native of this City. A. M. 3673. three hundred twenty nine years before the Abra of Christ.

51. Leaving the care of his new designed City to fit Overseers, he took a journey toward the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon, situate in the vast sandy deserts of Libya, because he had heard that Perses and Hercules had formerly gone thither; or to know his fortune, or that he might at least have occasion to boast of his knowledge of it. In the midst of his way he encountered Ambassadors, sent to him from the Cyreneans, who brought a Crown with other great gifts, amongst which were three hundred excellent horses trained up and taught for the War; which receiving in good part, he entered into confederacy with them. Two great dangers especially to be met with in this journey, viz. want of water in so dry a place, and of being overwhelmed by heaps of sand, which the South-wind threw upon fifty thousand of Cambyses his army, he escaped wonderfully by abundance of rain which is said to have fallen, whereby the way was made more firm and passable; and two Crows are reported to have been his Guides, and in the night time when they could not be seen, by their croaking to have given notice which way they tended. When he arrived at the Temple, the Priest, either hired to it, or mistaking the Greek language as it is thought, saluted him by the name of Jupiter's son. Hereupon he took the name upon him, and to his Mother Olympias as well as others wrote with that Title. She facetiously checked him for flandering, and bringing her in danger with Juno, by making her an Whore to Jupiter. By the terror hereof he hoped to do wonders with the Barbarians, and because Hammon was painted with the upper part like a Ram, and the nether like a man, he also would appear to be horned, for which reason amongst the Arabians he obtained the name of Dulcarnain. When he received an answer satisfactory, as he pretended, he returned into Egypt the same way he came, or, as another wrote, by a more direct one towards Memphis.

52. Being come to Memphis, he received many Embassies from Greece; whence also came a new supply of Forces, viz. four hundred Greekish Mercenaries from Antipater, and five hundred horie out of Theffaly. The neighbouring Cities he exhausted for the peopling his new one, which he ordained should be the Metropolis of Egypt. Amongst other sorts of people the Jews also whose fidelity he approved, were enrolled inhabitants, having equal privilege with

He greatly desired to see not only the remoter parts of Egypt, but Ethiopia also: but the War depending yet with Darius, hindered him, and therefore disposing of Egypt, he removed in the Spring to Tyre in Phœnicia. Over Egypt he left Aschylus the Rhodian, and Pencestes the Macedonian, with four thousand Souldiers; and the care of the River Nile he committed to Polemon, with thirty Gallies. As for the Civil Government, he left it to Dolaspes the Egyptian, to rule according to the ancient Laws.

53. Ere his departure, he understood of the death of Andromachus the Governor of Syria, whom the Samaritans had burnt alive. With all expedition he removed to revenge his death, but being on his way, the murderers were delivered up to him, whom he punished according to their deserts, and placed Memnon in his Room. Taking the City Samaris, he gave it to the Macedonians to inhabit, but the Country about it to the Fews, for their fidelity to him, with immunity from Tribute. Coming to Tyre, he celebrated Games, as he had done at Memphis, and sacrificed again to Hercules; and nominating several Governors over the places already Conquered, took his journey towards Euphrates.

54. Darius having understood of his design, to find him out whithersoever he should go, gave out orders for all his Forces to meet at Babylon, whereof some consisted of such Nations as rather seemed to fill up the names of men than to make resistance. This Army being almost greater by the half than that which perished at Issus, many Souldiers wanted Arms, which were sought for with all diligence. Some have reckoned one Million of Foot, and four hundred thousand Horse, besides two hundred Chariots, and fifteen Indian Elephants; whereas Alexander his Forces amounted but to Fourty thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse. In the month Ecatombæon Alexander came to Thapsacus, where he found two bridges on the River Euphrates; but such as reached not quite over to the further side. Mazeus was sent thither to hinder his passage, with order also if he could not do this, to spoil, and destroy all things in his way; but upon his approach he made haste away, and Alexander then making up the bridges, transported over all his Forces, and so proceeding through Mesopotamia, having Euphrates and the Armenian Mountains on his left hand, made for Babylon, not the nearest way, but that which was more convenient for provision and moderation of heat. As he went forwards, he was given to understand by some Scouts which he took, that the King had pitch't his Camp on the further side of the River Tigris, with intentions to hinder his passage, but coming thither, he neither found him, nor any opposition at all. This River was so swift (being upon that account by the Persians called the Arrow) that by the violent force of its stream it drave many weighty stones before it, and those that lay in the bottom were made so round, and well polished by continual rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing, so that the Macedonian foot-men to wade the River, were forced to enterlace their Arms, thereby making one weighty body to resist the fury of the stream; so deep the Channel was on the further side, that to keep their Bowes from being wet, as also their Arrows, and Darts, they were inforced to lift them above their heads, so that Darius might here have easily resisted the Macedonians, and given a check to the fortune of the Conqueror, had not the fate of the dying Persian Empire befotred his mind, and deprived him even of all common prudence.

55. Having (though with great danger) passed the River without any loss save of a little of the Baggage, he led on through Allyria, having on the right hand the River Tigris; and on the left the Gordian Mountains. On the fourth day after his passage Mazeus sent a party of one thousand Horse to attack him, which was easily repelled by the Pæonian Captain Arifon, who slew their Captain, and bringing his head to Alexander, demanded a Cup of Gold as his fee, according to the custom of their Country, to whom he replied, smiling, That an empty one was due, but he would give him one full of good Liqueur. Two days he here continued, giving orders for a march the next morning; but it hapned that in the first watch the Moon was eclipsed, and seemed of a bloody colour, whereto (as all other common people long time after) the Macedonians, not knowing the cause, were marvelously affrighted. They apprehended it as a certain token, or preface of their overthrow and destruction, and began to murmur, that for the ambition of one man that disinclined to own Philip for his father, and would be called the son of Jupiter, they should all perish, being forced to make War, not only against Worlds of Enemies, But against Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themselves. He knowing it to be dangerous to lead his Army to fight whilst it was possessed with matter of terror, called the Egyptian Astrologers, to assure them that this Eclipse was rather a certain preface of good success: and he made it out only by this reason, that the Gracians were under the Aspect of the Sun, and the Persians of the Moon; and therefore the Moon failing and being thus darkened, the Persian glory was to be eclipsed. Artabanus the Southlayer affirmed the same, promised Alexander good success, and affirmed a battel was to be fought in that same month, for the sacrifices portended victory. Hereby the Souldiers were settled, and their courage redoubled, according to the great influence of superstition upon the common sort of people.

56. Thinking it wisdom to make use of the present disposition of their minds he marched thence, and proceeded, till he heard that Darius was not much above twenty miles distant from him, upon notice wherof he rested there his Army for four days. Here were intercepted Letters written by Darius to the Gracians, to persuade them to kill, or betray him, which by the advice of Parnenio he suppressed, and removing thence it hapned that Statira, the Wife and Sister of Darius, through the tediousness of the journey, and grief, fell into untimely travel, and died; at which disaster Alexander shed tears, and spared no cost in solemnizing her Funerals, grieving that he was thus deprived of so fair an occasion of shewing mercy. One of her Chamberlaines, by name Tires, an Eunuch, slipped away, and carried the news of her death unto Darius. He fell of beating his head, and deplored the fortune of the Persians, which not only suffered the Queen to be taken Captive, but dying in that condition to want the Ornament of a Royal Funeral. Being satisfied that there was no want of any such Ceremonies, or of tears from his Enemy to bedew her Hearse, he fell into a jealous conceit that nothing but unchaste affections had drawn them from Alexander, and lamented his Wife's condition, who had been subjected to the lustful power of the Conqueror. But being with much ado persuaded of his continency, with hands lifted up to Heaven, he prayed that he himself might be able to restore the full return of the Persians to his posterity as he found it, that so he might be in capacity to requite Alexander for his noble carriage towards his relations: But if the fatal time was come, and it so seemed good to Nemesis, and the vicissitude of worldly things, that the Persian Empire should receive its period; that none but Alexander might sit in the Throne of Cyrus.

57. He dispatched away to him then another Embassy of ten of his principal friends, and offered him for his Mother, and two Daughters at Random of thirty thousand Talents, and in portion with his Daughter Statira all Asia, betwixt the Hellepont and the River Euphrates. He answered, that sometimes he endeavoured to corrupt his friends, and otherwhiles his Soldiers to destroy him, and that therefore he was to be profecuted nor as a just and fair enemy, but as a pernicious murderer: that what he had already got, though now offered to him, was the reward of War, by which the bounds of both their Kingdoms should be limited, and that they should both abide by what the fortune of the next day should assign them. Darius had before this come to Abela a City belonging to Babylon, where leaving the greatest part of his baggage, he went to the River Lycus, over which making a Bridge, he transported his Army in eight days, and proceeding ten miles pitch't his Camp upon the River Bumelus, near to a Village called Gangamela, which in the Persian Language signified the house of a Camel; for that Darius the Son of Hystaspes gave this place to the maintenance of a certain Camel which had been tired in carrying his provisions through the Desarts of Scythia. This was a Champaign Country and such ground; as were high he caused to be levelled, to be convenient for the fighting of his Horse, and that he might have a free prospect round about him.

58. Understanding from his Ambassadors returning, that he must expect nothing but a battel, he sent Mazeus to defend a passage which he never yet dared so much as to hazard; the rest of the Army he caused to march above a mile farther in battel-array, and there to expect the Enemy. Alexander fortifying his Camp

Camp which he left with an ordinary Guard, went forwards towards the Enemy, and in his march a pannick fear seized on his Army, by reason of the Lightning of the Heavens in the Summer-season, which they took as proceeding from some attempt of Darius; with some pains he undeceived them, and thought good to fortifie himself in the same place that night. Yet in the night he departed thence about the second watch, as thinking to fall on the Enemy by break of day. Upon his approach Mazæus with his Horse forsook an Hill which he had seized, and returned to Darius, and this place Alexander by the advice of Parmentio chose himself, as safer than the Plain, and from which one might take a full view of the Persian Army. Before the Fight his friends came to him and complained of the Soldiers, because in their conferences they had agreed to take all the profit of the plunder to themselves, without bringing any thing to his Treasury; whereat he smiled, and said, they told him good news concerning the discourses of such as were resolved to overcome, and not to flee. Many then of the Soldiers resorted to him, and bad him be of good cheer, and not be afraid of the multitude of the Enemies, which would not endure their very shouting for the battle.

59. The two Armies lying in the view of each other, in the eleventh night after the Eclipse of the Moon, Darius kept all his men in Arms, multi'ring his Forces by torch-light, which made all the Plain betwixt Niphates and the Gordyeen mountains be of a flame. Alexander in the mean time whilst his Macedonians took their rest, was busie in his sacrifice with Aristander. Parmentio and others would have had him fallen upon the Persians in the dead of the night, thereby to strike more terror into them; but he answered, them, that he would not seek Victory; which Darius was afraid of, and therefore contained his men in Arms all the night, which not a little injured his affairs the day following. All the night Alexander passed without rest, being careful for the main chance; but about the morning watch fell to fast asleep, that it being full day he could hardly be awaked, and to his friends demanding the cause thereof he replied, that now he was eased by Darius of all his care, seeing he had gathered all his Forces into one place, and therefore in one day he hoped to put an end to his daily labours and danger. His whole force consisted of about seven thousand Horse, and fourty thousand Foot, over which his chieftest Captains were Parmentio, with Philotas and Nicanor his Sons, whereof this commanded the Foot-Regiment of the Argyraspidæ, or Silver-Shields; Cæsus, who commanded the Elimiots; Perdiccas Captain of the Orestæ and Lyneestæ; Melesager; Polysperchon; Hephæstion Captain of his Life-guard; Menidas; Philip the Son of Balacrus; Craterus; Erigyus the Mitylenean; Philip that headed the Thessalian Troops, and Clytus the black who led the Kings Regiment. He himself commanded the right wing, and in both caused the battel to be made something bending-wife, lest they should be incompass'd with the multitudes of the Persians.

60. Darius having marshalled his men according to their several Nations, took the command of the wing opposite to Alexander, and led on against him. After a found to the charge on both sides, and a great shout, the Armies met, and in the first place the scythed Chariots being driven with great fury upon the Macedonians, struck them with great contumelation, for that Mazæus the General of the Horse following the Chariots close, made the charge the more terrible. But the Macedonian phalanx, according to the King's order, beating their Targets with their Spears, made such a noise, that the Horses shrank therewith bore backwards, and retreated for the most part; and though some went still forwards, yet the Macedonians parting asunder, made a lane and let them pass through, but with the loss of many whom the Scythes had caught. After the Arrows and Darts were spent, the Armies came to hand-strokes, wherein the Horse were first engaged. Darius in the left wing was stoutly defended by his followers, who fighting under his eye, laboured all they could with their multitudes to oppress the Macedonians. And Mazæus in the Right wing charging with great valour, at the first onset did great execution. Then sent he a Parry of two thousand Caducians, and one thousand of the choicest Scythian Horse, to fall upon the Enemies Camp, where a great tumult following, some of the captive women took their opportunity, and got away to their friends, but Sigambis Mother to Darius refused to stir, and kept her self quiet in the same place, not thinking it fit to trust her self to the doubtful fortune of an escape, or shew any ingrateful disrespect to Alexander: the Scythians plundered most of the baggage and departed.

60. In the mean while, 'part of' the Horse that fought about Darius, with their multitudes pressed fore upon the Macedonians, and forced their backs, where by the second time the Victory seemed to incline towards the Persians. Alexander seeing how he was concerned to relieve his men, broke out with his own Regiment upon Darius himself, and with a Dart slew his Chariot-driver. The Cour-tiers hereupon crying out, those that were further off supposed the King himself to have been slain, and sterrwith brook themselves to their Heels, which the next seeing fled also for company. The Ranks also about Darius began to be broken, till at length all one side was bared, and then he accounted it time to fly, and therewithal such a Dust was raised, Alexander with his Troops giving the chase, that it could not be discovered which way he fled, using great celerity therein, and for that purpose mounting a Mare that had lately foaled, as he had done before at the battel at Issus. Whilst these things were thus carried in the left Wing, Mazæus in the right fore pressed upon his adversaries, which Parmentio with the Thessalian Horse and others for a time sustained, but being put fore to it, he sent to Alexander for speedy relief. But he could not be found; so that he was forced to use his utmost Skill in making the Thessalians endure the brunt; and at length put the Barbarians to flight, after they were disheartened with the report of their Princes Fortune.

61. Darius with a few in his Company came to the River Lycus, which having passed, when some advised him to break down the Bridge, lest the Enemy should make use thereof in the Pursuit, knowing that if he should do so, he must leave many thousands of his Men as a Prey to him, he answered, that he had rather give way to the pursuers, than take it from those that fled. Here Alexander immediately pursued him, but not being able to reach him, he returned, and sought a more sharp encounter than ever with some Perthians, Adians, and many of the valiantest of the Persians, wherein though he had the better, yet he lost Sixty of his followers, and Hephæstion with Cæsus and Mentidas were wounded. Of the Barbarians (a) one maketh above ninety thousand to have been slain, of the Macedonians five hundred, and many wounded. Another (b) counteth of the former three hundred thousand to have been slain, and a great number taken, with all the Elephants, and such Chariots as were not broken; Yet of Alexander's men but one hundred at most, with one thousand Horse, partly killed outright, and partly heart broken in the chase. A (c) third reckoneth forty thousand Persians, and less than three hundred Macedonians to have been lost. This Battle was fought at Gaugamela a Village situate upon the River Bumelus, which being but an obscure place, the Macedonians to imoble their Victory, gave out that it was at Arbela, a Town of good note, some fifteen Miles distant, beyond the River Lycus. Alexander obtained the Victory on the fifth day of the Month Boedromion, in the sixth year of his Reign, as also the sixth of Darius; Aristophanes (not Aristophanes his Successor, as some mistook) being Archon at Athens, in the second year of the hundredth and twelfth Olympiad. A. M. 3674.

62. Darius fled from the River Lycus to Arbela, where he arrived about midnight, and then concluding that Alexander would march to Babylon and Susa, resolved to flee to the utmost Borders of his Kingdom, there to renew the War; and accordingly withdrew himself into Media, beyond the Mountains of Armenia. About midnight Alexander set forwards for Arbela, hoping to take him there with all his Treasure, but arriving the next day, he found not him, but met with much Treasure, with his Bow and Target. Now seemed the Empire of the Persians to all men to be dissolved, and thereupon Alexander was declared King of Asia, and for joy thereof sacrificed with great magnificence to his Gods, and bestowed Riches, Houses, and Countries upon his Friends. Foreseeing that the Air thereabouts, by reason of the corruption of the dead Bodies might be infectious, he removed with all speed from Arbela towards Babylon, being in his way met with Mazæus the Governour, who gave it up into his Hands, and Bagophanes the Keeper of the Castle and the King's Treasures, lest he should be exceeded by Mazæus, caused the way to be strowed with Flowers and Garlands, silver Altars heaped with Frankincense and other Odours being placed on both sides. The Towns-men came also to meet him, whom he commanded to follow his Rear, and so entered the City and Palace in a Chariot, with his armed men about him. Thirty days he spent in looking over Darius his householdstuff, all which time his Army glured themselves with the conceitments of the Town. Here the Chaldeans shewed him the motions of the Stars, and the appointed vicissitudes of times: and Calisthenes the Philosopher sent into Greece unto Aristotle ( whose cousin-german his Mother was ) the Celestial observations of (a) one thousand nine hundred and three years. He consulted these men about his affairs, and at their desire caused such Temples to be rebuilt, as Xerxes had out of anger destroyed, after his overthrow in Greece. And especially care was taken for that of Belus in the midst of the City, the Ruines of which were so great, that the labour of (a) ten thousand men for two months was required for the clearing of the ground. He commanded all his Soldiers to lay their hands to the work, amongst which the Fews only refused to do it, who thereupon received great incommmodity, till such time as they were discharged of this task by the King, as (c) Hecataeus the Athenian wrote in his Book concerning the Persy, who also at that time lived with Alexander.

63. He committed the charge of the Castle of Babylon to Agathon of Pydnæ; with a Garrison of seven hundred Macedonians, and three hundred Mercenaries, appointing Mazeus the Satrapa of the Country. To Apolodorus of Amphipolis, and Menetes of Pella, he assigned the Government of the Militia of the Satrapies of Babylon, and the other Countries as far as Cilicia, leaving them two thousand Foot, and ten hundred talents of Silver, to hire as many Soldiers as they could; and to Mithrinus who betrayed the Castle of Sardis unto him, he granted Armenia. Of the money which he found at Babylon, to every Macedonian Horse-man he gave seven Mine (each Attick Mine containing an hundred Drachmes, and about three Pound two Shillings six Pence Sterling) and to every stranger five; to every Macedonian Foot-man two; and to every stranger two months pay, for a reward. Then set he forwards from Babylon, and in his way met with a supply of five hundred Horse, and six thousand Foot, sent out of Macedonia, with six hundred Horse out of Thrace, and three thousand five hundred Foot; and out of Peloponnesus four thousand Foot, and three hundred and eighty, (or according to Diodorus little less than one thousand) Horse. These were also accompanied with fifty of the Noblemen's Sons of Macedonia, for a Guard to the Kings person.

64. Drawing near to Susa, he met with the Son of the Satrapa thereof, sent unto him with a Messenger that brought Letters from Philoxenus, whom presently after the Battle at Gangamela he had sent thither. The Letters imported that the Susians had yielded their City to him, and that all the King's Treasure was safe for him, which Abulites the Satrapa sent his Son also to signify, either for that he thought to obtain favour, or as some thought, being underhand ordered by Darius to do so; that Alexander being busied with such Booty, he might have time to consult the better for his own affairs. On the twentieth day after his departure from Babylon he arrived at Susa, where he took possession of betwixt forty and fifty thousand (as is to be gathered from all Authors) Talents of Silver, besides Gold and Rich Furniture. Many things he there found, which Xerxes had brought out of Greece, and amongst the rest the brazen Statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton, which he sent back unto Athenians. He left the Mother and Children of Darius at Susa, with Masters to teach them the Greek Tongue, and then committing the City to the care of Archelaus, the Castle to Xenophilus, the Treasury to Callistratus, and the Satrapa of the Country of Susa to Abulites, in four encampings he came to the River Pasitigris, being resolved to invade Persia.

65. Near to the Country of Susa lieth that of the Ussiens, running out into the Borders of Persia, and leaving a straight passage betwixt it self and the Jassan Dominions. The inhabitants of the low-land Country became without much ado subject to Alexander; but the other with some slaughter he forced to submit; and whereas they demanded money of him which they used to receive from the Kings of Persia for their passage, he imposed a Tribute of one hundred Horses, five hundred Cattle, and thirty thousand Sheep yearly to be paid; they living like Shepherds, and using no Money. After this he committed the Baggage, with the Thessalian Horse, the Mercenaries and Associates, with the rest of the Army that used heavy Armour, to Parmentio, to lead that way into Persia, that was passable with Carriages; and he himself taking the Macedonian Foot with the Horse of the Associates, and others, with all speed marched a nearer one through the hilly Country. Being arrived at the Straights of Persia, he found Artabazanes, a Persian Satrapa, seized thereof, by whom he was repulsed also with some disgrace and loss, being forced to retreat four miles from the Straights; but at length being led by a Shepherd another difficult way, he came upon his Enemies on a sudden; and put them to flight. But Artabazanes in the midst of near forty Horse and five thousand Foot, with great slaughters on both sides broke through the Army of the Macedonians, which on both sides had beset him, and made for Persepolis, the chief City of that Country; but being shut out by those that kept it for the Conqueror, he turned again upon his Enemies, and with great valour renewing the Battle, perished with all his followers.

66. Having private notice from Tristades the Eunuch, Keeper of the Treasure at Persepolis, that they there had an intention to rise if upon hearing of his coming, he took the Horse, and all the Night marched thitherwards. Being a quarter of a mile from the Town, about eight hundred Greacians met him in manner of Suppliants, whom the former Persian Kings had reduced into bondage, and as a token of slavery cut off their Feet, Hands, Ears, or Noses, and having marked them with some Barbarian Letters, kept them as laughing stocks for derision. They besought Alexander, that as he had done by Greece, so he would also deliver them from the cruelty of their Enemies. He offered to send them back; but they rather chose to receive some grounds to live on, than returning home, to carry greater disgrace than comfort to their Relations. To each of them he gave three thousand Drachms and ten Garments, with Cattel, Sheep, and Corn, for the stocking of their Grounds. The next day he called a meeting of his Officers, whom he told that there was no City more inveterate against the Greacians than that, which had been the Seat of the Persian Kings, and that therefore by the destruction of it they were to make a Parentation to their Ancestors. The Town, all besides the Palace, he allowed the Soldiers to plunder, who made a great slaughter of Captives, and got inestimable Riches in that place, which heretofore of all, they had been most secure. Entering the Castle, he received the Treasure which there had been heaped up from the time of Cyrus the Great, containing a great quantity of Gold and Silver. Diodorus saith, he took thence one hundred and twenty Talents, Gold being reckoned at the reckoning of Silver; part of which he employed in the present service of the War, and the rest sent to Susa to be kept.

67. Leaving a Garrison in Persepolis, and a great part of the Army with the baggage there, with one thousand Horse and a party of Foot, he made an invasion into Persia. Much rain fell, and grievous Tempests ensued, but he persevered in his purpose, as also when they came to such places as were full of Snow and Ice; and though the Inhabitants fled from their Cottages to the Mountains, and killed his Stragglers, yet he brought them to submit; and laying waste the Territories of Persia, subdued also the Mardi, a Warlike Nation, differing much from the Customs of the other Persians; and on the thirtieth day returned to Persepolis. Then did he distribute Gifts to his Friends, making no spare of Treasure, and there he wintered four Months, rather enervating than refreshing his Army with the delicacies of the Place. For the Celebration of his Victories he offered magnificent Sacrifices, and Feasted his Friends Princely; and to the Feast admitted Courtisans. Amongst the rest, was Thais the Athenian, the Mistress of Ptolemy, the Son of Lagus. She gave out, that the King would Attchieve a most gallant Enterprize, if, in a Frolicke, he would with them set on fire the Pallace, and thereby, in one moment, overthrow the Glory of the Persians by the Hands of Women. This finding acceptance amongst the younger sort, now in the midst of their Cups, one amongst them desired that they might Revenge the Injuries offered to the Temples of the Greeks with burning Fire-brands, which was seconded by others; but yet they said, that so great an Affair did only belong to Alexander. He being moved herewith, wasled out by Thais in a Dance with the Minstrels, and the receiving a Fire-Brand from him, first set it to the Pallace, after which all the rest followed, and so that Structure was reduced into Ashes. Thus was the Fury of Xerxes against Athenians revenged by a Woman, and Native of that City, in the same way, though accompanied with derision. But Alexander afterward repented too late, alleging that he should more grievously have punished the Persians, by forcing them to behold him seated in the Pallace and Throne of Xerxes.

68. From Persepolis he removed to Pasargada, a City founded by Cyrus the Great, and the ancient Seat of the Persian Kings; which being delivered up to him by Gobabes the Governour, he therein found six thousand Talents. Here he saw the Sepulchre of Cyrus in a Garden, into which he Comanded

Isotulus (who wrote the story) to enter, who there found a Golden Bed, a Table, and Cups, with a Golden Basket, and great store of Apparel, and Robes adorned with Pearl. On this place Cyrus overthrew Atysates the Mede in his last Battle, and thereby obtaining the Sovereignty of Asia, in memorial of it built this City, and a Palace, which being by Curtius named Persejades, or Pasagada, signifieth the Army of the Persians. Then Alexander either by force or fair means, became Master of all the other Cities of Persia, about the time of the rising of the seven Stars, from which the Antients used to begin their Summer. He placed over this Country Phraortes a Satrapa, and then being minded to pursue Darius, set forwards for Media, where he heard he was; but being within three days Journey of Ecbatane, there met him Bisthanes the Son of Oechus, who reigned before Darius. He assured him that the King was gone thence five days before, having taken with him seven or eight thousand Talents, and being accompanied with an Army of six thousand Foot and three thousand Horse.

He cometh to Ecbatane.

What Darius did after the battle of Gargaris.

69. Darius stayed at Ecbatane some time, to receive such of his Soldiers as had escaped the Battle, and for the furnishing of them with Arms. He raised Forces in the Neighbouring Nations, and sent to the Satrapa of Bactria, and the higher Countries to retain them in obedience. And he determined, if Alexander should stay about Babylon or Susa, to continue in Media in expectation of some better change of Fortune: But if he should pursue him, then to betake himself into Parthia, or as far as Bactria, and lay all the Country wait as far as he passed, to cut off provisions from the Pursuer. He sent therefore the Women with all his Furniture and Carriages to the Caspian Straights, and stayed himself with such Forces as he had raised at Ecbatane, till such time as Alexander was within less than two hundred miles of him. Then thought he of Bactria; but fearing to be overtaken by Alexander (against whose celerity no distance seemed to be sufficient) he changed his purpose, and though he fled, yet prepared he himself rather for a Fight than Flight. His Army consisted now (according to Curtius) of thirty thousand Foot (whereof four thousand were Grecians, commanded by Patron, a man for his constant Fidelity to Darius, never enough to be commended) and three thousand three hundred Bactrian Horse, under the Command of Bessus the Satrapa of the Country.

Curtius lib. 5.

70. Alexander being come to Ecbatane, sent back towards the Sea the Thessalian Horse, and other Associates, bestowing on them, besides their full pay, two thousand Talents. To Permenio he gave in charge to bring all the Treasure out of Persia into Ecbatane, to be committed to the trust of Harpalus, whom he left with a Garrison of six thousand Macedonians, besides some Horse, and of the Associates; and then afterwards he ordered him to march through the Country of the Gadusians into Hyrcania. Cltius he Commanded to go with his own Regiment into Parthia, whither he himself intended to come; but now with a select party, with incredible speed pursued Darius, and in eleven Encampings came to Abgae. Here seeing no hope ever to reach him (who before this had passed the Caspian Straights) he stayed five days, and then marched for Parthia, and on the first day pitched his Camp by the Straights, and on the next having entered them, news was brought to him concerning the Captivity of Darius.

Alexander pursued him.

71. For, Bessus the Satrapa of Bactria, and Nabarzanes a Colonel of Horse, though his own Servants rebelled against him, and drawing their Men to their party, caused him to be bound, with an intention if Alexander should overtake them, to curry favour with him by the delivery of such a Prisoner into his hands; but if they should escape, then to kill him, seize upon his Kingdom, and renew the War. They seized on his money and stuff, and taking into their society Braucus, the Satrapa of the Arachai and Drangis, led him away Captive in a Chariot, bound in Golden Fetters, as becometh so great a King; but yet, lest he should be known, they covered the Chariot with baste Skins, and unknown Men drove it, his Keepers following aloof, lest he should be discovered to any that asked of him. The Persians having none now to follow, joynted themselves to the Bactrians, and with the rest owned Bessus for their General. But Arachai with his Sons and Soldiers, as also the Greeks (whose Captain was Patron) separated themselves from them, and taking another way towards the Mountains out of the high Road, departed, and went into Parthia.

72. Upon notice of this Conspiracy, Alexander concluded that more haste was to be used, and therefore taking along with him a party fit for such Expedition, he left the rest of the Army to Craterus to come after with more leisure; and travelling all that Night, and the next day till Noon, gave his men a little time to rest, rest, and then again setting forward, came the next morning to that place where Bagistenes the Babylonian (who brought him notice of the condition of Darius) had departed. Then again marching fast that night, and the day following until noon, he came to the place where Bessus laid hands on Darius, as *one tell us; but * Curtius, as * another, where they that conducted him had rested the day before. Here he met with Melon, Darius his Interpreter, who being sick and not able to follow, now counterfeited himself a Fugitive, and fully acquainted Alexander with the King's Condition. He hereby was further quickened up to use all expedition, but his men spent with continual travel must needs have rest, and therefore he made five hundred Horsemen to dismount, and the Officers of Foot, and others most valiant amongst them to take their Horses, being arrived as before, that so they might be both Horse and Footmen as need should require.

73. Whilst he was thus busied, Orsillas and Mithraenes, two Persians who detected the Parricide of Bessus, came back from him, and acquainted Alexander that he was five hundred Furlongs off, but that they could lead him a nearer way, where by he might soon overtake him. With this Conduct he began his Journey that Night, and being come three hundred Furlongs, encountered Brochelus (or Antibelus) the Governor once of Syria under Darius, who told him that Bessus was but two hundred Furlongs off; that as he thought he made for Hyrcania, and marched out of order as fearing no danger, and therefore might easily be surpris'd. He then continued his industry to overtake him, but he and his Complices had notice of his approach, and coming to Darius, bad him mount on Horseback, and withdraw himself by flight from the Enemy. He refusing to do this, Sasibarzanes and Barzaentes threw darts upon him, and leaving him mortally wounded, wounded also the Horses that drew him, lest they should follow far; and killed two Slaves which accompanied him, having none now to follow him but a Dog which he had brought up. Having done this, the murderers with six hundred fled with full speed, and that they might not venture altogether, Nabarzanes went towards Hyrcania, and Bessus with a few Horsemen in his Company kept on the way for Bactria. The rest of their men straggled as they were led either by hope or fear, five hundred Horsemen imbodyed themselves, not knowing whether to flee, or to receive and fight the pursuing Enemies.

Aelian, Hist. lib. 6. c. 25.

74. But Alexander having notice of the fear and anxiety of the Enemy, sent Nicanor with part of the Horse on before to restrain their flight, he with the rest following after; and when they were come up, so little courage appeared in the Persians, that though they resisted, yet three thousand were presently slain, and the rest straggled about like Sheep, Alexander giving command then to his Soldiers to abstain from slaughters. Now appeared an incredible thing, more Prisoners than they that took them, whilst the Conquered were so stupified, that they neither considered their own multitude, nor the small number of their Enemies. In the mean while, the Beasts that drew Darius having none to drive them, wandered out of the way for half a mile, and being wearied both by their wounds and heat, stood still in a certain Valley. Not far of was a Spring, to which Polystratus a Macedonian being directed, came almost spent with thirst, and whilst he was drinking water in his Helmet, he espied the Horses fainting away, by reason of the darts sticking in their sides, and drawing near to consider of the matter, found Darius in the Chariot sorely wounded, but yet breathing. He desired some water of him to drink, which though none of the best, yet he laid was the best that ever he drank. He prayed him to carry his thanks to Alexander, for his great humanity and courtesy towards his Relations. As for himself, he desired rather a seemly than noble Burial, but bad him put him in mind how dangerous it would be to all Princes to suffer his death to go unpunished. He wished him the Empire of the whole World, and gave his hand to Polystratus as though to be presented to Alexander; after which, wishing him a reward, for his kindness, from the Gods; he expired.

A view of his Reign.

75. This was the end of the Life, Reign, and Empire of Darius, a man who, if we look at warlike matters, was fit for nothing less, but in other things did nothing unbecoming Royal Majesty. And neither could he, for as soon as he began to Reign was he vexed by the Macedonians. Whilst he lived, one Crobus presently succeeded after another; neither could he enjoy any rest from the beginning of his Reign: For within a while after, he received that overthrow on the River Granicus; then lost he Helios, Ionis, and both the Phrygia's; the Lydians also and Carians (all but the Halicarnassians) and not long after Halicarnassus it self, and then all the Maritime Coast as far as Cilicia. After this he received a great overthrow at

Issus,

Sect. 5.

Assus, in which his Mother, Wife, and Children were taken: Phenicia and Egypt fell off from him. At Arbela (or Gangamela) losing a mighty Army consisting of all sorts of people, he disgracefully was forced to flee; then driven from his Kingdom, wandering up and down and wanting due Accommodations, at last he was betrayed by his own Servants, and at the same time both a King and a Captive was ignominiously bound in Fetters, and perished by the treachery of those, from whom he should have expected safety, as Arianus writeth. This happened in the year that Aristophanes was Archon at Athens, in the Month Hecatombion, when he had lived about fifty years, in the seventh year of his Reign, and the two hundred and third of this Empire, in the third year of the hundred and twelfth Olympiad, A. M. 3675, three hundred and twenty eight years before the ordinary Aera of Christ.

76. We have seen the end of Darius, and the Conclusion of the Persian Dominion; but have not yet done with the Persian History and Antiquities; many of which could not be made out nor discovered by the series of those Narrations concerning Cyrus and his Successors, without breaking the order and method thereof; and therefore judging it fit more fully to inform the Reader therein, we shall present him with a prospect of the Polity of that Kingdom, with this Caution and Admonition; that it respects and hath relation also to what followed in after times, when that People shook off the Macedonian Yoke, but became subject to the Parthians, and when they recovered their Liberty, and gave Laws to the Eastern Nations; and therefore we place it here not as an Apparatus to the Persian Empire, but a general Light to their Affairs.

S E C T. V.

The Polity, Customs, and Manners of the Persians.

The King called himself King of Kings.

The Kingdom Hereditary.

1. The Government we see was Monarchical, the Head of which in respect to the great extent of his Dominions, had the Title of Great King, and King of Kings; however toward the Period of their power they were scoffed at, for challenging it, by Alexander and other Greeks. And after that Asaces had overthrown Selenus Callinicus, and brought the Persians under the Parthian Yoke, his Successors took it as an high Affront if it was not given them by the Roman Emperors; inso much that Phraates receiving a Letter from Augustus, directed to him as to bare Phraates, in his Answer took to himself that of King of Kings; and to be even with him, gave him no other than that of Cesar. When the Persians afterward recovered their liberty, and the Persian Kingdom revived, the Kings thereof still challenged it as their due: Particularly Sapor, in a Letter he wrote to Constantinus the Emperor, assumed it together with other lofty Titles, as Ammianus Marcellianus tells us. But this was no more than what Nebuchadonosor had done before.

2. As the Government was Monarchical, so was it Hereditary; the Laws forbidding any to be admitted King, but one of the Royal Line if it had not failed. As herein they were conformable to the best Rules of Prudence, so also to the Dictates both of Prudence and Nature, in that the eldest Son was to be preferred. This was constantly and religiously observed for many Ages, till at length the Kingdom was bestowed at the discretion of the Nobility, yet ever upon one of the Royal Family. Sometimes the First-born after the Father was King, was preferred before the Elder Brother, whose Birth happened when his Father was yet but a private man, as we have seen in the case of Xerxes and his Brother; and long after because Cabades was weak sighted, Cosroes younger than he was advanced to the Throne, it being unlawful for any one to Reign amongst them, that was imperfect or deformed in his Body. Generally Bastards were not regarded when there were any legitimate Sons, and yet some will have Darius Nothus to have been preferred before fore Jogans the Legitimate Son of Artaxerxes. Though the Throne was not wont to be quitted but by Death, yet some Kings have given the Title to their Sons; while yet they lived, and when they went out on any Expedition, they were then wont to declare their Successors. It was the Custom for them to be inaugurated at Pasargada by the Preests of their Nation, in the Temple of a certain Goddess like to Pallas. The solemnity was performed by putting off their own, and putting on the Garments which Cyrus wore when a private Man; eating a lump of Figs, tasting a sort of Turpentine, and drinking a draught of sowre Milk, having first been instructed in the discipline of the Magi. On the new Kings Head was set a Bonnet or Diadem called Cidaris. He was placed in a Royal Chair or Throne, and sometimes would change his Name upon his promotion. Now was he adored by his Subjects as some God upon Earth, or rather the living Image of God. And the Adoration they performed by prostrating themselves on the Ground, which Alexander, after he grew so proud, required of his Macedonians. But Cyrus was the first that required and had it paid unto him; and that as soon as they came into his fight, not only when they were near unto him. And it was paid not only by Subjects but also by Strangers. For if Ambassadors of other Nations refused to give this Adoration, they were not admitted to speak to the King, but dispatched their Business by the Intervention of Messengers. This not only the Fewes, but the Greeks abominated and derided as not due to any mortal Man. But much more reason they would have had to refuse to adore his Image, which being of Gold, all were compelled to do that entered Babylon, in the time of Apollonius.

Now adored and respected.

3. Such as failed or thus adored them, were wont to wish them perpetual Life and Empire, agreeable to that we meet in Scripture, O King live for ever. And they were not to forget when they met them to fold their hands in their sleeves, the neglect whereof cost Autofaces and Mitraus dear, when Cyrus the younger usurped against his Brother. Their their Subjects might better do, because they did it but very seldom; the Persian Kings being very rarely seen abroad, that by conversation they might not become vile and despicable. This gave the greater opportunity to the Magus, who counterfeited Smerdis, to cheat the People, which was wonderfully pleased with Satira the Wife of Artaxerxes for using such freedom, that she would go abroad and be seen in her open litter, and give free access to any of them, and that by order of her Husband, who was more kind in that respect also than his Predecessors. Without leave obtained none could enter the Palace, so that most transacted their Business at Court by Messengers, a grievance from which the Conspirators agreed to free themselves, except the King was private with his Wife, which Exception when Intaphernes disregarded, it cost him his Life. We know from the Book of Ester how it was death to come into the inner Court, except the King was graciously pleased to reach out to the venturing Persons his golden Sceptre. The Nobility were expected to wait before the Gate till they were called in, neither was it safe for them to neglect it. To be sure it was capital for any Subject to sit in the Kings Chair, neither was it lawful to wear his Robe. Nay such respect they challenged from their Subjects, that Artaxerxes Longimanus, forbade that any in hunting should strike a Deer before he had cast his Dart at him.

Looked from the Laws and Absolute.

4. But not only by these Shadows and Ceremonies was the Majesty of the Persian Kings kept from contempt, as with rails and barriers; they enjoyed not only the Shadow but the substance of Sovereignty. For they were loosed from the Laws, so as they might do whatever they listed or lusted, as we have seen in the case of Cambyses, his marrying his Sister. As the Turke at this day most imitates these Patterns of the Persian haughtiness, so their pride in this particular, that all his Subjects he terms and holds as his Slaves; for so did also the Kings of whom we write, their Wives excepted; for, Wives they had who were esteemed of ingenious and free condition, of which amongst the Turkes, none could boast except Roxelana. As they gave to their Subjects no better terms than that of Slaves, so they received from them that of Despots and Lords, which as the People owned them to be, so they obeyed them as such, patiently and piously, as Curtius writes. What Burthens they laid upon them they willingly bore, and esteemed it an Honour rather than an Injury to be beaten at the command of the King. Letters signed with his Seal none dared to contradict; neither was it, or rarely known, that any revealed his Secrets; the reason why Alexander was still uncertain concerning the measures that Darius took, and Ammianus saith they worshipped the Numen or Divinity of Silence. It's certain certain that no nation whatsoever showed more dearneſs and affection to their Princes. They prayed for them; and they came not into their preſence without a preſent, which though never ſo mean was wont to be kindly received. As they travelled, Husband-men and others of the meanest ſort, preſented them with ſuch things as they had, and beſides with the firſt Fruits of the Grounds through which they paſſed. The ſtory of one who preſented Aſuerus Mithras with an Apple of a great bulk, and for it received a great reward; and of another who having nothing elle, brought him ſome Water in both his Hands from the River, Cyrus, is celebrated both by Plutarch and Helian.

The birth Days of their Kings they kept as Holydays, and not only honoured whilst alive, but prosecuted them with the ſame reſpect when taken from them. For their death being known, Noblemen, for the ſpace of five Days, was joyointed, in which, Courts were ſhut up, and Laws were ſilent. Moreover that Fire which every one kept alive in his Houſe, as ſacred and his Tuteſar Deity, upon that occaſion was extinguished. Such Majesty and Power did even the betrayers of Darius own and acknowledging in him as King, that when they deſigned to give him up, they bound him in golden Chains and Fetters. And truly ſuch eſteem the Majesty and Sovereignty of their Kings might challenge from them; but the People, the manner of it eſpecially, being governed by imagination, which receives Impreſſions from Senſe, is wont to be wrought upon by glorious Objects, the Scarlet Gowns of Judges commanding ſuch regard as would not be had unto them if they lay in Cuerpo. Therefore to procure Reverence, the Persian Kings had their Royal Ornaments. Firſt upon their Heads they wore the Tiara, which was common to them with their Subjects, but that of the Kings was ſtraight and upright, whereas theſe of the reſt, fell down upon, or towards the Brow, rolled up or folded. Only to ſeven Conſpirators againſt the Magi, a middle ſort was granted and to their Poſterity, which was prominent in the fore part of the Head, neither upright as that of the Kings, nor falling as the other of the more ordinary ſort; for they were made of Linnen folded, and not of more ſubſtantial or thick Stuff, but as the Turbans of the Etern Nations in preſent uſe. And ſo I am wont to interpret that of the three ſons which were caſt into the fiery Furnace, their being bound in their Hats, as we read it in our preſent Tranſlation; for they were Turbans or Caps wreathed together, which might eaſily be unlooked and become Bandage and Ligaments, not like our ordinary Caps and Hatts. Of the Tiara, we ſhall now only further obſerve that it came down if need were upon the Temples and Cheeks; but this, as we ſaid, was a common wear both of Prince and Subjects.

The peculiar and proper Royal Ornament for the Head was the Cidaris or Citaris, for, by both theſe Names it was called. This though ſome Writers ſeem to confound with the Tiara, yet was diſtinct from, and added to, it, being no other than the Diadem which others mention as proper to the Persian Kings, or a Purple Fillet diſtinguiſhed with white Spots, and perfumed. As the Persian Kings wore this Diadem or Fillet about their Tiara, ſo when Alexander began to take their ſtate upon him, he added it to the Macedonian Cauſa. Long after this Sapor, King of Perſia who lived in the time of Conſtantinus, changed it ſeems the Faſhion of this Cap, for Ammianus Marcellinus writes of him, that he wore upon his Head inſtead of a Diadem, a covering made in the ſhape of a Rams Head, adorned with Gemms, which poſſibly was his peculiar Fancy; though the Tiara was alſo formed into wreaths and rounds, and Sidonius Appollinaris writes of its being horned. But, farther as to other Ornaments, the Persian Kings wore the Stole or a purple Robe which hung down to the Ankles, was exceſſively rich in Gold and precious Stones, and portraited with the Figures of various ſorts of Animals, being in ſhape four ſquare, as the Greek Pallium was, which was plaited and buttoned about the Neck. Beſides theſe they wore a Tunick called Candys, which was common to other Persians; but that of the Kings differed from the reſt, not only in value, but in Colour; for it was of the Sea Purple or Phenician Dye, when their Dominions extended to the Coaſts of that Country, though afterwards in ſtead thereof they were ſupplied out of India. This purple Tunick had a white ſpot in the middle, it hung upon the Shoulders, and had its Sleeves down to the Fingers ends, which the Romans counted eſtimate, and ſo did Alexander, who though he took up the Persian habit reſuſed the Candys, it becoming a Man, in their Opinion, to have his Arms free and diſtinguiſhed. From that Story we read in Suetonius concerning Perſepas his Jeſt about the Comet or Blaſing Star, we may learn that theſe Princes wore their Hair

Haire ſomething long; for, when he heard it was of that ſort called Crimini or ſtreaming forth like Hair, he ſaid it concerned the King of Perſia and not himſelf. They wore Jewels at their Ears; were girt with rich Girdles or Belts; uſed Brachæ or cloſe Breeches, which alſo did the reſt of the Nation, by them called Sarabara, from which Alexander abſtained as from the Candys and Tiara. But in Perſia both Men and Women wore theſe Breeches; however the Macedonians and Romans did diſpiſe them. In concluſion beſides theſe Ornaments, The Kings bore golden Scepters in their Hands, as is evident from the Book of Eſther.

The Kings for their Commodious manner of living, had their Royal Palaces in ſeveral Provinces, to which they removed as their Occaſions or the Season of the Year did urge them. For the Seasons, generally they paſſed the Winter in Babylon, the Spring at Suſa, and the heat of the Summer at Ecbatane. Of Babylon we have ſpoken already. Suſa (in our Tranſlation Shuſhan the Palace) was a City built by Tichonus and his ſon Memnon upon the River Choaspe, and took its name from Lillies wherewith that Region abounds, Suſum in the Persian Tongue ſignifying that Flour. Cyrus made choiſe of it as a place convenient to inhabit, both for its pleaſantneſs and its neighbourhood to the Nations conquered by him; and afterwards it was repaired and very much beautified by Darius, who is therefore by ſome Writers termed the founder of it. As for Ecbatane, it was the Metropolis of Media; and it ſeems they made choiſe of it for the coolneſs of the Air, and why might they not do it, notwithstanding they be laughed at for changing their places and termed Nomades from their flitting from one Region to another, the progrels of Princes being very requiſite for the knowing and redreſſing of the Grievances of their People. Beſides theſe three, they had ſeveral other Manſions, and ſeveral retiring places throughout the Country, which were pleaſantly incompaſſed with Parks and Trees after the beſt Art and Contrivance, of which were moſt eminent Pargade and Perſepolis. The former Cyrus prized above all others, becauſe there he overthrew Aſtyages (where upon it had the name of the Troop or Army of the Persians) and here was part of the Royal Treasures kept. But in Perſepolis was incalculable Wealth heaped up; it being in a manner filled with the Spoils of the (Eaſtern) World. In it was a Caſtle incompaſſed with three Walls wonderful for their height and thickneſs, wherein ſtood the Kings Palace, the Royal Court of Perſia marvellous for its rich Ornaments of Gold and other Materials. Beſides what was beſtowed upon the Houſe it ſelf, here was a golden Throne on which it was capital for any Subject to ſit. The King lay upon a golden Bed, and his Chamber was decked with a Tree of Gold, and moreover a Vine made of Gold, the Grapes whereof were compoſed of precious Stones, being the workmanſhip of Theodorus a Native of Samus.

But rather more remarkable were the Gardens, Groves and Parks adjoining to the Kings Palaces, admirable in their contrivance and planting, and for being ſtocked with all ſorts of wild Beaſts; if wild we may call them that are ſhut up betwixt Walls and Pales. Theſe places of Divertement they in their own Language called Paradiſes, the Romans Frouria, and we Parkes; but in them were kept Bears and Bores, fierce beyond Madneſs it ſelf as Ammianus expreſſeth it: They were well furniſhed with Springs of Water, and had Towers built in them for Receptacles to the Hunters, as ſo many Caſtles of Defence againſt the Violence of the enraged Beaſts. With the variety of Trees and the pleaſant Walkes in theſe Paradiſes, the Persian Princes were wonderfully taken, eſpecially Cyrus the younger, who himſelf contrived one at Sardis, ordered the Walks, framed the Wilderneſſes in them, and ſet many of the Trees with his own Hand: And Alexander after his Conqueſt ſeemed ſo much to be of the ſame mind, that he ſent for ſeveral ſorts of Plants out of Macedonia to increaſe the Perſian ſtore. But wherever the Kings hunted, if they were thirſty and were pleaſed to drink Water, it was no other than that what was taken out of the River Choaspe which ran by Suſa, thence it was fetcht in golden Veſſels, and in them, being boiled, was preferred for their Uſe; being carried along with them whither ſoever they went as the lighteſt in Body, and ſweeteſt of all others. To this Pliny and other Writers joyn the River Eulens as a Companion, which riſing in Media takes it courſe alſo by Suſa, for that we may queſtion whether it was not one and the ſame River; for Solinus alſo writes that theſe Kings would drink of no other Water. If this was ſo ſweet, we may hence perceive the power of Thirſt which cauſed Darius when he was expiring and drank of muddy and ſtinking Water, to say it was the best that ever he had drank in his Life; for, as Cicero well observes, he had (scarce) ever formerly drank thirsting. But as they drank but of one sort of Water, so only one sort of Wine would content them, and that was the Chalchibonian which grew about Damascus in Syria; far sought and deer bought, being it seems, fit for Persian Kings as well as English Ladies. With this it was permitted them to be drunk one day of the Year, which they dedicated to the service of Mithra. Otherwise, it seems that by the Laws they were obliged to this sort of Temperance.

9. But if not Drunkards they might be Gluttons; and yet Xerxes by the Story of Herodotus concerning Magageon one of the Aberites who entertained him, appears to have eaten but once a Day. But it's to be thought this Meal like that of Children, lasted well nigh all the Day long, if he dined betimes; or all the Night if he supped; for if he had dined as well as supped, his Entertainers had not been able to sustain the Charges. What way soever they travelled, their Subjects were wont to entertain them at Supper, all the Cities being obliged to it either by Law or Custom according to their Abilities, for which Money was raised no otherwise than as Tribute; and so great was the expence sometimes, that it amounted to twenty, thirty, Tallents or more. When at their own charge, their Diet was most exquisite and costly. They had of Delicacies which their several Provinces produced, the first Fruits as it were presented to them. They used Oyl made of the Persian Walnut, and another sort made of a Thorne growing in Caramania; but it is observable that amongst all the several Spices, Sawces and Pickles reckoned up by such as write of this Subject, there is no mention made of Pepper and Vinegar, the best of all. Amongst all their Feasts those exceeded which they made on their Birthdays, which they believed to rise to such excellencies, that in their own Language they called them Tyts or Perfect. On those Days they combed and cleaned their Hair, and were wont to give Gifts to their People; neither could they well deny any Petition, then put up unto them. As their Meals were eminent both for quantity and richness of Dishes, so also for cleanliness and neatness in serving thereof. Briflonius gathers from the Hebrew Copy of Ezra that Artaxerxes was served with seven Eunuchs. To be sure such as waited were as clean and neat as Water and rich Clothes could make them. And because the Lives of Princes are precious and in danger, they had their Tasters who when they had given the Liqueur to them, in a Vial, took some of it out with a Spoon or Cup, and pouring it into their left Hands, supped it up. And probable it is that for fear of Poyson they used the same Caution in their Meat as in their Drink, which generally hath been observed by other Kings, though these of Persia some will have first to have introduced the Custom.

10. But upon this account it was that the Office of Cupbearer (enjoyed by Neemias the Lev) was as a place of especial trust, so of great esteem and honour; and so it was in the Court of Alexander where Phillip and Pollas the Sons of Antipater prepared and tasted his Drink. Sufficiently known it is what a number of Butchers, Cooks and other Ministers of the Throat and Palate attended in that of Persia. To this purpose is observable what is told by Athenaeus concerning those that followed the Waggon and Baggage of Darius, and were taken at Damascus by Parmenio. These were two hundred and seventy seven Cooks; of Scullions who made clean Utensils belonging to the Kitchens, twenty nine; thirteen Persons that provided Milk, and seventeen who took order for his Drink, of Cellar Men and such as purified his Wines seventy: of Oylment-makers forty; and such as made Garlands and Ornaments for the Head sixty and six. In the Court a Table daily was furnished as dedicated to the Genius of the King. The Room where he dined was furnished with Women Singers, with which and other sorts of Musick those Princes were wonderfully pleased, as well as with other Meriments at their Meals. For Parmenio wrote to Alexander that after the taking of Damascus he found, besides what we lately mentioned, no fewer than three hundred and twenty one of those Wenches that were Mintrells. When the Table was removed they left singing; but when the King called for Wine they renewed their Melody, and were wont with their vocal and other sorts of Musick all the Night long to lull him on sleep. No sort of Luxury was wanting that could be devised; for rewards were proposed to such as could find them out. Most commonly the King ate at meat by himself, sometimes the Queen with him, and some of his Children: but of Artaxerxes it is said that he took his Mother to the Table, placing her above him, as his Wife beneath him, and that with his Company at Meals, he sometimes honoured Oftanes and Oxates his Brothers.

Guests.

Moreover they were wont at certain Feasts, to entertain their Kindred as the Romans did theirs in their Cheristies; others also sometimes in respect to some notable service, Strangers though they were, who could not be admitted to the Feast of the Kindred; and from the Books of Ezra and Ezra we are informed, that sometimes they entertained their Captains, Satrapas's, and great Officers.

11. But of such as they admitted, some supped within and some without the Room where the King did eat, and from those that supped within, the view of the King was intercepted by an Hanging or Curtain, so as he might see them but could not be seen. The number of his Guests exceeded not that of twelve: As for the order of their sitting, Cyrus placed those he least trusted on his Right Hand, and whom he most trusted on his Left; because the Left Side is most expeditious and least defensive: In like manner, as still at this day amongst the Eastern Nations, it's most honourable to go on the left hand, because such an one hath the advantage, commanding the Sword of his Companion which hangeth on his left Thigh. The honour was great to be thus entertained, and need there was for it, the freedom they enjoyed with it being so little, For look about them they must not, but hang down their Heads, lest any of the Eunuchs should espye them to cast an eye upon some of the King's Women: And they must also forbear all complaints, and take all patiently that was said or done unto them. And yet these Kings were not so insolent as by report were those of the Parthians, their Successors; for if they entertained any of their Friends at meat, the Guests took their Repast on the ground, and fed like Dogs upon what they cast from their Table, which was placed aloft from the floor; Nay sometimes upon some slight account, being taken out of the Room, they were beaten till blood followed; but in that plight were to fall down and worship him that beat them, as having conferred on them some special favour. The Kings of the Parthians did eat by themselves and on an elevated ascent, and they alone as Earthly Gods were served at a Table furnished with foreign meat. Those rather were to be envied to whom the Kings of Persia sent dishes of Meat from their Table, for so they were wont to do to their Friends; which custom was begun by Cyrus, as Xenophon writeth of him. To be sure with great quantities of Meat they were wont to be served, the remainders whereof went to the Waiters and Attendants; for not only their dyet, but also that of Slaves and of the very Dogs, as Plutarch observes from the late mentioned Writer, was served up to the King's Table.

12. For propagation of the Royal Offspring it was permitted the Kings to have several, and those Legitimate Wives. Darius had two daughters of Cyrus, Assia the Widow, Ariston whom he married a Virgin, Parmys the Niece of Cyrus, and the Daughter of Oxanes at one and the same time. With what magnificence they Celebrated their Nuptials, we may learn from the History of Ezra, how not only that King appointed a Festival to be kept by the People, but entertained his Persian and Median Nobility for a month, and granted Remission of Tributes to the Provincials, that they might with more cheerfulness attend the solemnity. Thence also we may perceive, that they set Diadems on the heads of such of their Wives as they had the greatest affection for; as also that these Queens were gorgeously apparelled. And indeed we are told by Cicero, that their Husbands were wont to bestow on them Cities or Territories for furnishing them with Cloaths and Ornaments, so as the Revenues of one was for the attire of the Head, another for Necklaces, and others for other Trinkets which were most in fashion and of value in those Ages; inasmuch that the Aers prided themselves in bearing the Names of some of them: Particularly Socrates in Plato's Dialogue, which goes under the Name of Alexbiades, tells how he had it from one who went Embassador to the Persian King, that he passed through a large and fertile Country, which extended well nigh a days Journey, and by the Inhabitants was called the Queen's Girdle. Athenaeus also relates, that Antylla a City of Aegypt, not far distant from Alexandria, was by the Kings of that Country and those of Persia, appropriated to the purchase of their Wives Girdles. So rich were they in their Cloaths, Oylments, and other Accoutrements, that well might they seem to themselves too great to be cheap, and accompany with any Subjects. And indeed no Jealousie possessed their Husbands in this kind, so as they never doubted the Children they bore to be their own, nor so much as appointed them any Keepers to watch them, or any other Guardians of their Chastity than Love or Fear alone. But so much did the Persian Kings indulge their Carnal Appetites, that to several legitimate Wives they added Mistresses or Wenches, the number of which was limited only by their own Appetites. But how great it was, we may understand by

Señt. 5. what we find of Artaxerxes, that by his Wenches he had an hundred and fifteen Sons; and of Darius that three hundred and fixty furnished his Court, and followed him on his Expedition. Nay it was told of a Surenas, who was next in place to the King of Parthia, that even he had no fewer than two hundred following him in the Camp. Some write, that three hundred women daily attended in the Persian Court, and took their sleep in the day time, and passed all the night in fingering and Minstrelsy. But the King's Mistresses had a Gymnasium of their own, wherein they were separately kept and attended by Eunuchs, with all things conducing both to their Health and Cleanliness. By times the King took them to his Bed, and they followed him not only in Expeditions, but when he went out to hunt.

Their Eldest
cated.

13. Of such Children as they had by their legitimate Wives, they took especial care, and chiefly as to their Education. As soon as the eldest or Heir to the Kingdom was born, he was committed to the trust and oversight of the most eminent Eunuchs, who made it their business in the first place to order the swadling and forming of his Limbs, that he might, if possible, become a most beautiful Person. When he was seven years old he learn'd to ride, and to teach him that skill, had the best Masters that could be found; and now by degrees he was taught to take delight in hunting. At fourteen he was delivered to those they termed Royal Pedagogues, four men the most wise, just, temperate and valiant persons that could be found in the Nation. Of these the first being most eminent for Prudence, taught him the Doctrine of the Magi, such as Zoroaster the Son of Horomaze taught, which showed the worship of their Gods. The second being of high esteem in Acts of Justice, studied to frame his mind to the love of Truth and Sincerity. The third, who was as remarkable for Temperance, endeavoured to make him Lord and Commander over his Carnal Lusts and Appetites: And the fourth and last, having a great Name for his Fortitude, laboured to render him void of all Fear and Cowardice. When he came to be King, he was awakened in the morning by one of his Bed-chamber, who bad him arise, and take order for such Affairs as Mejoromades was pleased he should advise about; agreeable to which Custom was that particular Injunction of Darius after the burning of Sardis, that one of his Attendants at Dinner should three times say aloud, Remember the Athenians. Every day they gave their attendance at Sacrifices, for the performance of which, thousands of Oxen, Asses, and Deer sometimes fell in one day. But this was not to be done without the presence of the Magi, who as they assisted in the private Consultations relating to Civil matters, so especially in Religious Concernments: And some report, that as the Kings sacrificed they made discourses concerning Piety, as they were wont to harangue concerning Valour, before their Armies engaged in Fight.

How they travelled.

14. Great Attendance and Ceremonies of State, they esteemed necessary for preservation of Respect due to the Majesty of the Sovereign Power; and indeed upon this account Fulian the Emperor was blamed for turning the Eunuchs, Cooks, Barbers, and such like out of the Court upon the death of Constantius; Royal Authority being contemptible if there be no Pomp observed in the Palace. Out of the Court the King was never seen on Foot, but either mounted on Horseback or in his Chariot, or if he walked it was upon Tapestry: The Chariot was drawn by white Horses, bred in Nisium a Region of Media, famous for a breed of extraordinary bigness. When he alighted he was not to step upon the ground, how near soever it was, nor to lean upon any of his Attendants, but to make his step upon a golden Footstool, with which one of his Servants ever followed and attended the Chariot. As they rode they were not to read or force their minds on any grave or serious matter, upon which and other accounts Seneca had reason to call them Barbarous, as not being cultivated by any sort of Literature. When they were to travel into Media, they were wont to make Proclamation three days before their setting forward, that the Inhabitants should kill all the Scorpions they could meet with, because that Country abounded with them, and such as dispatched many they were wont to reward; and they were obliged to make progresses into all their Provinces by virtue of an ancient custom founded upon the mutual interest both of themselves and their people, for the necessities of the Provincials the grievances and oppressions under which they laboured, they could not so well understand in their own Court. By their presence in the several concerned places they might best compose the differences betwixt several Cities, restrain the turbulent humour of factious Persons by reason and good words, curb the Insolence and Rapacity of Magistrates and null all unjust Sentences and Decrees: In conclusion, lend their present and helping hand wherever it was wanting. Into such Provinces as they could not go themselves, they sent their Deputies to understand and report the true state of them:

honour.

Such Governors as were found to have by their foresight and due Administration, benefited the Countries committed to their charge, they rewarded and promoted to higher places, and others who had ill managed their affairs, they punished and removed: For if the Fields were not well and duly tilled, Merchandise indifferently followed, and mechanic Arts as diligently practised, Tributes could not be paid, nor money circulate throughout the Body politic, though it be necessary for the preservation of the whole, that it should do so. To make this more effectual, they had two sorts of ordinary Officers in the Country, viz. the Governors of Forts and Garrisons, who were to defend the Provincials from all force and violence; and the Prefects of Cities, who saw that all the Inhabitants thus protected, should follow their business, for the public security and advantage.

They are in Judgment.

And had Royal Judges.

15. The Kings of Persia were wont in Person to hear Causes, and sit in judgment upon Capital matters, wherein they used deliberation, giving no hasty Sentence, nor condemning any for one offence, except the misdemeanors of his life did over-balance his merits: But a Sentence of Condemnation once given by the King, could not by the King be revoked; such Persons being apprehended by their Girdles, were instantly deliver'd to the Sergeants & Officers, and so led to Execution. If the King was angry with any, his face was covered, as we learn in the case of Haman. But from amongst the most knowing men of the whole Nation, were certain select Persons chosen, whom they called The Royal Judges, who had their places for life, and decided Controversies in all cases; held their Circuits about the Provinces, and attended upon the King in his Journeys. As it highly concerned King and People that they should be just and not mercenary, so were they very severely punished when any corruption could be discovered. The Story is commonly known of Sifamnes, whom for his guilt in this kind, Cambyses caused to be flea'd alive; and his Son to sit upon the Judgment-Seat covered with his Skin; and though Ammianus writes Marcellinus doubteth concerning the truth of it, yet little need there was he should do so, for besides this related by Herodotus, there is another, and more severe, mentioned by Diodorus Siculus. Tiribazus a Governor, being by Orontes accused, for holding secret Intelligence with the Lacedaemonians, Artaxerxes referred the hearing of the matter to three Judges; whom finding afterwards to have been corrupted with money, he caused their Skins to be pulled over their Ears, and spread upon the Bench where he had appointed others to succeed them. As for fleeing alive, something like it is also related to have been practised by Pyrhus upon a Tarentine, for having a design to betray Tarentum, how having put him to death, he caused a Chair to be covered with Thongs made of his skin, and delivered it to Milo, to whom he committed the custody of the Castle, with the Garrison.

How they rewarded de-
erving Persons.

16. By the advice of these Judges who seem to have been seven in number, and to have been their Privy Counsellors, the Kings not only punished Offenders, but rewarded such as well deserved of the State; a Commonwealth being preserved in a safe constitution both by Rewards and Punishments. They thought fit amongst others to reward such as begot many Children, but especially those from whom they had received some especial good or advantage, tending to the preservation of their Government or Persons, whom they termed their Benefactors: To these they were wont to assign the next place to themselves, to honour them with a kiss, to cloath them with a Vest of Media, as the Greeks then termed that which afterward was called Serica, and to adorn them with a Chain of Gold, with golden Bracelets and a Scimitre; which Ornaments could be wore by none but such as the Kings designed to honour, and took their Original from the Medians and Babylonians. But of all other Ornaments, those of gold belonging to Horses for Saddle or Chariot, were most esteemed by the Persians; yet sometimes to their Friends they were wont to assign Lands and Territories for their maintenance: Nay it is said of Themistocles, that he received several Cities from Artaxerxes, particularly Magnesia; (out of which he raised a yearly Revenue of fifty Talents) to find him with bread, Lampreys with wine, and Myas with other provisions for his Table, to which some add two others for his Cloaths and Bedding. Sometimes they would give the honour of Captain over an Army, which was reckoned as an extraordinary favour; but the most noble Gift of all was that of a golden Mill, (as Ctesias writes) which among others was given by Xerxes to Megabyzus, by whose means he became Master of Babylon; and weighed six Talents. This was esteemed the most noble gift, although that could not be but most acceptable which the Party himself did ask, for sometimes they gave their Favourites liberty to ask what they would, as appears by several examples. And this by the Laws he had liberty to do, who was nominated King by his Father or Ancestor yet living; yet the Persian Kings were wont

17. And especially to Foreign Embassadors sent to them upon occasion. Ælian reckons up the particulars with which they sometimes were presented, viz. a Babylonian Talent of the purest Silver, (a Babylonian Talent was in value seventy two Attick Minæ) two Vials of silver, Bracelets, a Cymitre, and Chain of Gold each worth a thousand Daricks, besides a stole of Media otherwise called Dorophorica by the Græcians. When they gave their faith to them, they were wont to give them their right hands, which was a security inviolable; but their ordinary Oath was by the Sun, whom they thought the greatest Deity, and called by the name of Mithras. What time they could spare from publick businets, they usually spent in hunting, in which diversion, as Noble and most resembling War, they chose often to Exercise themselves: When they went to hunt they carried along with them one half of their Guards, and were accompanied with the Flower of the Persian Youth. For the following of their Game they kept such a multitude of Indian Dogs, that in the Plain of Babylon, four large Villages were assigned to maintain them, being freed from other Tributes. Not only in open Fields and Champions were they wont to hunt, but in those fenced places they called Paradisæ, did they persecute and kill poor Beasts, kept up as in so many Coops or Cages, which to destroy was no mastery. It was not lawful before the King had desisted, to let fly against any Beast, or to offer to Combat with him; which was so strictly required; that the story goes how when in this Exercise, Artaserxes was set upon by a Lyon, and it was justly feared would be worsted by him, Megabyzus seeing him in danger, as the Beast raised himself upon his hinder Feet and became Rampant, prevented it by killing him; was condemned to lose his Head, because he dispatched him before the King had spent one dart upon him.

18. But to come to the subordinate Government, the Kingdom of Persia was divided into Provinces, which were governed by so many single Persons in Chief: The Provinces in their own Language they called Satrapies, and their Governors Satrapæ. How many they were is uncertain, the number being varied according to the pleasure of Princes as is most probable: Some Writers making mention of twenty, and others of above an hundred more than that number, in the Reigns of several of the Eastern Princes. And sometimes one and the same Satrapæ governed two or more Provinces, being by Latine Writers, when they would call them by Names of their own, termed Pretors and Prefects; although this ought not to be practised; for seldom are the employments of Officers the same in diverse Kingdoms or States. By the Greek Historians, when they also are of that humor, they are called Eparchi; the younger Sons of the Kings were wont to be employed in these Commands, which were noble and furnished with great Authority: For, to their care the Provinces were committed to provide for their Defence and universal Emolument; to raise the Tributes, pay the ordinary Magistrates their Salaries, and give their assistance in all Emergencies, of which they were to certify the King by Letters, or else by special Messengers. Upon occasion they were called to Consult with him about great affairs. They were much honoured by the Provincials, very well attended by young men of good quality at home, and when they went to hunt; and had a Noble Guard for their credit and protection. They had under them Secretaries Royal, who read the Kings Letters and dispatched other businets; they received allowances from the Publick, and it was not the manner or agreeable to the policy of the Persians to put them out of their Offices, so long as they well discharged them: But left their long continuance and great Power, which in honest men begets experience and opportunity to do good, should give them opportunity to oppress the people, or any way evilly to demean themselves; the Kings were accustomed yearly to send some of their chief Ministers into the Provinces, with full Authority to make inspection into their state and condition; to assist the Satrapæ's if need should be; to restrain their violence and amend what was amiss themselves, or else to make report of what they found. The People were overjoyed at their coming, and as if the King himself came to bring them relief, called them his Sons, his Brothers, and his Eyes.

19. Besides the Satrapæ who governed single Provinces or more, there were other subordinate Officers, who presided some over particular Cities and their Towns; others had command in the Castles of the said Cities. For one and the same Person was not set over both the City and Cittadel of the same, but it was thought best policy to divide the Commands; so as one might be a spy upon the other, to such purposes as we have formerly declared. But when the Satrapæ came into the Province, it was his duty to oversee both, and as by his care of Artificers and Husbandmen, that they minded their Employments, and that Tributes were duly collected, to discharge the duty of the Prefect of the City, so by protecting them all to do what was incumbent on the Phrurarch or Commander of the Garrison. This Phrurarch was chosen by the King and displaced by his order alone, as was the Chiliarch who commanded Soldiers disposed and quartered about in several Regions, for the safety of the Provinces, and bridling if need were the extravagant Power of the Satrapæ. Besides these, each Province had its Treasurer for receiving and keeping all the Royal Revenue belonging to it; which Treasurer or Treasury in their Language they called Gaza. So great was the Income arising from Tributes, that accounts being cast up, fourteen thousand five hundred and sixty Talents of Eubææ were yearly brought into the Kings Coffers, and Justin speaks of a yearly product of three hundred thousand Talents in this way accruing unto Alexander. But over and above Tributes and Stipends, every Province contributed its share to the maintenance of the King and his Army; the Satrapæ of Babylon for four Months of the Year, and the rest of Asia for the remainder. The Armenians sent in Horses by way of Tribute; for, of this noble Creature beides what were for War, eight hundred were kept for Stallions, to serve sixteen thousand Mares; for, twenty Mares were kept for every Horse. What numbers of Indian Dogs were maintained for the Chace, we have already said.

20. Wherever the Kings went, they were attended and guarded by ten thousand Persian Horse called Immortals; because though the Persons miscreant, the number of them never died, to supply which, others were still chosen into the rooms of the deceased. They were adorned with golden Chaines, wore Vests imbroided with Gold, and Sleeves to their Coats sparkling with Gemms, being chosen out of the best of the Nation, and that Nation alone. Of these there were a thousand select Persons, who for that they had golden Aples fixed to their Lances, were by the Greeks both called Doryphori and Melophori, the Name and Service of which Alexander kept up after the overthrow of Darius. With a great Number of Satellites besides these, were the Kings protected either in Battle or in their Palace, chosen also from amongst the most faithful of the Persian Nation, till Darius the last King broke the Custom. And these had their Prefect or peculiar Captain, and one of them followed the Kings Chariot with the golden Footstool lately mentioned; neither received they any pay, but had allowances, for their maintenance, of necessary Provisions and the Meat which came from the King's Table. Of the Doryphori, there were some which being next the Kings Person in the greatest trust and dangers, were called his Kinsmen, honoured with the liberty of kissing him, and a Feast, to which no stranger was admitted. Besides there were another sort who being called Homotimi from their being equal in honour, watched before the Gates of the Palace, till, by the Kings order they were dismissed; although all the Persian Noblemen were wont also, as we said, to give their Attendance at the Gate.

21. By a general Name, the Nobles or principal Courtiers of Persia were called Megistane, which is to be met with in Writers as well Sacred as Profane. But amongst the Partho-Persians, the chief in dignity next to the King had the Title of Surenas; for that a Title it was, Plutarch, Ammianus Marcellinus, and Zozimus assure us, and not a proper Name of a Man. He it was that put the Diadem about the Kings Head. Besides this we meet with several other Names of Dignity, and may sooner meet with them than understand them. Ammianus mentions the Pitaxæ which its uncertain whether it was appropriate to the King or the Title of a Subject. Procopius writes of the Chanaragæ as being a Magister Militum or Dux of a Limit. He mentions the Ovarizes, but tells not what he was, and makes the Mirranes whom Ammianus calls Merenes of the same Office as the Chanaragæ. Others will have Cardarigan to be the name of Dignity amongst the Persians, to whom they say it was ordinary to take Names from Dignities, and receive those that were given them by their Parents. As also that the Darigmedus was of highest esteem, and to be compared with the Curulipates at Constantinople. They also tell us that the Pherochæmes enjoyed the same with the Magisterian Dignity in the Emperors Court; and others say that Zieh was a Name of greatest Dignity amongst the Persians. Although none seems to found higher than Surenas, which signifies our Lord. But of these let such as are skilled in the Persian Language confider.

22. But in or near to the Kings Person, besides the Guard that watched at the Gate, were the Dore-keepers who forbade passage to all intruders, and next them these these we may call Admissionales who stood at the Door to carry all Messages in unto him, and to return Answers. These most commonly were Eunuchs, as were also their Chamberlains, or those of the Bedchamber and their Cupbearers; for such Cyrus thought fittest to be trusted nearest to his Person, though so great were the Influences and Abuses committed too often by them, that they were abominated by some Princes in after times. But in the Persian Court Eunuchs waited also on the Queens, and had custody of the rest of the Kings Women. But for matters of State they had their Secretaries attending, which by the Eastern Nations were called Scribes; we mean by Names answering to the signification of this, who wrote their Letters, Edicts and Decrees. Their Edicts and Rescripts ordinarily began thus; The King saith, or the King saith thus; and they were sealed with his Ring. But what Character the Ring had engraven is uncertain. Some have said the Kings own Image; others the Image of Cyrus the first King of the Persians, and others the Image of Darius his Horse, which by neighing procured him the Kingdom. The Edicts were sent by Messengers throughout the Provinces, but kept in Memorials, and registred in the Archives of the Kingdom. For besides two places of Record, or two Treasuries as they termed them, in one of which Books belonging to Science were kept, and in the other Papers relating to Accounts and the publick Revenue, there were other Paper Offices wherein were preserved for the use of Posterity, Chronicles or Commentaries of whatsoever happened of any Importance, which others might consult upon occasion, and the Kings themselves sometimes would have read unto them, as we find in the History of Mordecai the Jew.

Physicians.

23. The Kings, however Barbarous, had the most learned men in the art of Physick, that the neighbouring Nations could afford, to attend them, whom according to the Laws of the Roman Emperors, we may term Archiatři. Such they had out of the Egyptian Nation, and Darius would have put some of them to death for being unskillful as to his particular case, but they were pardoned at the Intercession of Democedes a Greek Physician of Crotone, who did the Cure. Of Greek Physicians who then were more learned than any other, its to be presumed they wanted not some. For, Ctesias who served in the Army of Cyrus the younger, being taken prisoner became Physician to Ariaxerxes; and from the Epistles of great Hippocrates it appears that he was very much courted to come and live with the same Monarch. These Monarchs had also some at hand who should tell them the time of the Night or Day. They had such as bore up their Train. And when they rode, they had a number of Servants who carried Scepters before them. And if we should mention all the Officers belonging to them, and relating to the more private or ordinary services of their Courts, to their Patrimony, or Res privata, as the later Romans called it; if we should discourse of the Officer appointed to relieve Strangers, of the Curators of their publick buildings, and of such as had the charge of Horses and of Dogges, we might possibly seem to be too tedious if not impertinent. Of the Curfus publicus, we cannot be silent, instituted as is reported by Cyrus the great, who observing how far one Horse would run in one day, appointed certain Stages and Mansions for changing of Men and Horses, and delivering of Letters or other things given in charge from one Post to another. This was called Angarion and Angaron, and the Men themselves Angari and Astanda. If what Plutarch writes concerning Darius the last King of Persia be true, that when he lived a private life, he was one of the Kings Astanda, it was no vile or mean Employment.

A Poyson they used when resolved to dye.

24. Such were the Kings of Persia, and so they lived or desired to live; if they could not, they made provision for the most speedie and easiest Death. They were provided of a Poyson made of the Excrements and inwards of a little Indian Bird called Dicaeris, of which whosoever took a very little quantity in a draught of Drink, expired shortly after without any Pain or Torment. This Poyson being given them by the Kings of India, was esteemed as a very choice and extraordinary Present, and being kept if need should be, for the use of the King and his Mother, it was not lawful for any other Persian to have it. Being dead, their Funerals were celebrated with all magnificence, and the Sacred Fire as they accounted it, was then put out. Their Mausoleum or place of Interment, some say was at Persepolis, although Cyrus was buried at Pasargadae, where his sepulcher was kept by Magi, who for their maintenance had a Sheep every Day, and an Horse every Month allowed them. And Josephus makes mention of a Tower built at Ecbatane by Daniel, when he flourished in the favour of Darius, which continued to his time, and remained so fresh that it seemed to the beholder to have been finished

ed but that day. In this Tower, he saith, the Kings of the Medes, Persians, and Parthians were wont to be buried, which custom continued to his very time; and that the custody of the said Tower was intrusted with a Priest of the Jewish Nation. Their Monuments were wont to have Epitaphs inscribed upon them, and particularly those of Cyrus and Darius, both the one and the other are related: But this was no new thing in the East, if the Epitaphs of Ninus and Sardanapalus be not counterfeited, as we have no reason to believe they were.

25. From the Kings of the Persians, it's fit we pass to speak something of the manner of their Government, of their Rites and Customs; and how their Religion ought to be considered in the first place; but that it must be referred to one more proper. As for their civil Rites and Customs, they are reported to have been founded upon excellent Laws and Constitutions, and such as excelled all others in this respect, that they tended to the prevention of Punishments, by preventing of the Crimes themselves. In other Kingdoms and States we find very wholesome Ordinances indeed for prevention, but still it is of the like for the time to come, and all manners have produced good Laws; or if they have been made by Legislators antecedent to a Society or Common-wealth; yet though not in practice they have been, yet in Theory they have supposed the Commission of those mischiefs they endeavoured to redress. But the Persians chose rather so to intrust Children and so to principle their Youth, that they should abhor Theft, Rapine, Murder, Adultery and the like, by a good Education; and that smart of the Rod might prevent Execution and choking by the Halter. They left not Children in the hands and power of Parents to dispose of them as should suit their humor; neither when come to ripeness of Age, permitted them to live as they listed, but by a sort of breeding in a publick Forum and other rules, so endeavoured to mould and frame the Spirits of all free-born men, that there should be no need of Terror arising from pains of death. This institution and these Rules are laid down by Xenophon in his Cyropaedia, or his Books concerning the Institution of Cyrus the elder. Indeed these Books, Cicero was of opinion to have been written, not so much by any true Historical Account, to make an impartial Relation concerning Cyrus his breeding, as in way of a Romance to give an Image and Representation of a just and perfect Government. But as for what concerns the Rites and manners of the Persians, he himself professeth, as Brissotius urgeth, that he feigneth nothing; and not once affirms, that such Ordinances as were made by Cyrus, were observed to his own time: Now, an Eye Witness, and one who had himself travelled through so many Provinces of the Persian Empire, who dare adventure to suspect? Besides many things written by him are attested by Herodotus and others. This plea of Brissotius may at least prevail for a suspension of our misbelief.

The liberal Forum.

26. However it will not be amiss to say in short, from this information of Xenophon, that for the education of Youth in learning and good manners, the Persians had a publick School or liberal Forum, as it was termed. Here were the Tribunals or Courts of Justice, and places where Wise Men fate both to teach and execute Laws: The Forum was distinguished, as it were, into four Classes or parts; whereof one was of Boys, or such as were under seventeen years old; the second of young men under twenty eight; the third of full grown men under fifty from the former term; and the fourth was the Classis of Old Age. All sorts met in their several Apartments, and the young men, except married, there lay and took their Reflections, and shewed themselves before the Magistrates with their weapons fit for the Exercises they underwent. The people being divided into twelve Tribes, so many men were set as Governors over each Classis; and most care being had of the two former, most choice Persons were appointed from amongst the Seigniors to instruct them. Strabo writes, that Boys came not into the sight of their Fathers till four years old, which Age Herodotus extends to five and Valerius Maximus to seven years; adding this reason, that so their Parents might more patiently bear the loss of them, if they chanced to dye within that time. From five years to twenty, as Herodotus, or as Strabo saith to twenty five, they especially instructed them to speak truth, a lye being esteemed as a servile vice, and most opprobrious of all others, by that Nation. And what was highly suitable with veracity, in the next place they were taught to be just in all their ways, and give to every man his own.

That of Bog's.

27. That this they might the more readily do by examples fit before their eyes, as Augustus at Rome permitted the Sons of Senators to be present in the Court, to teach them the way of Government; so the Persian Youth was admitted to hear Causes and Decisions, although afterwards Xenophon confesses and bewails, that from their hearing of such cases, they learn'd to practise more Injuries and Violence than Justice and Equity, as Vice and Luxury brake in and ushered in the downfall of their Empire. And as amongst Boys themselves and young Men, differences continually arise, either for things stolen, reproachful words, or upon some other occasions; their Masters were wont to spend time in examining these complaints, and to punish the Offenders, whether such as falsely accused, or were proved guilty; and thereby shewed them how to become Judges when their time should come. But as without Sobriety and Temperance, which curb and restrain immoderate Appetites, no virtue can exert it self, and these things are taught more by example than Precepts; their Masters by their spare manner of living and exemplary continency, shewed them the way, and gave them incentives to a sober life; and before them they took their victuals, not with their Mothers, and not till the signal was given, their meat being bread, their fawce Nassurtium, and their drink water taken from the nearest River. By this course of Diet and Abstinence they enjoyed health; and exercise being joined to it, their Bodies became so dry and cold, that they seldom spate or had occasion to wipe their Noses: And we cannot let pass what Ammianus Marcellinus relates concerning the dead Bodies of the Persians that were killed at the Siege of Amida, how they could easily be distinguished as they lay, and known whose they were by reason of their dryness, when those of the slain Romans speedily putrefied, and could not be discerned after two days.

28. Their manner and course of Instruction was this, besides the good example their Masters gave them in submitting themselves to the dictates of the Seniors. In Tables and pleasant Tales they involved wholesome hints and documents for framing of the lives and manners of their Scholars. They taught them Songs wherein were extolled the praises of their Gods, and great and laudable Actions of their Ancestors; they instructed them in the nature and virtue of Plants, that as occasion should serve they might shun the hurtful, and furnish themselves with Remedies against distempers, and preserve their health by proper applications. But the thing which they endeavoured to make odious to them next to lying, as the most heinous thing the Nation abhorred, was being in debt: They esteemed a man in debt no better than a Liar, as by it so made ipso facto, considering what excuses, evasions, denials, and perfidious Answers such do make, and that they conceal their Persons as well as their Intentions. But this is a misfortune rather than a fault, and a burden to which ingenious Spirits are constrained often to submit; that is rather a crime, wilfully to make deserving Persons unfortunate. Therefore nothing more did they abhor than that black and ugly Vice of Ingratitude, as indeed containing in it self all other Vices; inasmuch that by their Laws and customs an action lay against that man who being unmindful of a benefit received would not make a return when it lay in his power. Ammianus saith that their Laws made against Ingratitude, in severity exceeded all others; as that those were also severe which were made against desertors, than whom few were more odious amongst the Persians.

29. Those ever excepted who were disobedient to Parents, for whom that Nation had such Reverence, that it was counted worse than ill breeding to sit down in presence of their Mothers, except they had their permission so to do. And they gloried in this of old, that amongst them none was found to have laid violent hands upon them; for if ever any thing like to this happened, upon diligent inquisition it was found that the wickedness had been committed by some supposititious or adulterous brood; neither could they once believe that any but a spurious off-spring would attempt such a crime, it being contrary to Nature for a true Parent to be murdered by a legitimate Issue. The Piety indeed of Ataxerxes Mnemon is very remarkable which he shewed toward his Mother, though she had procured the death of his dearly beloved Wife. It's evident from Aristotle that Sons were under the Dominion and Power of their Fathers, and this Power in the opinion of the Philosopher was Tyrannical; for they used them, he saith, like Slaves. Such, during the Infancy and Youth of the Common-wealth, was that of Sons at Rome, who differed little in their condition from Slaves, their Fathers having power of life and death over them as well as the other. In conclusion as to vices, Herodotus, and not only he, informs us, that such things as were unlawful to be done, were also unlawful to be spoken.

30. But farther as to the Education of Youth, the Sons of Noblemen were educated while Boys, in the City at the entrance into the King's Palace, and in the Provinces at the Gates of the Satrapæ where they learn'd Lessons of Temperance and Continency, and were Spectators of Punishments executed upon ill Livers. As to Exercise, they were taught from five to twenty, or five and twenty, to shoot in the Bow, to Ride and manage an Horse, and cast Darts; and this Exercise continued incumbent bent upon the Ephēbi, or young men, to fit them the better for War: And a certain War was Hunting esteemed, wherein these young men were exercised together with their King, who usually led out half of them into the Field, and left the other half to watch about the Palace; for the Boys went home from the Forum every Night, but they lay in their Apartment Night and Day to insure them to Temperance, and to have them ready against any violence or other necessity which might require their help. Besides this, they were used to Run fifty in a Company, a course of thirty or forty Furlongs, one of the Kings Sons, or some Son of one of the Satrapæ's being Captain of the Company: And Dancing also they practised after their own Country manner, the better to obtain a Command of their Limbs. Being thus employed and rendered fit for service, the Magistrates made use of them for apprehending Thieves and other Malefactors, and doing other business wherein Diligence and Agility were required.

31. When arrived at Mans estate or ripeness of Age, they assisted the Magistrates (chosen out of their own Classis) if need was, with their Council and Advice, or went to the Wars where now they fought not like velites or with missile weapons, but hand to hand, having on a Breast-plate of Brass, bearing in the Right Hand a Basket Target, and in the Left a Sword, as a Persian in Armour was wont to be painted. When arrived at Fifty they were reckoned amongst the Seniors, and by benefit of their Age obtained mission from warfare, and were not compelled to pass in service out of their own Country, but staying at home attended the deciding of publick and private Causes, for not only did they hear matters relating to Money and Estates, but publick Offices and others were accused before and sentenced by them; it being lawful to any of the People to accuse. As they sentenced and deposited, the creation of Magistrates belonged also to them, and to them alone Offices of Magistracy and afterward the honour of Seniority to such as had passed through the publick Discipline. Such had, when Boys, been educated in the Forum as we have said, and thence passed into the Classis of the Ephēbi, and after that into the other of perfect Manhood; for it must not be imagined that in what we have said of the Persian Institution and breeding up in these Classes, all Persians were indifferently concerned; it was only their Children who had wealth or Estates to be at the expence, and could maintain their Sons in the publick Schools of Justice. But if such Sons were so educated and born Subjects of the King, they were admitted of what Nation soever, Hyrcanians as well as Persians or Medes.

32. As to their more general Customs and demeanour, Laughter was by them very unseemly, especially when vehement and extraordinary or in publick, neither was it decent to be seen to make water or evacuate, but this was done secretly and at home. Neither were they wont to do these things or to eat and drink in Journeys, but these Journeys Xenophon confesseth, in his days were wont to be so short, that there was no great need of any Reflection. And who considers their sort of Diet will not wonder that they had little temptation to eat, or occasion to evacuate; for besides Bread they ordinarily eat nothing but Nassurtium, except a Cake made of Flour with water and some Oil, and besides they made use of Salt and Cardamom. But this sort of Diet we may believe to have been in fashion in old times, in the days of Cyrus, when the Persians lived with great labour and parsimony by reason of poverty and the barrenness of the Soil they inhabited. Afterwards when the Median and Lybian Triumphs gave them a taste of foreign delicacies, they fell like those they conquered into excess and riot: Now ordinary food would not content them. Wine now must discharge the duty of Water and that to temperance, from the ill example of their Kings. We have seen how guilty Cambyses was of this crime, but Xenophon especially dates the decay of the ancient Discipline from Ataxerxes, and those about him their giving up themselves to intemperance in this kind. But from the History of Elther it's apparent that in the days of Artaxerxes, they were arrived at that extravagancy as to compel one another to drink, else what reason could he have to prohibit this practice? when hot with drink they would also have women introduced.

33. Yet Herodotus writes that in their Cups they were wont to Consult about as high as State Affairs, but if they debated any thing at Table, they were wont the next Day when more sober to consider of it, and then to confirm or reject their former Opinions: though they would also call to the Test when drinking, what-our of their Wine they had considered, whether matters of War or others, and some say their drunken Councils they most approved. After the dissolution of the ancient Discipline, not only the Kings but Nobility, and all the People according to their Wealth loved to fare after the most delicious sort. Especially on their

Sec. 5. their Birth days whereon some would kill and Roast whole Oxen, Camells, Horses or Alfes, and others according to their Ability lesser Animals. But by the time of Ammianus Marcellinus it appears that the Nation was returned to Frugality again. Herodotus writes that in his Days they used sweet Meats, or second Courses, but he relates that they shunned Curiosity and Luxury of Feasts as a Plague, and especially greediness of Drinking. Neither, the Kings Meals being excepted, had they any set or appointed Hour of Dining, but every mans Belly was his Clock or Dial, and when it called upon him he eat what came to Hand; neither after he had enough did any throw in any superfluous Meats. Extraordinarily Cautious they were; so that passing through the Gardens or Vineyards of their Enemies, they neither desired nor touched any thing therein, for fear of Poyson or some sort of Treachery. Besides what Festus long before had written concerning the Parthians being sparing in Diet, Procopius adds concerning the Persians that therein they were hard and singular. And he interprets what Xenophon writes that their custom was to eat but once a Day; that it was towards Evening.

Their sumptuous Feasts.

34. However before reduced to their temperate way of Life, or when they pursued to be sumptuous in their Entertainment, they had beautiful Boys to wait at Table; they used Ointments, Garlands and Perfumes. The Attendants were not to speak one word, nor to much as gape or spit, it being indeed a custom amongst them, for all to keep silence at the Table, except he that sung a merry Song, which should be as a condiment to their Meat. They wanted no Bakers, Confectioners, Cooks, nor Butlers upon occasion; nay they had Artificers who made it their Trade to find out Allurements of the Belly. Cupboards and Tables they had fit for and adorned with all sorts of Cups and drinking Vessels of great value and rarity. When Paulinus had defeated Mardonius and was become master of his Baggage, seeing all his Furniture, in Vessels and Tapestry of Gold and Silver, he commanded his Cooks and other Officers to prepare him a Supper after the same manner as Mardonius his Custom was to be served. They diligently obeyed his Orders, to the admiration of Paulinus who was amazed to behold the golden and silver Bedds, the rich Furniture and the whole preparation. That they were wont to take their Repasts upon such Bedds covered with costly Carpets is otherwise evident, and as curious they were in their Bedds whereon they slept, for which they had their peculiar Bedmakers, in the mystery of whom the Greeks were no whit skilled; so that when their King made Presents of those Bedds to them of that Nation, they presented also the Bedmakers with them. Their Beds were not only furnished with costly Curtains, but their Rooms hung with curious Hangings of Purple and other Colours, drawn with Images as our modern sort of Tapestry. These Hangings the Greeks called Aulæ, and the Romans from them; but because many such were found in the Palace of Artaxius King of Asia who made the People of Rome his Heire, they imagined them so named from his Aula or Court. Indeed Artaxius, as Pliny writes, first mixed Gold with them, and thence such golden Tapistry might well be called Artaxica. But the Babylonians invented the variety of Colours interwoven, and their City to that sort gave a Name. The Phrygians first wrought that kind with a Needle, which received the name of Phrygionæ. And those that were woven with many Licia called Polymita were wrought at Alexandria. In conclusion the Persians used Carpets not only for hangings on their Wall; but to tread on upon their Floors. Of Ointments they had good store; especially in their Baths, where they had Slaves to attend them, as also to carry them on their Shoulders, and what not; being as Ammianus describes them crafty both in Prosperity and Adversity, Proud, Cruel, and exercising the power of Life and Death both over their Slaves and obscure Plæbians. But one thing they frequently made use of, which afforded no pleasure smell, and that was Garlick wherewith they even filled their Kitchens, thinking that thereby Serpents and other venomous things were driven away. When the Table was uncovered, what remained was by the Server distributed amongst the Slaves and Attendants who were to live upon it as long as it could last.

Promiscuous Lust.

36. Polygamy the Persians very antiently used, but then its thought rather out of design to propagate a numerous People, than for Lust; for they esteemed the strength of a Nation to consist in its being populous, and their Kings were wont with Gifts to support such as had begot many Children. But afterwards as Luxury broke in upon them, for their Lust they took many Women, and those under the notion both of Wives and Concubines, even to many as they had Wealth to maintain. And though they did not as Ammianus tells us, make use of Boyes, yet was there no natural shame amongst them, but they would marry or lie with their own own Mothers and Sisters. And that they might lawfully fo do with their Mothers, was the opinion of their Magi, though Alexander when he had conquered them removed this incestuous course, allowing them well to reverence but not marry their Mothers. The custom of marrying their Sisters it's said they received from the Assyrians, and however that of Mothers was forbidden by Alexander, yet this of Sisters was propagated even to the Macedonian Race of Ptolemies in Aegypt, where it continued the ordinary practice of these Kings to marry their Sisters, and to receive the Kingdom with them by the appointment of their Fathers. But however Alexander carried himself in this matter, Agathias complains of the Persians of his time, (after that of Fufianus) not only for lying with their own Mothers, Cousins, and Sisters, but with their own daughters also: The ordinary time of marrying was at the vernal Æquinoctial; before the Bridegroom went to bed, he eat an Apple or some marrow of a Camel, neither did he taste any other food on his wedding day.

Their Weddings.

37. Though they were pleased with Polygamy and a multitude of Wenches, yet were they given to Jealousie over both, and nothing did they punish more than Adultery; yet also were they antiently given to Boys, if Herodotus be to be credited; however Ammianus acquits them of that Vice: Nay it's said that Gelding of Boys proceeded from them, as also the Name of Spadæ from Spada a Village where Castration first began; though some also think this Extravagance from the Assyrians and Medians; Ammianus writing that Semiramis first offered this violence and injury to Males. To the custody of these Eunuchs they committed not only their Wives and Concubines, but also their Male Children. That they might omit nothing of pleasure they were also delighted with Musick; and the better to consult their ease they rarely went afoot, but either rode on Horseback or in Chariots. Riding, yet by their Ancestors as one of their principal Exercises for War, was used not for laziness, but to facilitate great and honourable Achievements; but they turned it into so great a sort of Luxury, that they burdened the Beasts they rode on with Saddles and Trappings, laying more Tapestry upon them than on their beds, though they also were furnished so as best to conduce to the pleasure of soft & delicate lying. Moreover the women were carried up and down in Litters, and a sort of Chariot they called Armææ wont to be drawn by Mules; but so close shut up as not to be seen. These also were adorn'd with costly Carpets and Tapestry, and adorn'd with Gold or Silver: For the middle sort of Persians flowing with Luxury, their wealth consisted rather in costly Furniture than in money; they gloried in Gold and Silver Vessels, and if any was in disgrace with the King, he was to be served in Earthen ware. In imitation of the Royal Paradise they diligently planted and cultivated their Gardens, set with Trees both of Fruit and pleasant shade, not only in rows and Walks, but Groves and Wildernesses for the Summer season. That they planted Vineyards is also believed, and at first they were generally Artificers and given unto manual labour; but as Luxury crept in, Artificers began to be despised, when they had applied themselves (or the better sort of them) to the practice of Arms. Yet notwithstanding were not such Arts as were necessary for subsistence and pleasure laid down and utterly neglected, for that both Husbandry and Handycraft Trades should diligently be exercised, it was the work of Presidents of Provinces accurately to see, as also Governors of Cities and Castles.

Gardens.

38. The Persians when they met were not wont in words to salute one another, but in room of that they kissed, and if they were of equal degree they kissed the Mouth, if of unequal he who was chiefest in dignity offered his Cheek to be kissed by the other: Indeed if one of meanest condition had occasion to accost a Person of Quality, he fell down and did him reverence. But none they esteemed so much as their Neighbours, and by the distance from themselves they measured all the goodness of the Inhabitants of the Earth, valuing their next Neighbours most, and those least who were most removed from them: And yet they abominated all Leprous and scabby Persons, suffering them not to abide in their Cities, though they might have an Eagles Nose as they lay Cyrus had, whom they prized above all Mortals. All Persians wore a Tiara, and when they would salute to purpose, they would take that Cap from their Heads, in reverence of the Persons whom they saluted: They used a loose and large Vest reaching to their Ankles, and taken from the Medes, the stole of whom was usually of that called Sericoim. They wore also an inward Tunic which they called Candys, and hanging down from their Shoulders had sleeves to it; and was, as they pleased, of divers colours. To keep them yet more warm, they had another sort of Garment called Cannaces: they wore not only Sleeves but Mittens

Their Cloaths.

Sect. 5.

Sect. 5. Mittens or Gloves; and besides something to cover their nakedness, had their Brace to defend their Thighs from cold, at first made of plain and simple skins, afterward painted to all degrees of Luxury. The women were large and laced Girdles, and the Nation had a sort of Shooe peculiar to it self, elegant enough in the times of Luxury; though at first, as in all other things, ill accounted in this particular. They delighted to appear gay in their Necklaces of Pearl, their Bracelets and Chains of Gold adorned with precious stones. As this custom they took from the Medians, so of the Lydiens they learn'd to bore their Ears, and thereat to hang Gems and other things then in fashion, as the Lybians also were wont to do. They not only lov'd to have their hair long, but to Nature added Art, wearing Periwigs or adventitious hair, which they also learn'd of the Medes, as they did to paint their faces and to colour their Eyebrows. In case of mourning they rent their hair from their heads, and tore their Clothes; nay we read that they would also caufe their Horses and Cattel to be like them by making bare their hides. They also had their proper mourning weeds, and yet their women esteem'd it the most contumelious thing imaginable, to put their hands to the dressing, spinning, or ordering of Wool.

The sorts of their Capital Punishments.

§ 9. Of their Tribunals and form of Judicature, we have already spoken. If the sentence given against a Malefactor was Capital, it was executed either by Beheading, Crucifying, Burning, Burying alive, Fleaing, or Stoning. Beheading was a favour indulged to the Noblest fort, but it was not done with an Axe after the fashion of the Romans and the English, nor with a Sword as most Nations of Europe practice, but with a Razor or a Knife as the Spaniards cut the Throats of their Nobility with a crooked Instrument; and together with the Head the Right Hand was also cut off, and sometimes fixed to a Gibbet. They were wont also to Nail even Great Men to Crosses, though sometimes not till after their Heads were off; and this sort of punishment Alexander, after his Conquest, inflicted upon several Satrapæ themselves. Such as they flaid alive they sometimes cast to the Dogs, and making bottles of their Skins hung them up high. There were yet other sorts of Punishments which we have related in the History of Perfia, as the flating of the Heads of Prisoners between two Stones; and the device of the Boat, and forcing the Party to eat honey and milk by pricking the Eyes with Needles, as the Reader may remember. But these Punishments were inflicted for those they esteemed the most grievous offences. For still lighter crimes they had lighter censures, as Exile, Mutilation of Members, as of Nose, Ears, Hands, or Feet, which they too ordinarily executed upon their Greek and Roman Prisoners, and branded them in the Body: Sometimes they digged out the eyes of noxious Persons, and so Princes were wont to serve their Competitors. Besides, some they noted with Infamy, as by taking from them the trimming of their hair which they esteemed as the greatest Ornament: Of others they confiscated the Estates; and for a perfect discovery they were wont to examine guilty persons by torture.

40. But the greatest punishment of all was that which being inflicted for the highest offence, extended to the greatest latitude of Persons. This was, when for high Treason committed against the Prince, all the Kindred or Relations suffered together with the Malefactor. This the Perſian Kings practiſed though ſo ſevere, and yet ſome of them, particularly Artaxerxes Longimanus, was ſo full of humanity that as Ammianus Marcellinus writes, when delinquents were to be puniſhed, in room of their heads he would cauſe their Tiara to be cut off, and inſtead of their Ears the ſtrings that hung down from their Caps upon them. The greateſt affront they eſteemed it to be termed more cowardly and lazy than a woman, and the greateſt indignity to be forced to ride on the bare back of an Aſs. They were to be commended for this, that their faith they uſually kept inviolable. So reſpective were they to their Kings, that they ſtrowed Flowers and Garlands in the ways where they were to paſs, as they did alſo upon occaſion of publick rejoicing. Their ordinary Coin was called Staters: one fort was ſtamped with the Image of Darius, and thence the pieces had the name of Daricks, though ſome alſo with that of an Archer, according to the jeſt of Aeſſius, when he departed home out of Aſia. Theſe were probably of Gold; but in after times the Perſian Kings only coined Silver money. In their Burials, they celebrated their Funerals with great pomp, burying them uſually in the Earth, though in later Ages they and the adjoining Nations ſuffered the dead to be devoured by Birds and Beaſts, and ſuch as theſe ravenous Creatures did not ſoon eat up, they accounted accuſed.

Of old they were very war-like.

Sect. 5.

end of their domination, yet were they formerly very considerable for the discipline and Arts of War; and to be excellent therein, they seemed to bend their greatest endeavours. For that cause, when young, they learn'd and practis'd Riding, Shooting, and casting Darts, and Hunting, which they esteem'd as more than a resemblance of a Batel. All the hardships they underwent, they bore with more patience, because fitting them for the inconveniencies of a Field, having learn'd this prudence and diligence in Scythia; for Ammianus tells us that originally Scythians they were, and thereby became most expert in fighting, but by degrees they conquered their Neighbouring Nations, and brought them under their own Name. As if they had still owned their Original out of the North, whilst Discipline still continued amongst them, they learn'd to Swim, and also to endure both cold and heat. In times of peace and greatest security they never went without their Swords, not at Feasts and Solemnities, which was of old the custom of the Greeks also, till the Athenians first broke it off, and the Romans did not approve it. As soon as they were able to bear Arms, they were lifted in the Troops: From twenty years they serv'd till fifty, and then, as we said, obtained an honourable militia; but before that time the Kings took it ill, if any desired to be excused when they were going on an expedition, as Darius and Xerxes made it appear by sad examples.

Cardaces

Their Horse.

Their Arms.

42. Wars we know are undertaken, either to defend our selves at our own homes or doors, or to invade thofe we call our Enemies. For their better defence, and to hinder the impreffion of Foreign Nations, their Kings had their Captains, Satrapes, and Minifters, difpofed in all places; they had their Scouts both by day and by night, and their Beacons, which being fired fuccelfively, from all the high places of the Kingdom, in one day fignified what it concerned them to know. When any Army was to be raifed, Orders were given out to fome Satrapa for this purpofe. Their Soldiers they called in their own Language Cardaces, as fome fay from a Country, others from Carda fignifying a Lot. Herodian writes, that in his time they ufed no mercenary Soldier, neither held their Armies in any conftant Camp, but that all the multitudes of the People, and fometimes of women too, were gathered together by the King's Command, which when the War was over, was again difmiffed home without any other pay, wages or emolument, than what they had got by booty or plunder. But Ammianus Marcellinus obferves in his days, that for their Military Methods, Difcipline and Exercifes, or Trainings, they were to be feared even by the greateft Armies; trufting in the valour of their Horfe, wherein all the Nobility and the fplendor of the Nation was concerned. As for the Foot, they being covered with their Targets like fo many Mirmillones or Sword-players, obeyed orders rather like fo many Scullions or the vileft fort of men; and always this multitude followed as condemned to perpetual favery, neither ever being fupported with pay or gifts. Befides, fith he, this Nation over and above thofe it hath abundantly conquered, had fent many others under the Yoke, fo bold and ftill it was in Martial Contefts, if it had not been conftantly vexed with civil and foreign Wars. What he faith of the Persian Foot is attefted by others who make the Infantry inconfiderable, and rather thought to ferve and attend the Horfe, though for this purpofe they will have the women alfo taken along in expeditions.

43. As for their Arms they wore Aimines or Daggers, hanging at their Girdles upon their Right Thighs: In their hands they carried their Copides, which were Scimiters or Swordsmade crooked something like Sickles, and otherwise called Sagars, which it's said was also the weapon of the Amazons: But for defence of his Body, the Persian Soldier wore a Breastplate of Brass or Iron (or both) made with joyns like fins or scales of Filthes; and well might Ammians write that their Foot covered themselves like so many Myrmillones; for the Persians had their Gerra or Targets made of Wickers so large, that they might cover their whole Bodies, like to thofe used by the Romans and Galls. A fort of misfile weapon or Dart they had also called Palsum, made of the Cornus Tree as were Arrows and other things. Under their Gerra or Targets hung their Quivers at their Shoulders full of Arrows, Herodian reporting, that in his time they came not abroad without their Bows; and their Successors the Partians herein did so succeed, that if possible they exceeded them in the practice; for not only their Foot but their Horsemen had their Arrows hanging by them; and not only in their pursuit but against pursuers themselves when running away, they were wont to let them fly. They made use, moreover of Slings for throwing of Stones, and thofe of a considerable bigness. Ordinarily they wore no Helms, but their own Tzara which was their Ornament for the Head both at home and abroad; and so were for their Thighs their Braica or Breeches, which they used in, as well as out, of Fight.

The order of their March.

44. But their chief Refuge as well as Delight (which Ammianus hints) was in their Horse; and their Delight contributed to their Refuge. For while they were fober and indolent, they so used themselves to riding, that never were they to be seen on foot, but if feasted, if they went upon publick or private business, if to the market, to meet, discourse or talk, if Freeman, they went on Horseback. But, as all good Institutions are wont to degenerate, this Riding afterwards was only used for Pompe and show, when more Trappings and Tapestry were laid upon a Horse than was wont to be put upon a Bed or in a Chariot. And golden Bridles, he who had not, was out of the Fashion either at home or in the War. In a Word, whereas at first the Nobility were they that composed the Cavalry, afterwards Cooks, Victuallers, Bath-holders and such like were suffered to lift themselves in the Troops, after that Luxury and excess crept in amongst them from the Medes. And as from the Medes they received their Luxury and particularly in riding, though possibly not riding itself as some have written, so the best Horses they were wont to ride. For in Media was Nisæum, where the Nisæan Horses were bred, the goodliest of all others that were to be seen in the East; those of India being nothing comparable to them; and though great as they were, yet what is wonderful, they excelled in swiftness as well as bulke. And some bulke it was necessary they should have, both to bear the burthen of their Riders so armed as they were at all points, and to support their own Armour wherewith they themselves were also covered, framed after the manner of Scales of Fishes on their Fronts and Breasts, if for the Saddle; and their Sides, if they drew at the Chariot. The Horsemen thus accoutred the Greeks called Cataphrati, but the Per- sians Clibanarii. 45. But not only did they fight from Horses, but also from Chariots, which differed too according to the use and employment they had for them. For some were adorned with Gold and Silver; and others were armed with Sythes and such crooked and cutting Irons as fastened to the Body, Axletree and Wheels, were intended for cutting and tearing all they met in their passage, being governed by two Horsemen, who with Ropes fastened to them, erected and let them fall as they saw convenient. By their long use of this sort of armed Chariots, they shewed that they were not ineffectual in War, but by reason of their carelessness in managing them, and the unskillfulness of the Drivers, they often did them more harm than good; and the Romans, however once a Terror, made them no better than a laughing Stock, finding them easily overturned by the inequality of the ways, and especially by casting Logs and other Impediments before them. But in some of them the Persians were wont to carry their Impediments, viz. their Wives and Children, their Mothers and Concubines, pretending that the sight of these dear Relations would provoke them to Fight for their preservation. Some write that above all things, the King took care for Forage, and all necessaries for their Armies before they set forward, which ordinarily were carried upon the Backs of Camels.

46. The order and method of their March, was this as it is described by Quintus Curtius. It was their custome to set forward when the Sun was first risen. Then warning was given from the Kings Pavilion by a Trumpet, and by an Image of the Sun inclosed in Chrystal placed so on the Top, as it might be seen glittering by all. The Fire which they termed Sacred and Eternal, was borne before on silver Altars, being followed by the Magi, who sung some of the Songs of their Country. And the Magi were followed by three hundred and sixty five young Men, as equal to the Days of the Year in Number, covered with Purple Vestments. Then followed the Chariot Sacred to Jupiter drawn by white Horses, behind which came an Horse of extraordinary greatness, called the Horse of the Sun, and those that drove or led the Horses, had in their Hands golden Rods, and were clothed in White. Not far from them marched ten Chariots very rich in Gold and Silver workmanship. And next to the Chariots a party of Horse of twelve Nations, differing in Armes as in other Fashions. Then were to be seen the Troop of them called Immortals consisting of ten Thousand, excelled by no Barbarians in the wealth and splendor of their Accoutrements: they were adorned with Chains of Gold, wore Clothes imbroideder with that rich Metal; and their sleeved Coats glittered with Gemms. Behind them, at a little distance came those called the Kings Kinsmen, being fifteen thousand Persons, who had the Name also of Doryphori, or Spear-bearers, though accoutred rather like Women than Men, and in their Arms being Effeminate.

47. Next to them went a Troop of Men who were to take up the Kings Robe; They

They went before the Chariot wherein he sat aloft; the sides of which were set out with the Images of their Gods, the Yoake was adorned with glittering Gemms, and from the Axletree stood up two golden Images, each of the length of a Cubit, whereof one bore the resemblance of Belus. There was the shape of an Eagle stretching out it's Wings. The Kings Apparel was throughout notable for Luxury. He had his Purple Tunic with white Spots. Golden Haukes as if falling together with their Beaks, adorned his golden imbroideder Palla. At his golden Girdle, wherewith he was Effeminately girt, hung his Dagger which had a Gemm for its Scabbard, and the royal Ornament of his Head, which they called Cidaris, was compassed with a blew Circle studded with white. Ten thousand Spearemen followed the Chariot, who had their Spears adorned with Silver, and bore Darts headed with Gold. On the right and left hand of him went about two hundred of the most Noble of his Relations, behind followed thirty thousand Foot, and after them were led four hundred of the Kings Horses. At a furlong distance Sisygambis the Mother of Darius was drawn in one Chariot, and in another his Wife. The Troops of Women that attended the Queens, rode on horseback. Then came fifteen Carriages they called Armase wherein were the Kings Children with those that brought them up, and a company of Eunuchs no ways despicable in those Nations; then the Kings Concubines three hundred and sixty in number, in Royal Apparel and Furniture. After them six hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels carried the Kings Money, being guarded with a party of Archers. Near to them marched the Wives of the Kings Kinsmen and Friends; then rode Flocks of Lacquies and mean Attendants. And the Rear was brought up by several Troops of light armed men, headed by their several Leaders.

48. The Army in its March having not always Cities Townes or Mansions wherein to lodge, great Care was taken for its Incamping. For safety and defence, by the multitudes of Hands, they easily cast up a Trench, and sometimes fortified it by Wood and Stones, but always inclosed themselves with their Carriages. In the Camp, to all sorts of Officers both Military and other, places were assigned, and the several Tents of Command had their Markes and Tokens fixed upon them, whereby they might be distinguished, and called out upon occasion. The Kings Pavilion was as his Court at home, having its several Rooms and Apartments wonderful for wealth and bravery; and so proportionably were the Tents of the Satrape and great Men, who had their Sumpter-horses for conveyance of all sorts of rich Furniture into the Field. And they delighted to be as Rich and Gay in their Clothes, as in the Furniture of their Tents. They took with them their golden Chaines and Bracelets. The Scabbards of their Swords were adorned with Gemms. Their Trappings and Bridles were of Gold, so that as Alexander told his Men they rather bore Booty for the Conquerors, then Armes to Fight; so Luxurious they were even in the most serious Actions of their Life, when degenerated.

49. Ordinarily their Armies were raised out of their own Countreys, yet sometimes they also took in Auxiliaries of the Greeks. Their Soldiers were divided into Tens, Sixes, Twenty fours, Hundreds, Thousands and ten Thousand; for, Commanders of all these are to be found in Writers; they had also besides their Foot-Officers, Commanders of Horse, particularly three in the Army of Xerxes. There were Commanders of Chariots and of the Harmamase wherein the Women or Baggage were carried. The Kings were wont carefully to muster their Men; and to take an account of their Numbers. The last Darius followed the device of Xerxes, practised at Dorisus, to make a place which should contain ten thousand, and by filling the place, measure out his Soldiers as Grain or any other sorts of things are measured. When the Persian Kings propoed to make War upon or invade any Country, they were wont after the manner of the Babylonians to send to demand Earth and Water to be sent them, as Symbols or Tokens of subjection and servitude, those two things composing the places of which they challenged the Dominion. With what disdain the Athenians and Lacedemonians received this Message we have seen, and how they treated the Great Kings Ambassadors. Such as sent the Symbols owned him as their Lord and Sovereign; as the Handers, Amynas of Macedonia and some others were forced to do.

50. What number of Animals the Kings were wont to carry along in their Expeditions, we have seen sufficiently in the History of their Wars. Ammianus writes that they themselves were not obliged to be in Battells; but that Darius in Person fought against Alexander weread, and that he was armed with his Dagger, ger, Target and Bow. In the middle of the Battle the King stood. The Signal was given by Trumpet from his Pavilion. Before they joyned, the Persians were accustomed to make a confused and terrible Noise. The Word was given by the Commander in Chief, and Orders as well by other signs as word of Mouth; as when Sapor fer upon a City he erected a red Flag, as a Token that then his Men should fall on. But the Royal Ensign or Standard is reported to have been an Eagle sitting on a Pelta or a short Target made like an half Moon. Carefully were the wounded provided for by Officers, whose peculiar charge and care it was. Such as fought stoutly were bountifully rewarded, those that died for their Country honourably remembered, and on the contrary Ammianus tells us they had Laws bitter and severe against Defertors. Some of their Kings would be cruel to such Enemies as fell into their Hands; and propose Rewards to such as would bring them alive. Of Wiles and Stratagems in War they knew little, as thinking it a disgraceful thing to steal a Victory; Yet did they keep such careful Watch, that they could not be surprized, who to preserve themselves awake, sung Songs in the Night concerning the Justice and Felicity of their Princes. As for Scouting, the Persians, in diligence and secrecy, seem to have excelled all others.

How they Attacked Towns.

51. So desirous they appear to have been of War, that in their Paintings and Landscips, scarcely any thing but Battles and Slaughters of Men or wild Beasts were to be observed. For taking of Towns they made use of Ladders and Engines, and also of Mines, not to blow up the Walls as since the use of Gunpowder hath been practised, but to open Passages within them, that they might enter the besieged places. Of the Balista, Scorpions and other sort of Machines used by them Ammianus and others make mention. But, instead of our Wildfire they had several Oiles which would do the same Execution, one sort made of an Indian Worm, which as Ælian writes, being shot in earthen Vessels against the Gates of a Town, would set them on Fire: and another called the Oyl of Media or Naptha, in their own Language, a Bituminous matter, which burning could not be extinguished with any thing but Dust, as neither the Oyl of the Indian Worm with any thing but Dirt and Mud lying in high Ways. In besieging of Townes they made use also of Traps to catch the besieged; and of Murices, or peices of Iron four-square with Pricks to hinder the Passage of their Horfe.

Their Ships.

52. For defence and Offence at Sea, the Persians had their long Ships, their swift Vessels, and Vessels of burthen, for conveyance of Horses and other Necessaries for War. On their Borders they had strong Castles on high and scarcely accessible Hills very Strongly fortified, which had their several Governours, whose sole work it was to look unto them. But in Winter they abstained from War, as impatient of Cold. Observable it is that when they Adopted, it was not by words or writing, but by arming the Persons to be adopted. Commendable it was that the Kings took it in disdain that their Subjects should be Slaves any where, and therefore such as were taken in War, they readily redeemed. In conclusion, after thirty Years of Service performed, when fifty Years old, the Persians obtained an honourable Mission.

How they contracted a League.

53. Peace is the end of War, and this the Persian Kings might sometimes be obliged by the badness of their Success to admit of. Sometimes with Presents they would contract Amity and Friendship with the Kings their Neighbours, as Cambyses with him of the Æthiopiens. Sometimes they would make a League, and then the Ceremony was performed after this manner: A Goate, a Bull, a Wolfe and a Ram was killed, and the Blood being put into a Target, the Greeks dipped therein a Sword, and the Persians a Spear. But as we said, had they still had Peace with their Neighbours, we had heard little of them; They would scarcely have borne a share in our History of the World. For notwithstanding this Policy of theirs extolled by Xenophon, so illiterate were they that we had had little or nothing of their Affaires communicated to us, had not their Actions been with the Greeks; from the Penes of whom we receive what account we have of them; not trusting to other pretended Histories said of late to have been taken out of their Archives.

Several Persian things came out of Persia into Europe.

54. But by way of Egypt and Greece, many things and words of Persian Origin have been communicated to the western World. Some Fruits have thence arrived in Europe: As the Peach, by some called Nux Molybia, but ordinarily in Latin Malum Persicum, said to have been brought into Greece by those that followed Alexander in his Expedition. That the Walnut, especially the better sort, all came out of Persia, Pliny believed, from the Greek Names of Persicum and Balsicum given to it. The Limon or Citron, also grew in that Country, though in Asiatica

Sect. 5.

Asiatica and Media in greater abundance, as should appear by its Names of Malum Asyrium and Medum. Athenæus also writes that the Cocks called by the Latines Gallus Gallinaceus, first came out of Persia, and was dispersed into other Regions; being by the Greeks called the Persian Bird. But that learned men interpret Athenæus concerning this Cock, I should rather have thought it to have been the Turkey, that Bird which hath several Names in several Languages, each Nation calling him by that Country out of which it thinks it first received him. For though we call him a Turky (as any man coming out of that vast Empire a Turk) yet the French, and others a Cock of India. From India to Persia there was good access. Athenæus also relates that out of Media the neighbouring Country, Phœnicians first were brought, being kept by Ptolemy King of Alexandria in his Palace. Shall we mention that Persian Skins elegantly painted, were much prized in other Countries, and made use of by the Persians themselves, in their dining Roomes?

and Words.

55. Besides Things, several Persian Words have arrived in Europe, whereof some have been used even by Greeks and Romans, to signify what they could not otherwise, it seems, so well express. For Gaza, though used for Treasure, is a Persian word, and so is Paradise, with which even Sacred Writers thought fit to serve themselves. Many other there are ordinarily known, though rarely or scarcely used for any thing but what they properly signified in Persia. Such were: Serpas, Parasanga, Tiara, Candys, and many others which might be tedious here to mention. Cyrus, though the Name of a River as well as a Man, its said signified the Sus in the Persian Language; Xerxes Martial or a Warrior; and Artaxerxes a great Warriour, or, as Ammianus interprets it, a Conqueror of Battells as Athenæus a Commander of Kings, for by both these the Persians in his time stiled Sapor their King, when they echoed out his Name in the Army. The Generals of their Armies some say were called Megabyes. And to terminate our discourse as Countries are wont to be with a River, the Name of Tigris signifieth in the Persian Dialect an Arrow, which that famous one received from the swiftness of its Stream.

CHAP. II.

The Affairs of the Grecians amongst themselves during this Empire.

SECT. I.

Of such things as happened from the beginning thereof until the Expedition of Xerxes.

Polyrates.

I. IN the time of Cyrus the Great, and afterwards, lived Polyrates the famous Tyrant of Samos, who from a small beginning arrived at such extraordinary power, as no petty Prince of the Greekish Nation was ever accounted equal to him for worldly Felicity.

The word Tyrannus or Tyrans whence derived, and whom it signifies.

2 The word Tyrannus (which we English Tyrant) Suidas thinketh to have been derived from the Tyrrheni, a people of Italy, because they were cruel and given to Robbery. Others thought it was derived of the City Tyre, by means of its Riches and Glory. Most anciently the word was of no ill signification, SECT. 1. signification, but was used in a good sense, there being no discrimination between King and it, as * Servius observeth. For, though Homer (who never mentioneth Tyre) either knew it not or would not use it, yet the Poets who follow him, call those Kings that lived before the Trojan times by the appellation of Tyranni. Afterwards through the dissolute and cruel demeanour of some Princes, and the antipathy of the Greeks towards Monarchy (after they had generally erected Oligarchical or Democratical Governments) it came to be taken in a bad sense. Herein it is especially given to those who, being once private persons, enslaved their Citizens by invading without any just Title the supreme power; as to Polycrates, Pisistratus, Dionysius, and Aphaclos. It's also applied to the Children who succeeded their Fathers in the usurpation; and it is also given sometimes to those who governed by the desire and content of the People, as Cleon of Syracuse, brokering as to this particular, a petty Prince or Régulus: For it is seldom or never in ancient Authors, when it is taken in an ill sense, found applied to any but the usurping Lords of Cities (not any notable Kingdom) and such Cities as had before been governed in the way of a Commonwealth. And what is said of those Governors called Tyranni, must be extended to their Government, in the Greek Language called Tyrannis, which we English Tyranny, though not in any ill sense wherein the Athenians used it: not when they would have Solon to take the Tyrannis or Government upon him, though the word was harsh. This is hinted to take off any thoughts of the ignorant, as if the word reflected upon Monarchy, the best of Governments when all shall be considered.

3. Samus is an Island in the Mediterranean Sea, lying over against Ionia, not far severed from it, containing in circuit scarce an hundred miles, so called from the height of it by the Ancients in their language. On the West it looks towards the Iland Icaris, but on the East the continent of Asia, being near to Ephesus, and the promontory of Mysale, from which it is distant but five Miles. The most ancient Inhabitants were Carians differing much from the Greeks both in Language and Manners. But when the Sons of Cadmus led out Colonies from Attica, Androclus one of them here settled one, by which the City of the same name with the Iland was built; having a very large and commodious Haven. It was presently much beautified with frequency of Inhabitants, Riches, and multitudes of Buildings, and being very famous for the Temple of Juno, which was especially worshipped in this place, it was reckoned amongst the twelve Ionian Cities, being partaker of the great Council of Pantonium, and counted not inferior to Miletus, Ephesus, or Chios, the most eminent amongst them. From Herodotus it should appear to have at first been governed by Kings, the Inhabitants as he saith, in the Reign of Amphicrates, making War upon Agina which was hurtful to both sides: and this was the cause that in the Age following the Aginetans did as much by the Samians exiles which had retired into Crete. But in what Age Amphicrates lived he doth not mention; yet this is apparent from his words, that the Samians because Ilanders remained untouched by the King of Lydia and Persia, when the other Ionian Cities in the Continent were forced by them into subjection.

4. But when Cyrus flourished in Asia, and Pisistrates at Atheni, Polycrates the Son of Abaces one of their own Citizens offered violence to their liberty. When first he seized on the Sovereignty, he made his two Brothers Pantagnotus and Sylphon partners with him, but afterwards he slew the one, and ejected the younger, and so having all the Power in his own Hands, he contracted amity with Amasis, who at that time reigned in Egypt. In a short time his Affairs so prospered, that he became famous through Ionis and all Greece, for whereforever he made War he prospered, with his hundred Biremes or Gallies with two ranks of Oars on a side, and one thousand Archers, invading all his Neighbours without any difference, for that he held it for a Rule, that he gratified his Friend more by restoring what he had taken from him, than if he had taken nothing away. He subdued many Ilands and many Towns in the Continent. The Lesbians coming to help their Friends of Miletus with all their Force, he overthrew, and took so many, as served him to draw a Ditch round about the Walls of Samus. His Affairs being thus prosperous, were not unknown to Amasis, but being every day more prosperous than other, at length Amasis suspected that his Friend and Allie, for this prosperous Fortune would have some disastrous end, and therefore he wrote to him, and desired him that to make some certain Change therein, he would pick out that which was most dear to him, and in the loss whereof he would be most troubled, and make that away, so that he should never more enjoy it. He accordingly took ship and cast into the Sea his Signet, which was an Emerald set in a gold Ring; but it so happened, that a Fisher taking a very large fish, presented it to him as only worthy of it, and in the Belly of it his Servants, when they cut it up, found the Signet. Amasis hearing this, took such assurance that an unfortunate end must follow such prodigious success, that left he should be troubled with the misfortune of a Friend and Allie, he renounced his friendship.

5. When Cambyfes was raising his Forces for his Expedition into Aegypt, Polycrates sent to him underhand, to desire him to send for some Supplies, who doing so, he picked out such as he thought were most prone to Rebellion, and with them manned out two Tremes, desiring of him that he would not send them back. Yet they after the War withdrew themselves from Cambyfes, and went to Lacedaemon to desire aid of that State against the Tyrant, which was granted them, either for that the Lacedaemonians were engaged to the Samians (as these pretended), because they had received Supplies from them in the Messenian War, or as the Spartans alleged, not out of any kindness, but malice to the Samians, because they had in the Age foregoing intercepted certain Presents sent by them to Cyrus, and to them from Amasis. The Corinthians were also drawn in, having a particular quarrel of their own; the occasion was also given at the same time, the Samians having taken from the Corinthians certain Boys which they were carrying from Persian their Tyrant to Alyattes King of Sardis to be made Eunuchs.

6. The Lacedaemonians coming with a great Fleet to Samus, besieged the City, but endeavouring the storming of it were repulsed with some loss, and having in vain spent forty days in the Siege (so valiantly was it defended by Polycrates) they then returned home into Peloponnesus. A Story went, that Polycrates stamped some Lead, and covering it over with Gold, with it purchased the departure of the Lacedaemonians; but this was the first Expedition which the Dores made against Asia. Afterwards at such time as Cambyfes full sick; that fell upon Polycrates which Amasis had forewarned him of. At this time one Orates a Persian was governour of Sardis, Ionia, Lydia, and the Sea-coasts, in the place of Harpagus, who either for that he was upbraided that he got not Samus, so near to his Province, into the King's hand, or for that Polycrates slighted and gave no answer to a Messenger which he sent to him (both which are reported) fought earnestly to work his destruction. Knowing he had an Ambition to become Master of Ionia and the Ilands, he sent to him to tell him that he heard how excellent things he cast in his Head, but that he wanted Money to accomplish them, wherefore he having now heard for certain that Cambyfes determined to kill him, offered to him, that if he would receive him, he should have half of the King's money which he had in his possession, whereby he might get the Sovereignty of all Greece. And if he doubted of his faithfulness, he desired him to send one of his most trusty Servants to whom he would give satisfaction.

7. Polycrates with great joy received the Message, being greedy after money, and to make the thing sure, sent Maandrius his Secretary over to Orates, who knowing him a cunning and circumpet Man, filled several Chests with Stones, and covering them at the top with Gold, thereby deceived him. Polycrates was yet diffwaded by all his Friends from going over himself, for that the Oracles were against it, and his Daughter dreamed that she saw him up aloft in the Air, where he was washed by Jupiter, and anointed by the Sun; but he was angry with her for her importunity, and notwithstanding all diffwasons went over to Orates, taking with him amongst others, Democedes the Son of Calliphon of Crotona in Italy, the most famous Physician then in his Country. He went over into Magnesia as far as the River Maander, and then Orates laying hold of him, nailed him to a Cross. Of those that accompanied him, the Samians he dismissed, telling them that they must account it for a great Favour fo to be used by him, but all the Strangers and Slaves he took to himself, and reduced them into the State of servitude. This end had Polycrates, with whom none of the Syracusan Tyrants, or any other of Greece for magnificence were to be compared. Him succeeded one Maandrius his Vicegerent or Procurator, of whom Herodotus telleth many Stories, and who by the help of Orates the Persian Satrapa, being removed by the approbation of Darius the Son of Hystapes, Sylphon the Brother of Polycrates succeeded, Samus paying very dearly for it, what by the War; and the ensuing severity of Sylphon. When Sylphon died, Abaces his Son succeeded him, by the favour of the Persians; but was not long after thrust from his Tyranny, when Artaxerxes the Milelian drew all Ionia into rebellion against the Persians; which hapned about the eighteenth year of Darius.

8. In the second year of Darius, and the first of the sixty fifth Olympiad, the inhabitants

Se<sup>c</sup>t. 1. inhabitants of Plataea in Boeotia, who never well accorded with their Neighbours the Thebans, being now irritated with their continual injuries, that for the future they might free themselves from such grievances, sent, and offered themselves to the Lacedæmonians (who then were of greatest Authority in Greece) as Allies and Dependents. But they perceiving themselves to be at too great a distance from them to give any Succours when need required, advised them to have recourse to the Athenians as nearer to them, and of sufficient ability to relieve them. They accordingly did so, and contracted a straight League of Alliance with Athens, which became a great eye-fore to the Thebans, and all their party a long time after.

A League between the Plataeans and Athenians.

9. In the third Year of the sixty six Olympiad, and the eighth of the Reign of Darius, fell out great stir at Athens, which never ceased till they produced a change in the Government. Pisistratus the famous Tyrant at his death left three Sons, Hippias, Hipparchus, and Thessalus, and the principality (as it should seem from * Heraclides) to them all; though Hippias, as the eldest, had supreme Jurisdiction. He had hitherto for the space of thirty years enjoyed his Fathers Kingdom, being loving and affectionate towards his brethren, and moderate towards his Subjects: Hipparchus was accounted a wife man, and lover of learning, being something given to be amorous, and Thessalus bold, and head-strong. It hapned that Hipparchus fell in love with one Harmodius, a young man of the City, and forely solicited him to unlawful dalliance, who therewith acquainted one Aristogiton, a man of a middle rank amongst the Citizens, and who most passionately loved him. He fearing he should be deprived of this his dear one, consulted with himself how he might destroy, both Hipparchus and the Tyranny. Hipparchus still going on to solicit Harmodius, but in vain, at length resolved to be revenged on him, and executed it on his Sister, which being on a certain solemnity to carry up the Basket that was to be dedicated to Minerva, he put her by as unworthy of the Office; though some of late have thought that he ravished her.

Stir at Athens.

10. Harmodius taking this in very evil part, and Aristogiton much worse, prepared all things necessary for their Conspiracy; but expected the great Feast called Panathæna, on which day only the Citizens might be in Armour without suspicion, for discharging the Solemnity. They provided not many men before hand, for the more close carrying of the business, and because they hoped all the rest would without any hesitation be ready to come in to them. When the day came, they and their party being ready with their Poniards, espied a man talking with Hippias; Whereupon they thought they were discovered, and therefore resolved to do that, wherein especially they were concerned, if they could, and so rushing in violently upon Hipparchus, they slew him in the place. Aristogiton defended himself for some time from the Guard; but the multitude flocking in, he was taken, after he had received many Wounds, and his friend Harmodius slain outright. Hippias having notice of what had passed, came cunningly upon the Citizens that were armed for the Solemnity, and by his Guard picking out such as had Daggers about them, or whom he suspected, thereby prevented at this time all further trouble.

11. Hitherto he and his brethren had not been distrustful of their own safety, and therefore had used no great Guards about them; not rendering their Power very burthenful to the people, but acting according to the Rules of Virtue and Prudence. They exacted only the twentieth part of the publick Revenue, exceedingly beautified the City, waged War, and left the Citizens to their former Laws; only some one of them was always Magistrate, and other men held of them yearly Offices, Pisistratus the Son of Hippias, and Nephew to the founder of this Kingdom, as it appeareth from Thucydides, having sometimes had the Power in his Hands. But Hippias after this, fearing himself, exercised his Power very severely against the Athenians, putting many of them to death, and to establish himself by foreign alliance he gave his Daughter in marriage to Hippocles, the Son of Antandides the Tyrant of Lampacus, knowing them to be in great grace with Darius King of Persia. To find out the complices of these two young men, he tortured, amongst others, a woman named Leena the Paramour of Aristogiton, but she was so constant as to endure all, and biting off her Tongue, spit in the Face of the Tormentors, lest therewith she should discover any one; in memory of which the Athenians afterwards consecrated in the Cattle a Lioness without a Tongue, as also Erected Statues to the memory of Harmodius and Aristogiton, as the liberators of their Country. These Statues were taken away by Xerxes into Asia, and long after sent back by Alexander, or Antiochus, or Selenus, as is severally delivered by Historians. They also Decreed that their Names should never be given to any Slaves.

12. Though these two did not actually procure the freedom of Athens, but perished in the attempt, yet it was attributed to them, because that in the fourth year after, some imitating their Example expelled Hippias, and effectually procured it. At this time the Alcmaonide (or those of the Family of Alcmaon, who was great Grand-son to Nestor, and being cast out of Messenia by the Heraclida, came and lived at Athens) being driven into exile by the Pisistratide (or Pisistratus his Sons) having sometimes endeavoured in vain the recovery of their Countreys liberty, fill lay in wait for a more convenient opportunity to accomplish it. Being full of Money, they hired the Amphyctones to let them build a new Temple at Delfos, which was very magnificent, and corrupted the Pythia (or the woman that received and delivered the Oracles, standing in a Tripod, or three footed Stool) as often as any of Sparta came thither, fill to propose to them to let Athens at liberty. This being constantly done, the Lacedæmonians accounted it a piece of their Religion to do it, and sent Anchimolius, a man of prime Rank amongst them, with an Army to expell the Pisistratide, though their Friends, and such as had deferved no otherwile than well of them. They being aware of this, had contracted friendship and alliance with the Thessalians, and now procured from them a supply of one thousand Horse, which by a common Decree they sent under the Command of Cixes their King, which falling in upon the Camp of the Spartans, slew amongst many others Anchimolius the General, and beat the other to their Ships, in which they returned home.

13. Afterwards the Lacedæmonians sent another Army by Land, under the Conduct of Cleomenes the Son of Auxandridas, who invading the Athenian Territories was encountered by the Thessalian Horse, which he put to flight, and having killed above forty of them, the rest shifted away, and betook themselves as they could into Thessaly. Cleomenes then coming up to the City besieged the Tyrants, being shut up within the Pelagick wall, but being unprovided for a Siege, and they furnished sufficiently with Provisions, after a few days he was about to depart homeward, had not one thing fallen out. As the Children of the Pisistratide were privately to be conveyed out of the Countrey, they were intercepted, which overturned the Affairs of their Parents, and forced them to Covenant with the Athenians, for their Ranom, within five days to depart out of Attica, which accordingly was done, Hippias going straight to Sigæus, and thence to Lampacus, from which place he went to Darius, and in the twentieth year after returned with his Army; and died (as some say) in the Battle at Marathon. Sigæus was a Town situate upon the Hellepont, which Pisistratus took by force out of the Hands of the Mityleneans, and made Hegesthratus his base son, by a woman of Argos, Tyrant there. Hippias was offered from Amynas the King of Macedonia, either Amynas, or Iolos, a City in Macedonia; but he refused both, and betook himself to Darius, whose Army he afterwards conducted into Attica.

14. The State of Athens great before, grew greater after this grand mutation, in which two men contended for the chief Authority: Clisthenes one of the Alcmaonide (the Nephew by his Mother of Clisthenes, the Tyrant of Sicyon) and Isgoras the Son of Tylander. Clisthenes being too weak for the other's faction, that he might engratiate himself with the people, whereas they were before divided but into four Tribes, encreased them unto ten, and whereas formerly they were named from the four Sons of Ion, viz. Telon, Agicor, Argadeus, and Hoplotes, now he changed these for other Heroes which were, 1. Hippothoon the Son of Neptune, 2. Antiochus of Heraclides, 3. Ajax of Telamon, 4. Leon the Athenian, Pausan is At who according to the Oracle devoted his Daughters for the publick safety, 5. Erechtheus, who slew Immarradus the Son of Eumolpus, 6. Agæus, 7. Oeneus the base Son of Pandion, 8. Amias the Son of Thetis, 9. Cecrops, and 10. Pandion.

15. Isgoras envying Clisthenes that respect, which hereby he obtained, procured Cleomenes the King of Sparta (with whom he had contracted Friendship during the War with Hippias) to come once more against Athens. He sent a Messenger first, and presently procured him to be banished, and yet came thither with an Army, and besides many of the Family of Alcmaon formerly cast out with Clisthenes, now also expelled 700 Families proper for War, under pretence of their being contaminated with them in the business of the death of Cylon. Then endeavoured he to dissolve the Senate, and commit their Power to those of Isgoras his faction; but both Senate and People resisting, Isgoras and he with their men seized on the Cattle wherein they were besieged two days: On the third the Lacedæmonians demonians with Isgoras had leave to depart, but the rest were cast into Prison, and put to Death. Then was Clythene with the seven hundred Families recalled, who reformed the Democratical Government to the City, as it was founded by the Laws of Solon.

Clythene's re-

Laws.

The Ostracism

16. To Clythene is also ascribed the introducing of the Ostracism into the Athenian State, being generally granted to have been brought in a little after the banishment of the Pisistratida. For, considering the Calamities which had hapned in their time, the Athenians for the time to come would have all of equal Power and Authority. By the Ostracism therefore they forced absence from the City for ten Years upon the most powerful amongst them for Glory, Nobility, or Eloquence, lest they should grow too great; without any Ignominy, or disgrace; they being neither deprived of Goods, Lands, or any thing, save their presence at home for that time. The form of it was this. Each of the Citizens wrote the Name of that man in an Oyster Shell (whence it had the name of Ostracism) who seemed to him to be the most powerful for the overturning of the Democracy, and then brought the Shell in as a suffrage into the place designed, and so he that was found to have most written with his Name, was for ten years ordered to leave the City. But two conditions were required that this Judgement should stand in force: That no fewer than six thousand should be at the meeting, and the giving of Suffrages; and that those that gave them should be no younger than sixty years old. The first that was banished by this Law, was (as Ælian tells us) Clythene the Author of it, though (according to another) Hippiarchus, and Charmus kinsman to Pisistratus: In after times Aristides, because of that great Title first given to him, and Themistocles for his Military Glory.

17. But Cleomenes the Lacedæmonian King perceiving himself damned both by Word and Deed from the Athenians, raised forces throughout Peloponnesus, intending (though dissembling the matter) to be revenged upon them, and set up Isgoras as Tyrant over them. He invaded one part, and procured the Boeotians on one side, and the Inhabitants of Chalcis on the other, to fall in upon other places. The Athenians thus distressed on all sides, yet first went against the Peloponnesians lying in Eleusine, and when the Armies were about to join, the Corinthians, first bethinking themselves of the injustice of their cause, withdrew themselves; and so did Demaratus the Son of Arifon King of Sparta, and the Colleague of Cleomenes, having never dissented from him formerly. Then the rest of the associates seeing that the Kings agreed not betwixt themselves, and the Corinthians were gone, drew off also in like manner: the Athenians then to be revenged, fell upon the Boeotians, of whom killing many, they took prisoners seven hundred, and then passing over into Eubœa the same day, chastized the Inhabitants of Chalcis in like manner. Thus, four times the Dores out of Peloponnesus came into Attica, twice in a hostile manner, and twice to the help of the Athenians. First when they brought a Colony into Megara, which was in the time of Codrus, the second and third times to expel the Pisistratida, and now the fourth, when Cleomenes with the Peloponnesians invaded Eleusine.

18. The Thebans and the rest of the Boeotians, seeing themselves too weak for the Athenians, desired help of the Inhabitants of Ægina, an Island situate in that part of the Sea, which severed Attica from Argolis, being five miles distant from the former, some eight in Circuit, and the Country of Æacus, (whence the Æacida) having a City of its own Name. The Æginetians bearing an old grudge to those of Athens, and puffed up with a conceit of their Wealth, easily embraced their Society, and when the Athenians were busy with the other, passed over in their long Ships into Attica, and wasted the Coasts thereof. The Lacedæmonians at this time understanding how they had been deluded by the Alcemonide their corrupting the women that gave out the Oracles, and thereby their loss both of their old Friends, and all thanks also as to the Athenians; hearing further by the Oracles which Cleomenes had brought out of the Citadel of Athens, that that State should much distress them, and especially seeing how weak it was under Tyrants, but now how it increased in strength after the recovery of its liberty, called back Hippias, resolving to restore him. He was ready at their call, but then it happened that Soficles the Corinthian Ambassador and others of their Confederates utterly disallowed of this practice, and therefore seeing there was no hope of recovering his former Condition, he returned into Asia, and there laboured with all his might to possess Ariarperner the Satrap of Lydia against the Athenians, that they might be conquered by Darius his Brother. They lent to Ariarperner, to desire him not to give credence to their Exiles; but as when two or three years before, when they sent to enter into society with the Perfians, he told them they must give Earth and Water, as symbols of subjection (which the Ambassadors doing, were much blamed at their return) so now he told them, if they would be safe, they must receive Flippias. They refused the Condition, and chose rather to be professed Enemies to the Perfians, and thence presently after joined with Aristagoras, who withdrew the Ionians from their obedience, which provoked Darius afterwards to invade them, procured the Expedition of Xerxes, and the quarrel of that Empire with Greece. But these things concerning Athens and Hippias, hapned in the first year of the sixty ninth Olympiad, the eighteenth of the Reign of Darius, A. M. 3501.

19. After the Ionian War was over, and the Gracians in Asia were forced once more to undergo the yoke, Darius in the twenty seventh year of his reign, and the third after his victory, sent into Greece to demand Earth and Water as tokens of subjection. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians threw the Messengers into a well, and had them thence fetch Earth and Water to carry to their Master, but the Inhabitants of Ægina and other Islanders, for fear of the Perfians, promised obedience. The Athenians presently took offence thereat, as judging that the Æginetians did it out of a grudge to them, that they might fight under the conduct of the Perfians against Athens, and therefore they sent to Sparta to complain of them as Traitors to Greece. Cleomenes was sent from that State, and came to Ægina, with an intention to apprehend the principal authors of the revolt; but one Crius there openly opposed him, threatening him, in case he laid violent hands on any, for that he knew he did it without any publick decree of the Lacedæmonians, who else would have sent the other King with him. This he said at the instance of Demaratus the other King of Sparta, who disagreeing with Cleomenes ever since the invasion of Attica, now also grievously accused him in his absence. Hereupon Cleomenes returned home, cast out Demaratus, upon pretence of his illegitimation, from his Office, and put Leutychides his kinsman in his place.

20. The Father of Demaratus was Arifon, of the posterity of Procles, a man as worthy as any of his Ancestors; who having no children by two wives (for which cause he divorced them) to satisfy the desires of the people (which greatly wished for some issue male from him) married a third, which already was the wife of his friend Agerus, covenanting with him for her, (the being the most beautiful woman next after Helena) which by the Laws of Lycurgus he might do. Being married, it hapned just after seven months, when he was according to the custom sitting amongst the Ephori, his household-servant came and signified to him that he had a Son born, with the fuddainness of which thing being disturbed, he rashly swore that it was not his, coming so much within the time. The Ephori then neglected it, and he afterwards repenting of his rashness, brought up the Child as his own, and because he was so desired by the publick wishes of the People, gave him the name of Demaratus. After his death Demaratus succeeded, a man of great worth, and who obtained a crown in the Olympick Games, which never hapned before to the Kings of Sparta. But that speech of his Father was now objected against him, by his Colleague and Emulator Cleomenes the Son of Anaxandrides, who accused him also for their retreating formerly out of Attica, which occasioned all the difference betwixt them; and all this was aggravated by Leutychides, who fought for his place, and had a private quarrel with him about a woman, of which he had hindered him by taking her to himself to wife.

21. Great contention hence arising, the Spartans resolved to send to Delphos, and enquire of the Oracle whether Demaratus was the Son of Arifon; which being done, Cleomenes procured a friend he had at Delphos, to corrupt Pythia, so that being drawn by bribery he gave the answer against Demaratus. Hereby Cleomenes procured him to be removed from the Kingdom, and Leutychides his kinsman to succeed him; yet though thus handled, he ceased not to love his Country, and continuing at home, disdained not to bear inferior Offices, till further affronted by Leutychides, who to insult over and deride him, at such a time as he was overseeing the exercises of the Boyes, sent and demanded of him how he liked of that Office after the Kingdom. He answered, that he had tried both, but the other not, and that that question should be the original either of great mischief or happiness to the Lacedæmonians, and then getting him home with his head covered he sacrificed to Jupiter, and sending for his Mother conjured her to tell him the truth concerning his Father. Being assured from Demaratus depopulated, and Leutychides put in his place.

Sect. 1. from her of his Legitimation, he went out of the City, under pretence of going to Delfos; but took the way to Elis, and thence to the Island Zacynthus, and so to Darius King of Persia, the Zacynthians having refused to give him up to his Country-men who pursued him. He was received with great honour by the Persians, who bestowed Lands upon him to maintain him in a Princely equipage; and there his posterity is reported to have endured a long life span.

ill end.

22. Not long after Cleomenes received his just reward, his own hands being his executioners; for, his treachery against Demaratus being come to light, and fearing to be called to an account for it, he first fled into Theffalie, and thence returning into Arcadia stirred up the Inhabitants against the Spartans, and attempted to swear them to be true to him whithersoever he should lead them. The Lacedæmonians hearing of this, and fearing what he might do to them, recalled and restored him to his former dignity; but when he was come home, having not had before this time a very felled head, he now fell into a Phrensie, as he met any one in the City, pushing their faces with his Scepter. His friends bound him with wooden fetters, in which condition, partly by intreaties, and partly by threats, he got a Sword of his Keeper, wherewith beginning at the calf of his leg, he cut up his flesh upwards to the thighs, and, when he ripped up his belly, died, leaving no issue behind him, but a pattern of Justice to all Greece, which being amuled at his end, most attributed it to the corruption of Pythia, and that in justice done to Demaratus the Athenians attributed it to his invasion of Eleusine, and his destroying the Temple of their gods; but the Argives concluded this Judgment to have fallen upon him, because he had basely killed such of their Country-men as escaped from a battle fought with him, after he had got them out of the Temple of Argos, and had burnt down the grove which he had taken. This passage betwixt the Lacedæmonians and Argives, is to be related though it be in the same order Herodotus hath done it, it having happened long before the death of Cleomenes, and as Pausanias saith, in the beginning of his reign.

In Lægionis.

23. For Consulting the Oracle at Delfos, it was answered, that he should take Argos, and hereupon he raised an Army and invaded the Territories of that State. The Argives in their own defence made haste to meet him, but he setting upon them as they were at dinner, put many of them to the Sword, and besieged the rest in the grove at Argos, whither they fled. Then learning their names from such fugitives as were with him, he called them man by man out of the Wood to redeem themselves (which at the Lacedæmonians rate was two Mina a man) and so fifty of them coming out of the grove (in which place they could not see beforehand what was done to their Companions) he put to the Sword. At length one of them climbing up a tree discovered the matter, after which no man would come out; but then he set fire to the grove and burnt it and them together. After this, asking to whom of their gods the grove belonged it was answered to Argus, and so he found and acknowledged Himself deceived by the Oracle. Returning to Sparta, he was accused as having been corrupted, for that he might have taken Argos if he would; but the major part were fatished with his excuse and acquitted him. As for Argos it was rendered by this overthrow full of desolate men, that the Slaves got almost all things, till such time as the sons of the slain grew up and recovered their Patrimony; after which the Slaves conquered Tyrinthe, and held it, till perfwaded by Cleander a certain Wizard, they returned, and made War upon their Masters, which continued long, till such time as the Argives with difficulty remained Conquerors.

Lentychides punished for the injury offered to Darius.

24. Cleomenes being dead, the Aginetans sent and complained of Lentychides for the injury he had done to them, in causing together with Cleomenes ten of their principal men to be kept as Hostages, at Athens. He was given up to them, but fearing to carry a King of Sparta away prisoner, though for the present the State had given him up, they took him only to Athens to procure them the liberty of their Hostages. But the Athenians put them off, as refusing to deliver them without the authority of two Kings, seeing both of them committed them to their custody, and the journey being to no purpose Lentychides was dismissed and so returned; but yet he also paid for the injury offered to Demaratus. * For leading an Army into Theffalie, of which as of the War he had full and ample power, he was corrupted with money, and betrayed the interest of his Country, after which being discovered, as he held the money in both his hands sitting in his tent, he was apprehended and carried to Sparta, where being called to account, he fled to Tegæa, and there died in exile, his house being razed as a traitor to his Country.

25. But

25. But the Aginetans, of old, Enemies to those of Athens, were now much more incensed against them for detaining their Hostages, and set themselves to study a revenge. At that time there was at Sunium (the utmost promontory of Attica) a Gallie which (according to the custom observed every year since the time of Theseus) was then going to Delfos, aboard of which were the principal men of Athens: on this they seized, and taking the men prisoners, bound them all. The Athenians hereat enraged, laboured with all might on the other hand to revenge this, and agreed with one Nicomachus to have the City berraid to them; yet for that they could not get their Fleet together soon enough, they came a day too late, and missed of that enterprise. But through the counsel of Themistocles, having rigged a Fleet of seventy Gallies (twenty of which the Corinthians sold them at an inconsiderable rate, because by the Law they could not give them) they set upon the Aginetans, and overthrew them in a Sea-fight. They betook themselves for aid to the Argives their old friends, but having offended them not long before, they received a publick denial, yet underhand a supply of one thousand Volunteers, most of whom fell in Arginia by the hands of the Athenians, against whom yet the Aginetans afterwards, reinforcing their power at Sea, in another battle became Victors. But what the issue of this War farther was, is not declared by Herodotus, who yet elsewhere affirmeth, that it gave occasion to the safety of all Greece, by putting the Athenians upon the care of Sea-matters, whereby when Xerxes came, they became the bulwark thereof. Probable it is, that this War which was begun before the battle of Marathon, was not compell'd till the time that Xerxes was about to invade Greece, when we read that all the Græcians (and these two States amongst the rest) resolved to lay aside all private quarrels amongst themselves, the Aginetans being observed by * another to have had the Dominion of the Sea twenty years, until the passage of Xerxes, which thenceforth they were forced to yield to the Athenians.

The battle of Marathon.

Miltiades

26. Whilest the Athenians were busy in the War against Aginia, Darius sent his Forces into Greece against them, and the Eretrians (inhabitants of the Island Euboea) which though they took the City of the latter, and made them Captives, yet were they overthrown by the former in the battle at Marathon. After the fight two thousand Spartans came to Athens (being hindered hitherto by their superstitious, which forbade them from a Law of Lycurgus not to stir out till the full Moon) whence they proceeded to Marathon to see the number of the slain, and then commending the valour of the Athenians returned home. Of these were slain in this fight Callimachus one of the Polemarchs, Cynegirus commended by many Writers, who when the Persians fled, and betook themselves to their ships, held one of them with his hands till they were cut off, and then with his teeth, till at length he was slain; and Hippias the late Tyrant (who now hoping to recover, after twenty years banishment, his old power, became the conductor of the Persian Forces) though neither Herodotus nor Thucydides make mention of his death, yet is reported by later Authors here to have been slain. Themistocles now a young man behaved himself gallantly in the battle, but the success is ascribed to the valour, and conduct of Miltiades, to whom, when Aristides one of the Captains had assigned his day's Government, the rest when it came on their turns did the same, after that by the same help he had carried it into the Council for a battle. Yet did he not fight till his own day came, and then ingaging, overthrew the Enemy in that memorable battle.

His Pedegree
and Actions.

27. His father was Cimon, who in the Tyranny of Pisistratus departed from Athens, and thrice obtained the Garland in the Olympick Games; yet being reconciled to Pisistratus afterwards returned, but after his death was slain by his faction. His eldest son, was called after his Grand-father Stesagoras, was brought up with their half Uncle Miltiades in the Chersonesus, over which he was Prince. His other son was this Miltiades, so called after this his Uncle, which dying without Children, Stesagoras succeeded him, but not long after was killed by one that counterfeited himself a fugitive, and died also without issue. Then did the Pisistratides send Miltiades to succeed his brother in the Principality of the Chersonesus, and there he ruled when Darius undertook the expedition into Scythia and he it was that gave the Ionians counsel to break the bridge, and leave him there wandering with his Army. Being seized, he married Hegestippa the daughter of Olorus King of Thrace; but the Scythians provoked by Darius, and making an excursion as far as the Chersonesus, he he daring not to withstand them fled, and after their retreat was restored by the Phœnicians. After some years Darius being angry with him, sent a Fleet of Phœnicians to subdue the Chersonesus; whereupon he fled with five Gallies from Cardia, and came to Abens; but as he fled the Phœnicians intercepted one of them, and therein his son Metiochus, who being presented to Darius, received from him house, lands, and a Persian Wife. Being returned home, he was accused for possessing the Tyranny of the Chersonesus, but was acquitted, and having perfwaded the Athenians to cast Darius his Ambassador into the pit, was afterwards declared by the people one of their Captains, and thence had occasion to obtain this famous Victory at Marathon.

28. Miltiades flourishing in great glory, and grace with the people, obtained of them seventy Gallies well manned, not making known his intention, but professing that he would much thereby benefit the State. He layled to the Island Paros (one of the Cyclades in the Aegean-Sea, and famous for the best Marble) the inhabitants of which having assisted the Persians at Marathon, he besieged, demanding one hundred Talents of them. They would not hear of parting with money, but made provision for resistance, whereupon he harraished their Territories, and more closely besieged them, and attempted the City for twenty days, but leaping off from a Wall, he hurt his Thigh, and was forced to return home. There, when he was arrived, he was accused by Xanthippus (the son of Arifphon, and Father to Pericles, his Emulator) of Treason, as having voluntarily miscarried in the Enterprise about Paros. He could not be present himself to answer, his Thigh now corrupting, which held him in his bed, but Stragorus, or Tisagoras, his brother (according to Cor. Nepos) or rather, one of his friends were there for him, bidding the people remember the battle at Marathon, and the taking of Lemnus, which he having expelled the Pelagians, had subdued under the Athenian power. The people spared his life, but fined him fifty Talents, which sum this expedition cost them. One tells us it was not out of any regard to his Crime so much, as having lately been under the Tyranny of Pisistratus, they feared now the power of their own Citizens, and him especially, who having been much practised in Magistracy and Power, and enclined naturally to a love of it, could scarcely as they thought bear the condition of a private life; so that though being called a Tyrant, he obtained that power not by his own seeking, but was ever found to be just, moderate, and humble; yet having a great name for Military matters, and thereby great interest, they chose rather to condemn him though innocent, than continually to be in fear; though they might have thought on the Ostracism.

29. After this, Miltiades died in prison of the corruption of his Thigh, as most have delivered, his fine being yet upon the score; upon which account the Athenians would not suffer his body to be buried, till such time as his Son Cimon offered himself to bonds in the room thereof. As his father before him, so he was unable to pay the fine, and by the Laws of Athens could not be released until he had done it. He had then to Wife his sister by the Father's side (as we are to take it) named Elpinice, it being lawful for the Athenians to marry such. One Callias there was in the City, a rich man, though of a vulgar cast, who had gained much by the Mines; he being in love with her, offered Cimon, if he would part with her to him, to discharge the fine. Cimon slighted the offer, but the vowed that he would not suffer any of Miltiades his Children to die in prison, and that to prevent such a thing, he would marry Callias, if he would perform his offer. Cimon was perfwaded, married her to him, and the fine being discharged, was set at liberty, which he presently improved for his own advancement. These things fell out not long after the battle at Marathon.

30. Three years the Gracians had rest, as from without, so within themselves, till the coming of Xerxes; only the War betwixt the Athenians and Ægians still depended, until common danger drew them to a composition. As the Athenians had given most occasion to the invasion of Greece, so they bore the greatest burden thereof, and by the means of Themistocles, one of their Citizens, procured the overthrow and flight of Xerxes, in that by his Stratagems the Peloponneseans were brought to fight, and not suffered to depart to their several homes, which would have brought certain destruction to them all. Assistant to Themistocles was another of his Country-men, named Arifides, who though banished by the Ostracism through his procurement, for that, as they disagreed in temper, so in their way of policy, and Government (Themistocles being quick, bold, crafty, and and easily changeable, according to the juncture of affairs; but Arifides constant and grave, only intent upon Justice, and who neither in jest nor earnest would give way to lying, scurrility, or deceit) yet now with others was recalled by his means for the safety of the Country, and voluntarily laid aside all private quarrels which came into competition with the public safety. The surname of Fust which first got this man love, afterward procured him envy, Themistocles whispering this into the ears of the multitude, that whilst he took upon him to censure all things, he had prepared for himself a Throne, in the ruin of the Courts of Judicature, being defended with a sufficient Guard. The multitude puffed up with their success at Marathon, and designing great things in their heads, could ill bear any that excelled them in fame and glory, and therefore flocking into the City they banished him by the Ostracism, cloaking their envy at his glory with a specious pretence of fear of Tyranny.

31. When they were come together to give their suffrages, a Countryman ignorant of Letters, is reported to have given a shell to Arifides (not knowing him, but to be of the common sort) and desired him to write for him therein the name of Arifides, at which he wondering, and asking him if ever he had received any injury at his hands, he said no, but that he was troubled to hear him all over go by the name of Fust. Arifides hearing this, answered nothing, but wrote his own name, and gave it to the man, and when he departed out of the City, with hands lifted up to heaven prayed (contrary to what Achilles did when he found himself ill used by Agamemnon) that the estate of Athens might never happen to be such as to give them occasion to think of Arifides. But in the third year after, when Xerxes now marched through Thessaly and Boeotia towards Attica, the Athenians repealing their Decrees, recalled all that were banished, especially for fear of Arifides, left joining with the Enemy, he might by his Authority draw many of their Citizens to revolt. They were mistaken concerning the mans disposition, for before the Decree for his return was made, he had not been wanting to provoke the Gracians as much as he could to defend their liberty; then joined with Themistocles, though one most averse to him, and for the publick good advanced him to the highest degree of Dignity. He joyed in endeavours with him for procuring the Gracians to fight, and understanding that Pisyrallia a little Island before Salamina was possessed of the Enemy, he passed over thither with a party of such as voluntarily followed him, and put them all to the sword, except some of the chiefest, to whom he gave quarter. He disposed Soldiers to throughout the Island, that on which quarter soever any of either party should light, he might seize upon them, and so preserve his friends, and provide that none of the enemy should escape; upon which account a Trophy was erected in Pisyrallia. And when Themistocles to try him after the victory, said, that one brave act was done, viz. the overthrow of Xerxes, but that another remained, which was, by breaking the bridge to take Asia in Europe, he earnestly desired him to reject all such advice, and rather to consider how soon they might expel the Mede out of Greece, left being shut in with such great Forces, and all opportunity of flight being taken away, he might by necessity be egged on to revenge.

32. After the overthrow and flight of Xerxes, Themistocles having the greatest authority in the Fleet, went therewith against such Islanders as had taken part with the Persians, demanding money of them. He urged them with two powerful divinities Periswasion and Necessity, to which the inhabitants of Andros (one of the Cyclades) trusting in the strength of their Fortifications, opposed two others as strong as the former, viz. Poverty and Impossibility, whereupon they were close besieged, and it being to no purpose, the Fleet returned to Salamine, Themistocles without the privacy of the rest, going to other Islands, from which by his threats he exacted much money. After they had at Salamine divided the spoils, and consecrated part thereof to their gods, they went to the Isthmus, there to reward him who should be thought to have best in the War deserved of Greece. When the Captains severally came to deliver their minds in writing at the Altar of Neptune, each one ascribed to himself the first place in merit, but to Themistocles assigned the second, which amounted to as much, as if by a silent confession they had acknowledged his merit to be principal. And though by the envy of the Captains his glory was depressed, yet was he accounted the most prudent man of all Greece, and being invited down to Lacedæmon, by the judgment of that severe State, as the praise of valour was given to their own Eurybiades, so that of prudence and dexterity unto him. They gave him a crown of Olives, and the best Chariot they had, as a reward, and what before was not done to any mortal man by them, at his departure, to do him honour, they sent three hundred Horse to conduct him to the borders of their Dominions. After this, the Græcians overthrew Mardonius, whom Xerxes had left behind him, at the battle of Plataea, and the same day the Persian Fleet at Mycale a Promontory of Ionia, which they hereby restored to liberty, Xanthippus being Archon at Athens; in the second year of the seventy fifth Olympiad, and the seventh of the Reign of Xerxes. During which passages abroad, little hapned at home but in relation to them; the sum of which elsewhere hath been related.

Learned Men.

33. As for learned men which flourished during this period; some of the seven Wise men of Greece lived in the time of Cyrus, and about the beginning of the Persian Empire. These seven were, Pittacus of Mitylene, who was born about the thirty second Olympiad; Bias of Priene, Chilon of Lacedæmon, and Cleobulus of Lindus, all who flourished about the forty seventh Olympiad, with Thales of Miletus, who being born about the first year of the thirty fifth Olympiad, foretold an Eclipse of the Sun, which hapned about the third year of the fourth eighth, in the reign of Ayattes, and Astyages, and about the beginning of the fifty eighth, having helped Croesus over the River Halys, by draining it with a ditch, then died. The sixth was Solon of Athens, who died the same year with Thales, and the seventh Periander of Corinth.

Casual Digressions Lucian.

34. Besides these there was Xenophanes the Colophonian, who being born in the fortieth Olympiad, came into Sicily, when Hieron and Epicharmus flourished about the seventieth Olympiad. Epicharmus lived ninety seven years as Lucian writeth, and invented the Comedy eight years before the beginning of the Persian Empire. Phocylides flourished at the same time, to whom a Poem yet extant concerning Laws is ascribed, though Scaliger thinks it made by some Hellenistic Jew. Besides these, Anacreon the Teian Poet, who as Pliny writeth, was choaked with the stone of a raisin. Simonides a Poet of the Island Ceos, where he was born in the City Isulis. Having lived some time at Athens with Hippiarchus the Son of Pisistratus, he went into Sicily unto Hiero, by whom being asked what God was, he demanded a days time to consider of it, and after that another; still professing that the more he studied the point, the more he was to seek in it. Some say he found out the Art of Memory, and that being very covetous, he first expold the Muses to sale. In the second year of the fifty eighth Olympiad, and eight before the Persian Empire, died Anaximander the natural Philosopher of Miletus. Anaximenes his Scholar flourished about that time. Theagenes of Rhegium the most ancient Chronographer. Democedes of Crotone a Physician, being taken Captive with Polycrates by Oetes the Persian, was carried as a Slave to Darius, with whom he lived in great esteem, after he had cured his foot and the breaf of his wife Aossa.

*Lib. 7. cap. 7.

35. There flourished also in Darius his time, Cadmus of Miletus an Historiographer, there having been another of this name and place, according to Suidas, who in four Books wrote the History of Miletus and all Ionia: and Serabo nameth Cadmus, Pherecydes and Hecateus as those who first of all Greeks wrote Prose. Hecateus flourished at this time, and gave light to Herodotus. Phrynichus the Athenian, a tragical Poet, who first caused a woman to be personated, and invented the verse with four feet. Heraclitus the Ephesian, a contemner of Heathenish Idols, who out of fear wrote his Book of Nature in such an obscure manner, that that thence he got the name of Scotivus or Dark. Zeno of Eleea, or Pelia, in Italy, Scholar to Parmenides, who conspiring against Nearchus the Tyrant, endured torments to death, rather than he would discover his complices. Pythagoras the son of Mnesarchus the Samian, but born at Sidos in Phœnicia, about the fifty third Olympiad. Being twelve years old he learnt of Thales and Phocylides, from the latter taking the transmigration of Souls. Travelling into Aegypt and to Babylon, he drunk in the learning of both places. About the sixty eighth Olympiad he went into Italy, where he lived first at Crotone, and then at Metapontus. Here he taught and constituted the Italian School or Sect, as Thales had done the Ionick. Where as others suffered themselves to be called Sophoi, he would be called out of modesty Philosophus. In the sixty seventh Olympiad he found out the nature and course of the Planet Venus. In the fourth year of the seventieth he died at Metapontus, where he was so admired, that his house was made a Temple, and that part of Italy called Magna Græcia. Amongst his Scholars was Milo the famous Wrestler; and women through him became famous for learning, their Epistles being yet extant.

Of such things as fell out amongst the Græcians, from their Victories at Plataea and Mycale, until the beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

Containing the space of forty eight Years.

I. The Persians being overthrown in Greece both at Sea and Land, and so driven utterly out of Europe; and those that fled into Asia in Ships being also defeated at Mycale, Leutychides the Spartan who there commanded in chief, returned home with his Associates of Peloponnesus. The Athenians with the Ionians, and those that inhabited upon the Hellespont, besieged Sestos, which the Persians had seized on, all Winter, and reduced it; after which they also all departed home.

Thucyd. l. 2.

2. The Athenians having brought home their Wives and Children, after the overthrow of Mardonius, had the popular Government restored by Aristides, and set themselves to rebuild the Walls of their City in a greater compass, and stronger than had been formerly, being thereto especially induced through the perswasal of Themistocles. The Lacedæmonians above all others were heret exceedingly troubled, as confiding that having obtained so great Glory by the two Victories at Marathon and Salamina, the Athenians would yet contend with them for the Principality, and upon that account they wished them as weak as might be. They disswaded them therefore from going on with their work; alleging that it was dangerous for Greece to have any fortified place without the Peloponnesus, which the Barbarians might seize on, and possess. They said they would send answer by Ambassadors of their own, and Themistocles took the business upon him. He first went alone, and ordered that the rest should follow, but not till the Wall was brought to a reasonable height; that in the mean time both Bond and Free should ply the work; and sparing no place, whether Holy or Prophane, Private or Public, take all such stuff for building as they might soonest light on. When he came to Sparta, he demanded no audience, but fought to protract the time, pretending he expected his Collegues. The Lacedæmonians complaining that nevertheless the Work went on, and that he went about to deceive them, the other Ambassadors arrived, of whom after he knew that the Fortifications were almost finished, he laboured to perswade the Ephori (who now had the chief Power in that State) that the things were false, which they were made to believe, desired them to send Persons considerable whom they might trust to make inspection, and keep him as an Hostage till their return.

3. They sent accordingly three of their principal men to Athens, and with them Themistocles his Collegues, to whom he gave in charge that the Lacedæmonians should not be dismissed till his return. After their departure, he demanded audience of the Magistrates and Senate, and then freely and openly professed, that the Athenians by his Advice, and agreeable to the common Law of Nations, had fenced their publick and private Goods with a Wall, that they might more easily defend them; and neither could that be to the damage of Greece, of which Athens was the Bulwark against the Barbarians, for here the King's Navy had twice suffered Shipwrack. He told them, they did ill to regard more their private ambition, than what was profitable for all Greece; and, to conclude, if they expected the return of their Ambassadors, they must dismiss him, or else never expect to see them again; which accordingly they were forced to do with much private regret, though ashamed to own the Cause. He advised his Country-men further to finish the work of the Piræus or Port of Athens, which they had begun a long time before, whilst he was Archon; for he perswaded them first to apply themselves

The Wall he caused to be made so thick as two Carriages loaded with Stones might pass by each other; but brought the height of it but to half of that which he had designed. And with so great a desire was he carried out for the enlargement of the Dominion of that State, that observing the Lacedæmonian Navy to be drawn up at Gythium, and so, easy to be set on fire, he much desired to have it done, and told the People he had a thing of great moment in his Head, but such as was not to be divulged. The People appointed Aristides to confer with him, and if he approved it, resolved he might prosecute it; but he making a report that Themistocles advised a thing, than which nothing was more profitable, and more unjust, he was commanded to desist.

4. A little after these things, Pausanias the Lacedæmonian, famous for the Victory at Platæa, was sent with a Fleet of twenty Peloponnesian Gallies, and thirty of Atica, against Cyprus, where he took many Towns, and Byzantium afterwards, held by the Persians. He was very imperious towards the Associates, in so much as he carried himself more like a Tyrant than a General, and being forely complained of to his Superiours, he was by them recalled to give an account of it. He gaped after the Kingdom of Greece, and to that end, entered into conspiracy with Xerxes, whose Daughter he asked to Wife, and being accused of much favour shewed towards the Persians, yet for that nothing could be proved, he was dismissed, having the Government of the Fleet only taken from him. Yet returned he to the Hellspoint, under pretence of the War to continue his intelligence with Xerxes; but being expelled from Byzantium by the Athenian Soldiers, he returned not to Sparta, but staid at Troas, and for that was again complained of, as holding clandestine Conferences with the Persians, and not having any just and warrantable Cause there to remain. Hereupon he was called home by the Ephori the second time, and cast into Prison, but appearing again to his Tryal, he was the second time dismissed.

5. The Lacedæmonians sent Dorcis with others to succeed Pausanias in the Fleet; but the Associates would take no notice of him; for Aristides the Fust, Captain of the Athenians, so moderately behaved himself, and wrought cross to the Actions of Pausanias, that all the Cities of Asia hating the others pride, joyed themselves to him, so that he became the means of transferring the chief Command at Sea, which (together with that at Land also) had hitherto been enjoyed by the Lacedæmonians, unto his own Country-men; the Spartans, at this time not being unwilling, or opposing it in the least, so ashamed were they of the carriage of their own Citizens. The Athenians being thus advanced by the Associates for their moderation, under pretence of revenging the States upon Xerxes, obtained also liberty to lay a Tax upon them all, how much Money one, and how many Ships another should find. Officers they appointed to receive the Tributes, the sum of all which amounted to four hundred and sixty Talents: Delos was appointed for the Treasury, and the place to meet in, to deliberate of the Affairs of all the free States. This affects (as Plutarch writeth) was made by Aristides at the desire of the Græcians, who relied upon his integrity; and his moderation so much appeared herein, that afterwards the Athenians inflamed the States, and drawing the Tributes to their private use, first doubled, and then tripled the sum. For now, whereas the whole Tax imposed by him amounted but to four hundred and sixty Talents, Pericles added almost a third part (as Plutarch reckoneth) and increased it to six hundred, and after his death it was brought to one thousand and three hundred Talents.

6. The Athenians having fetled the Tribute, under the conduct of Cimon the Son of Miltiades, took from the Persians Eione, a Town of Thrace, situate upon the River Strymon, which they deprived of its Liberty. Then expelled they the Dolopians out of Sceyrus (an Island in the Egean Sea) and therein planted a Colony of their own; then waged they War with the Carysians in Eubœa, for denying them Obedience (which was compoised) and besieged the Naxians that had revolted from them, whom they forced to submit. This being the first of all Greek Cities, which, contrary to the League, was subjected to Bondage, after it, others were as occasion served, which was taken hold of by the Athenians, either for that they sent not the full Tribute, or Ships, or would not serve in the War when Affairs required it. The Athenians also feverely exacted what had been appointed, and compelled such as refused, having forgotten their former mildness, now in Power, and carrying it very imperiously towards their Associates whom they could could order as they pleased. And this was also effected by the Greeks themselves: for, to shun the labour of it, most of them chose rather to send money than ships; whereby the Athenians, who had Vessels enough, and always in readiness, increased their strength, and upon occasion found them unfit for resistance.

7. In the mean time Pausanias, who had been called home to Sparta, gave not over his conspiracy against his Country, though he changed his associates. For he now sought to draw the Hæloes, or publick Slaves, into rebellion with the allurements of liberty, and hereof being detected by one Argilæus (whom he had unchastly loved, and now being sent with Letters to Ariabarnus, suspected he carried a Warrant for his own death, and so opening them, discovered both his plot against himself and the State) he took sanctuary in the Temple of Minerva, and there the door being made up (to which end his own Mother is said to have brought the first stone) was starved to death. After his death the Spartans sent to Athens to accuse Themistocles of the same Crime, who being before this banished by the Ostracism, lived at Argos in great esteem, and was much envied by the Lacedæmonians for having done many things in his Countries behalf, which they looked upon as tending to their prejudice. 'Tis said that certain Letters were found in Pausanias his Coffers, intimating a correspondence betwixt them for promoting the affairs of the Persian King, which though he assented not unto, yet discovered not the thing, hoping Pausanias would either be deterred from his design, or the thing would come out some other way. But the Spartans laying it heavily to his charge, and his own Citizens envying his glory, though he sought to purge himself by Letters, yet was he condemned, and the people persuaded to send some to lay hold of him, and bring him up. He perceiving this, fled to Corycia, and thence to Admetus King of the Molossians, with whom, not being able to continue in safety, he went to Ariarxes Longimanus, by whom he was honourably received, and bountifully entertained (having three Cities given him, one for bread, another for wine, and a third for victuals, to which others add two more for Clothes and Linnen) and died at length at Magna a natural death, though some wrote, that seeing he was not able to perform his promise to the King of Conquering Greece, which by this time had many expert Captains (amongst whom of most especial note was Cimon) he poisoned himself.

8. (a) Four years after the banishment of Themistocles died Aristides, whose moderation and abstinence herein appeared, that having borne such Offices, yet he died so poor, that he scarcely left wherewith to be buried; yet so grateful was the State towards his memory, that his Children were provided for at the publick charge. Eight years after the battel of Platæa, Cimon being sent out by the Athenians, obtained in one day two notable victories at Sea and Land, over the Persians at Eury-medon, a River in Pamphylia, which brought him and the State no little credit. After this they fell out with the Thracians, who by their Colonies had taken possession of the rich Mines of Silver and Gold, which were in that part of Thrace, lying upon Macedonia, betwixt the two Rivers Strymon and Nyffus. For these Mines the Athenians envied them, and raised such a contention, that they withdrew themselves from the association; whereupon they presently commenced War against them, and overthrew them in a Sea-fight, and afterwards besieged them by Land. The Thracians besieged, sent to the Spartans, desiring them to invade Asia, thereby to divert the Athenians from them; and, having promised, they were ready to perform it; but that they were hindered by an Earth-quake, which first afflicted them, and whereupon the publick slaves (called Hæloes) of the posterity of the Messenians took their opportunity and rebelling, seized upon Ithome in the Territories of Messenia, being acted by that impression, which Pausanias not long before had made upon them.

9. The Spartans, much distressed by this rebellion, having lost two thousand men by the Earth-quake, besides a great loss in their buildings, after three years the Thracians were no longer able to hold out, and yielded to such hard conditions as the Athenians laid upon them. The Lacedæmonians proceeding but slowly in their War, sent to the Athenians for aid, which was sent them; but through sinister insinuations they returned it back again, and this was taken as an affront by the Athenians, who were very much moved at it. This was the beginning of that mutual malice and enmity which thenceforth passed betwixt these two States, and proved the rise of a bundance of mischief. For the Athenians, presently after the return of their men, forsook the League, which they had entered into with the Spartans against the common Enemy, and made an Alliance with the

A little after this, another great accession was made to the strength of the Athenians, and that with the detriment of the Spartans; for the inhabitants of Megara, Neighbours to the former, being fallen upon with War by the Corinthians, betook themselves to them for aid, though heretofore they had been the Allies them, having with them one thousand Argives, and a great number of other Allies, so that the whole amounted to fourteen thousand. Who when the Theffalians hoisted joy with them gave battle to the Lacedaemonians near Tanagra, a great and famous City of Boeotia, not far from Thebes. The Theffalians horse revolting to the Lacedaemonians, they obtained the victory, and then presently marching into Megaris, wasted it and so returned home through the Isthmus. Yet the Athenians resolving not to give way to Fortune, seventy two days after this defeat marched again into Boeotia to revenge themselves, which by the overthrow of the inhabitants they reduced, together with Phocis; rased the Walls about Tanagra, and compelled the Opuntians of Locris to give them one hundred Hostages of their richest men. At this time they perfected their long Walls; Argina was yielded to them, the Walls of which they pulled down, took away their shipping, and imposed Tribute upon them for the future. And Tolmides their Captain coasting Peloponnesus with a Fleet, burnt the Lacedaemonian Arsenal at Gythium, took Chalcis, a Town of the Corinthians, and landing his men, overthrew the Sicyonians in fight.

13. But in Egypt the Athenians had bad success, Inarus being taken and Crucified, and few of their men after six years returning home: fifty Gallies also being sent to their relief were most of them taken and sunk by the Phoenicians. Other Expeditions they made also with like success, save that they overthrew the Sicyonians again in battle; which made them after three years willing to make truce with the Peloponnesians for five years, by the advice of Cimon, whom being banished by the Ostracism they had recalled; during which time they warred in (b) Cyprus under conduct of Cimon, and in Egypt in the service of Amrutes the King, with good success. (c) After this followed the Holy War, as they called it, the Spartans taking the Temple at Delfos from the Phocians, and giving it up to the Delphians, from whom the Athenians again took it and restored it to the Phocians. Afterwards the (d) Boeotians revolted from the Athenians; who thereupon in great indignation under conduct of Tolmides invaded them, took Cheronea and other Towns, in which putting a Garrison and returning homewards they light upon the Enemy, who killed and took them all, and amongst others Tolmides was slain, who had made this bold attempt, contrary to the advice of Pericles the Son of Xanthippus, who now had begun to grow eminent. Hereat the Athenians exceedingly dashed, to redeem their prisoners parted with all Boeotia, and not long after all Euboea revolted from them, their credit being now on the decaying hand. To the recovery of this Island Pericles was sent, who scarcely being landed, news came that Megara had also revolted, and that the Peloponnesians were about to invade Attica.

14. This constrained him to return, and the Peloponnesians accordingly invaded Attica under the command of Plisbonax the Son of Paulanias the Lacedaemonian King. They wasted all as far as Eleusine; but Pericles there opposing them corrupted Cleandrides Counsellour to Plisbonax with gold, whereby they were deterred, and returned home, where Cleandrides was rewarded with death, and Plisbonax with banishment. Pericles having so easily dispatched his affairs here, returned into Euboea, which he wholly reduced, pulled down the Walls of Chalcis, and banished only the Inhabitants of Hestia, which he peopled with a Colony of his own Citizens. This various fortune inclined both sides to an accommodation, and procured a League to be made for thirty years betwixt the Athenians and Lacedaemonians, with their allies on both sides, whereby Nisaea, Abdia, Paga, and Trazene were set free by the Athenians, and it was made lawful for any City that had not been associate with either party, to join it self to which it best liked; which Article afterwards was urged by them of Corcyra to Athens, whereby they demonstrated that they ought not to deny them the liberty of association.

15. Six years after, a War arose betwixt the Inhabitants of Miletus <sup>Thucyd. lib. 1.</sup> and those of Samus, about Priene a Town in Ionia, under the Mountain <sup>Diodorus ad Olymp. 84. an. 4.</sup> Mycale. The Milesian affairs going down the wind they sent to Athens, where they grievously accused the other, with whom joyed also many of the Samians themselves, who not being employed in the Government, desired to have it changed. The Athenians being perfwaded by them, manned out forty ships against Samus, by which power Pericles restored the Popular Government, exacted eighty Talents, and taking for Hostages fifty Boys, and as many Men, which they kept in custody at Lemnos, put a Garrison of their own into Samus it self. But some of the Citizens who had withdrawn themselves into the continent, entred into

16. The Athenians, having notice of this presently dispatched away sixty Gallies against Samus, with forty four of which Pericles and his nine Colleagues failing for Miletus, engaged with the Samian Fleet consisting of seventy Vessels (whereof twenty were laden with Soldiers) at the Island Tragie, and obtained the victory, and afterwards with the other part of the Fleet, and a new supply of forty ships, failing to Samus, overthrew the Inhabitants, and closely besieged them both by Sea and Land. Pericles, whilst things were thus ordering, heard that the Phenicians were coming to the relief of the besieged, to meet whom he took away with him sixty Gallies, and bent his course towards Caria, after whose departure the Samians perceiving the Guards thinner than usual, broke out of the Haven, put to flight the ships that lay nearest, overthrew the next, and so recovering the mastery of the adjoining Sea, for fourteen days exported and imported what they pleased. But Pericles being returned with sixty other ships from Asia (commanded by excellent Captains) besides thirty others from Chius and Zesbus, they were besieged closer than ever, and being spent with the War, in the ninth month of the siege yielded up the City. The conditions were hard enough, viz. To demolish their Walls, give Hostages, deliver up their ships, and pay the charge of the War. Byzantium affrighted at this success, returned also to its former obedience.

17. Shortly after this, fell out those motions which occasioned the Corinthian, and so by consequence laid the foundation of the Peloponnesian War, about the second of the eighty fifth Olympiad, and the twenty fifth of the reign of Ariaxerxes Longimanus.

18. The Inhabitants of the Island Coreya, who were a Colony of the Corinthians, some eighty five years after their plantation in that Island (formerly called Phæachus, situate one the Illyrian shore, and being very populous) sent out a Colony which built a City called Epidamnus, and afterwards Dyrrachium, but not without the leave of Corinth the Metropolis, which at their request had assigned a Citizen of their own (Phalios of the posterity of Hercules) according to the Law and Custom, to be Prince of the Colony; and out of the number of their own Citizens and other Dores made up the number. This new Colony seated in a very convenient place, in a short time flourished exceedingly, and abounding with plenty of all things, as usually it hapneth, fell out of luxury unto civil dissensions about the Government, and hereat occasion being taken by their next neighbours the Taulantians (who made War upon them) suffered no little damage. At length the People incensed against the great ones expelled them the City, who thereupon betaking themselves to the Taulantians, procured them to distress Epidamnus both by land and sea, by which the people being straitened sent to the Coreyans their Founders, and Patrons, humbly to beseech them that by their authority they would make an accommodation betwixt them and their exiles, and bring the Taulantians to cease their Hostility. The Coreyans, whether disapproving the cause, or minding something else, rejected their petition, who then by direction from the Oracle at Delphos, betook themselves to the Corinthians, Founders of them both, and gave up their Colony into their hands. They were glad of this occasion, and presently promised them all assistance, being angry with the Coreyans, who upon their good fortune were grown insolent, and paid not the respect to them which was due from a Colony to the Metropolis; for they were so rich and strong, that giving way to no City of Greece in the former respect, they had also one hundred and twenty Gallies readily furnished, which drew envy upon them from the Corinthians, informed that now by the help of their Friends they resolved to chastise them, and sent a Party of Soldiers to defend Epidamnus, together with new planters to be imbedded into the Colony.

19. The Coreyans took this heavily that they should intermeddle with the affairs of their Colony, and being solicited by such exiles as had fled to them, sent a Fleet to Epidamnus, commanding it to receive the exiles without delay, and cast out the new Planters with the Corinthian Garrison. to do it, and the Corinthians making great provisions for the War, they sent their Ambassadors to Corinth with some Spartans and Sicyonians to bear witness of the matter, and offered to put it to a reference before equal Judges. But the Corinthians neglecting their Message, as resolved for War, they also made preparation for it. They still continuing the Siege before Epidamnus, the Corinthians sent a Fleet of seventy five Gallies, armed with two thousand fighting men together, but leaving forty for the carrying on of the Siege, with eighty more they engaged with them in a Sea-Fight near the Promontory of Actium, and got the Victory. The same day Epidamnus was yielded to that party they had left at the Siege, and so hereby getting the Dominion of the Sea far and wide, and growing proud upon their good Fortune, they invaded the Territories of the Allies of their Enemies, to succour whom the Corinthians manned out another Fleet, and landed an Army at Actium. They pitched also there their Tents against them, but Winter drawing on, they both departed without any Act of Hostility; the Corinthians all that Year, and the Year following, out of hatred to the other, using all their endeavours for rigging a new Fleet, and procuring plenty of Rowers out of Peloponnesus and other parts of Greece.

20. The Coreyans before this time not joyned in alliance with any other State, now began to look about them how they might strengthen themselves. They sent to Athens, desiring to enter into society with that State, and to have assistance from it; and the Corinthians having notice hereof, sent their Ambassadors to oppose them. The Coreyans were first heard, making a large discourse, and then the Corinthians larger than they. The matter was brought twice before the People, which at length resolved that a defensive League should be made with them of Coreya, that the one should assist the other in case they were assailed by an Enemy: but to make any Invasion Assistance was denied, lest they should break the Leagues formerly made with other States. The Athenians resolved on this course, for that they saw plainly they must have War with the Peloponnesians, and therefore desired to have the Coreyans who were very powerful at Sea, on their side; and they thought it would be for their interest to have the Corinthians and their Associates to spend their Stock upon those of Coreya, which Island they also looked upon as very commodious for passage either into Sicilie or Italy. Ten Triremes therefore were decreed to assist the Coreyans, in case they were in any danger, and three Captains sent, one of which was Lacedæmonius the Son of Cimon, whom Pericles envying for his Fathers sake, procured that no more Assistance should be sent, that so the business might miscarry under him; but afterwards out of plain Shame he sent another Squadron of Ships which came too late. These Generals had in charge by all means to decline the Fight with the Corinthians, except they set upon the Coreyans, whom then they were to protect to the utmost.

21. This Squadron of ten Ships joyning with the Coreyans, made up their Fleet one hundred and twenty Sail, with which they gave Battel to the Corinthians (who had ninety of their own, and sixty from their Allies) betwixt the Island Coreya and the continent of Epirus. This Fight (described most accurately by Thucydides) was the most valiantly fought, and with the greatest number of Ships, of any that those times had happened betwixt the Græcians themselves. The Athenians being mindful of the Charge received from their Superiors, at the first rather thought to deter, than to fight with the Enemy, succouring the Coreyans in some places; but they being fully worsted and put to flight in that Wing wherein they stood, they then with all their might fell upon the Corinthians, and spoiled their Victory in that part, and rendered it Ambiguous as to both sides. On the same day both parties rallied for a fresh Engagement, and they were founding to the Charge, when unexpectedly the Corinthians espied twenty Athenian Ships, which Pericles had now sent to assist with the other ten, at which fight being utterly discouraged (as fearing more might follow them) they fell off again, to the admiration of the Coreyans, who knew nothing of the coming of these Ships. Great Slaughter was made on both sides; the Corinthians lost thirty Ships, and Coreyans seventy; besides one thousand of their men taken Prisoners, whom as the Coreyans carried homewards, they took Ancorium (a Town situate upon the Bay of Ambracia) in their way, and therein left some Planters of their own. This Battel was fought in the twenty ninth year of Ariaxerxes Longimanus, the tenth of the eighty sixth Olympiad, and five years almost before the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, Lysimachus being Archon at Athens.

Others followed, which not only injured them, but the other Peloponnesians against the Athenians. Potidea, a Town situate in the Strophus of Pallene ( formerly called Plegra, and afterwards Cassandra from Cassander King of Macedonia ) was a Colony of the Corinthians, but associated with the Athenians. The Inhabitants thereof were now commanded by the later to demolish that part of their Wall, which was next Pallene, to give Hostages, and to cast out the Magistrate which every Year the Corinthians used to send them, and receive no more from them afterwards. This the Athenians did, for that they perceived the Corinthians to be much exasperated against them, and feared that joining with Perdiccas King of Macedonia, with whom they were at odds, and upon whose Kingdom Potidea bordered, they would sollicite the place to revolt, and by its example would entice the rest of the Towns thereabout from their alliance. But Perdiccas being first aware hereof ( against whom the Athenians had Armed his Brother Philip and Derdas ) in great wrath sent to Lacedæmon to stir them up with the other Peloponnesian States to make War upon them, and invited the Potideaans to revolt, with other Towns in Thrace.

23. The Athenians being not ignorant of all this, to prevent the revolt of the Towns, first order to the Captains of the thirty Gallies lately sent into those parts, first to see the execution of their Commands laid upon Potidea, and take all possible care that the other places should not give ear to any sinister advice. They of Potidea sent to Athens, desiring earnestly that nothing of extremity might be put upon them ; but yet they dispatched also Ambassadors ( together with some from the Corinthians their Founders ) to Sparta, to desire aid thence, that they might provide for the worst. Having no good Answer from Athens, but affrighted with the coming of the Fleet ; and on the other hand being promised by the Lacedæmonians, that in case the Athenians fell upon them, they would straight invade Attica, they took the advice of Perdiccas, and revolted with the Chalcidians and Bottians. The Athenian Fleet having notice hereof departed from Thrace, where they had arrived, and sailing to Macedonia, joyned their Power with Philip and Derdas against Perdiccas. The Corinthians to help their Friends at Potidea, sent one thousand and six hundred men, partly of their own, and partly hired out of Peloponnesus, of heavy Armour ; and four hundred besides light armed, who forty days after the revolt of the Town came into Thrace, under conduct of Arifteus, the Son of Alimantus.

24. The Athenians hearing of this aid, to give greater strength to their Affairs in Thrace, sent to their former Forces two thousand armed men, with a Fleet of fourty Gallies, under the command of Callias, the Son of Calliades, with whom were joyned in Commission four others. Being arrived in Macedonia, they found their Friends who had joyned with Philip to have taken Thermus, and now intent upon the Siege of Pydna, and joyned themselves to them ; but seeing how their Affairs would be endangered by the Conjunction of Perdiccas with the Corinthian Forces and Potidea, they made up a Peace with the King, and attempting Berthea in their way, made haft towards Potidea, and pitched their Tents at Gigonum, whither another Athenian Fleet of seventy Gallies also came. Perdiccas the Macedonian King again revolted to the Potideaans, and joyned himself with the Corinthian Army, betwixt which, and that of the Athenians ensued a Fight, wherein the Athenians were worsted in that Wing wherewith they fought with the Corinthians ; but got the better against Perdiccas, which Arifteus the Corinthian General seeing, after he returned from the pursuit, broke through, and fled into Potidea. Of the Athenians were slain one hundred and fifty, amongst whom Callias the General, but of the contrary part few less than three hundred. The Athenians after this Victory drew a Line against the Town, and a supply of one thousand and six hundred fresh men being sent from Athens under the Command of Phormio, closely besieged it both by Sea and Land. These were the mutual causes of the Heart-burnings of the Corinthians and Peloponnesians against the Athenians, and of the Athenians against them about Corcyra, and Potidea, both of their Colonies of the Corinthians, of which the Athenians defended the former against its founders, whilst they endeavoured to chastise it, and they again inticed the later, with other Towns which were Tributaries to Athens, to renounce their allegiance to that State.

25. Potidea being thus blocked up, the Corinthians were highly concerned, both for the Town it self, and such of their own Citizens as were therein ; and resolving that it was no time now to be idle, sent to their associates of Peloponnesus to meet them at Lacedæmon, where they grievously inveighed against the Athenians. Liberty being given to every man to speak, several others also sharply accused them, but especially the Deputies of Megara, for many injuries, and chiefly for that, contrary to the agreement made with them, they had interdicted them the Ports and Market of Athens. The Corinthians cunningly suffered the rest to speak first, that by them the Lacedæmonians might be incited against the Athenians, but then, after all, more fully and earnestly laid open their Faults, aggravated the injuries received from them, pressed the great danger which threatened Peloponnesus from their Power, checked the Lacedæmonians for their too much remissness in vindicating the cause of their distressed Friends and Allies, and plainly declared, that if now they would not do it, they must strengthen themselves with other Confederates.

26. It hapned at this time that there were at Lacedæmon some Ambassadors sent from Athens upon other business, who understanding how things went, desired also to be heard, and this being obtained, fought to allay the Stomach of the Peloponnesians by calm and prudent Reasons. They desired not to be understood, as though they came to plead the cause of their State which they neither could acknowledge as guilty, nor own them as their Judges : but desired, and advised them not rashly to resolve upon any violent Course, nor give credit to all that was objected, until such time as they could thoroughly understand the case ; for that things being once confounded could not easily again be composed. They mentioned the Commodities of Peace, and the Evils that come by War ; charged these Calumnies upon the Envy of their Accusers, who could not behold the Power of Athens without prejudice, though it was obtained no otherwise than as the Reward of Virtue, as the Associates themselves could not but witness, who knew well enough how the Athenians merited at Marathon of all Greece, as afterwards at Salamine ; and they averred, that they had used their Power so moderately, as none had any reason to complain. That they had increased their Strength they denied not, which to endeavour was agreeable to the Law of Nature, as also that the weaker should obey the more potent ; so that it was without injury, though not without Force, which was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of any Command, and was practised not only by themselves, but the Lacedæmonians also, and would ever so be in the like Cases. Again, they laid before them the uncertainty of the event of War, and concluded with a religious protestation, concerning their innocence, and desire of Peace.

27. The Lacedæmonians having heard both Parties, debated the business amongst themselves. They were generally inclined to make War presently upon the Athenians as the Authors of many Injuries, which Archidamus, one of their Kings, and a very prudent, and moderate man observing, by a grave Speech deformed them, not from undertaking a War for the safety of their Allies, but rushing into it ; for that the strength of Athens, and of their own State ( as he said ) being compared, there was need of a sufficient time to make Provision for it, in which not only the assistance of the Græcians, but of the Barbarians also was requisite. He shewed that the Athenians could not be subdued by the wasting of Attica, having also Provisions in a readiness, and that it was no policy for them being unprovided to deal with such an Enemy : but that rather the thing was to be deferred till things could be in a readiness, in which time the Athenians might perhaps be in a better mind, and give satisfaction without constraint ; and this could not turn to the disgrace of the Lacedæmonians, in that they followed the Example of their Ancestors : Lastly, that by how much they took Arms with more advice, they should by so much conclude with more happiness and celerity. But Sthenelaidus one of the Ephori, and who spake last, dissenting from the Judgment of Archidamus, very sharply perswaded the People to take up Arms against the Athenians, as violators of the former Leagues, and War was decreed accordingly, not so much at the instance of their Confederates, as out of fear of the growing Power of Athens. This was done in the fourteenth Year after the ending of the Eubæan War, and the Truce made for thirty years.

28. The Lacedæmonians acquainted the Deputies with what was resolved ; but whilst told them they would signify it to all their Associates, that if so be the War should be decreed by the common consent; it might be carried on with their joyn't Force: then departed they to their several homes to know the minds of their superiours, and the Athenian Ambassadors returned. After their departure, the Lacedæmonians, before the matter should any further proceed, sent to Delphos to enquire of the Oracle concerning the event of the War, whence receiving such answer as they wished, they again sent for their Allies, and propounded the business to them, who unanimously decreed it, and it was exceedingly pressed by the Corinthians, who, before this meeting, for fear of the loss of Potidea had sent about it. It being not expedient to begin the War unprovided, all were desired to repair home, and make all Provisions possible (in which was almost spent a Year) and in the mean time Ambassadors were sent to Athens to make demands, of which, if any were denied, a more specious pretence might be obtained for the War.

They sent fir-
ges to Athens.

29. In the first Embassy they demanded the expiation of a piacular Offence, in which Pericles was involved by his Mothers Kindred. For, knowing him to be a man of great Counsel and Courage, by all means they endeavoured upon this account to have him banished; but the other objected to the Lacedæmonians, that they had drawn out of the Temple of Neptune some of their Helots, and slain them, and starved Pausanias to death in that of Pallas Chalcidæa, where he took Sanctuary. After this the Spartans sent to require them to abstain from Potidea, to set at liberty Ægina, and especially they pressed them to let the Inhabitants of Megara have the liberty of their Port and Market, without which they must expect nothing but War: but to none of these Demands was there given a satisfying Answer, the Megarians being accused for appropriating to their own use the Ground which belonged to the Goddess of Eleusine; and receiving such fugitive Slaves as fled from Athens. In the third Message Ramphius and his Collegues added but this to the other demands, that the Lacedæmonians were desirous of Peace, and would give it, in case the Athenians would suffer all the Græcians to be free, and live according to their own Laws. These things thus often the Spartans demanded, to amuse the other party till they themselves could be provided, and to catch at a specious pretence for a quarrel.

30. The Athenians upon the last Message called the Assembly of the People to deliberate about the matter, that they might send a clear and positive Answer, once for all. Many speaking pro and con, at length Pericles the most excellent of all the Athenians of that Age, both for doing and speaking, with his Eloquence (wherewith he was said by the Poets to Thunder and Lightning) easily drew the Multitude to his Mind. After he had inveighed against the Lacedæmonians as swollen with Envy, he excused themselves, and encouraged the People by agreements drawn from their Ability to undertake the War. He advised that this Answer should be returned: That the Decree against them of Megara should be rescinded, in case the Lacedæmonians would give such freedom of their City to the Athenians and other of the Associates: that they would set all Cities under their Jurisdiction at liberty, which were free before, when the League should be entered into: provided the Spartans would do the same, and suffer such as were under them to live according to their own Customs; and not to be tyed to those of Læonia; and lastly, that they were content to be judged concerning these things in controversy, according to the Leagues; neither would they first make War, but effectually defend themselves. He added, that this was both just and honourable, and if they undertook the War cheerfully, they should find their Enemies less considerable: that out of the greatest Extremities the greatest Honour was wont to accrue both to their State in general, and to each Citizen in particular, which he made good by instancing in the Median War, at which time the City was far less considerable than at present, and whence it arrived to this pitch of greatness: He told them it was fit they should imitate their Ancestors, and leave not the Empire received from them diminished unto posterity.

The Athenians
by the advice of Pericles, gave a positive answer once for all by way
of denial.

31. Why Pericles should be so earnest for the War, (4) several reasons have been alleged; and this (4) amongst the rest, that he was not able to make account for the publick Money he had received to build a Portal in the Castle to the Honour of Minerva. He consumed abundance of Treasure in this Work; and none looking after him, diverted the publick Money taken up under that pretence to other uses. Whilst he considered hereof, and sat forrowful at home, Atchibiades a Boy and his Sisters Son (whom after his Brother in Laws death

What ever his Motives were, the People (c) decreed what he proposed, and answered the Lacedæmonians particularly according to what he said; and in general, that they would do nothing they had enjoyed them, but were ready to acquit themselves of these matters laid against them, before equal and indifferent Judges; and with this answer the Ambassadors returned to Lacedæmon, whence no more came. There were the Quarrels which fore-ran the War, being begun about the Affairs of Epidamnus and Coryra. Notwithstanding this disagreement, yet they continued commerce with each other, went to and fro without any publick Officer, or Herald; but yet not without jealousy one of another. For these things that happened made confusion in the Leagues, and mingled matter for War.

S E C T. III.

Containing the space of twenty seven Years.

I N the fifteenth Year after the recovery of Eubœa by the Athenians, and the Truce concluded for thirty years; the sixth month after the Battle fought at Potidea; in the fourth eighth Year of the Priesthood of Chrysis the Priest of Argos; Ænclaus being the principal Ephorus at Sparta, Pythodorus Archon at Athens; in the first Year of the eighty seventh Olympiad, the thirty third of the Reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, of the World the 3574, began the Peloponnesian War, henceforth there being no Commerce with one another without an Officer at Arms, and Hostility exercised without intermission.

The Peloponnesian War began with the surprising of Plataea by the Thebans, which the Athenians presently recovered.

2. In the second Month of Pythodorus his Government, and the beginning of the Spring, three hundred Thebans seized upon Plataea, by the Treachery of some in the Town, it being associate to the Athenians; for they perceiving a War to be drawing on, and knowing that Town to be always in Peace adverse to them, thought good to make sure of it betimes. The Inhabitants thinking more to have got in, than indeed did, at the first yielded it, but then again apprehending the Truth, resolved to rescue their Liberty, and set by Night upon the Thebans; whom they knew to be weary, ignorant of the Town, and would be much troubled with the Dirt, by reason of abundance of Rain which fell that Night. The Device prospered, and they slew almost half the number, taking the rest Prisoners, which were one hundred and eighty, and amongst them Eurymachus the Author of this Expedition. It hapned that from Thebes another Party came too late to the help of their Fellows if need should be, who seeing what was done, considered whether they should not set upon such Plataeans as were abroad in the Country, and waste it round about, thereby to redeem their Friends. The Plataeans (as the Thebans said) sent to them, being afraid of this, and offered them to release the Prisoners if they would forbear to spoil their Grounds, but in case they did, threatened to put them to Death; whereupon the Thebans withdrew, and yet for all this the Plataeans put their Friends to death. The Plataeans on the other hand alleged, that they never made any Promise to dismiss them; but in case they should agree in Treaty. But they sent to Athens to give them notice there of this Attempt made upon their Town.

3. The Message being carried before the Thebans were put to death, the Athenians sent word to Plataea, that they would do nothing against them till they heard further from them; after they had first seized upon such Boeotians as were in their Dominions. Then after the truth was known, they sent an Army which victualled the place, and taking out the useless multitude of both Sexes, put a Garrison therein. Thus the League being plainly broken on both sides, both parties prepared themselves for the War, both sent away Ambassadors to the Persians, and other Barbarians, and set themselves to obtain new Alliances. Now were old Prophecies and Sayings in all mens Mouths, which they interpreted according to their affection. Most were inclined towards the Lacedæmonians, who professed themselves the vindicators of the Liberty of Greece, and hating the Athenians, either for that they desired to shake off their Yoke, or feared to undergo it. On the Lacedæmonian side were the Peloponnesians except the Argives and Achaïans, who were Friends to both, all but the Inhabitants of Pellene amongst the latter, who at the beginning sided with the Lacedæmonians.

The Lacedæmonians and Athenians heads of the two Parties.

demonians, and afterwards the rest also joyned themselves to them. Without Peloponnesus, the Megarians, Phocians, Locrians, Boeotians, Ambraciots, Lencadians, Anactorians. The Corinthians, Megarians, Sicyonians, Pellenians, Eleans, Ambraciots, and Lencadians, furnished them with ships; the Boeotians, Phocians, and Locrians, sent out Horse-men, and the rest of the States supplied them with Foot.

4. With the Athenians stood the Chians, Lesbians, Plataeans, Messenians inhabiting Nanpatus, most of the Acarnanians, the Corecyreans, Zacynthians, and the rest of the tributary Cities all over, the Carians inhabiting the Sea-coasts, the Dorians their neighbours, Jonians upon the Hellspont, several Towns of Thrace, and other places not few, the Islands lying betwixt Peloponnesus and Crete towards the Sun-rising, and all the Cyclades except Melus and Thera. The Chians, Lesbians, and Corecyreans, afforded shipping, the rest, men and money, as Thucydides writeth, who in this Catalogue passeth by Eubœa and Samns, though they abounded with shipping, and sided with the Athenians. Presently after the action about Plataea, the Lacedæmonians sent abroad to their associates to meet at the Isthmus, which they did accordingly, two third parts of each of the Cities. Here Archidamus the Spartan King and Captain General, having first gravely advised them not to trust too much to their own strength, though they made up such an Army as the eldest of them had never seen, sent to Athens to see if that City would now remit any of it's former rigor; but the Messenger being sent back without hearing, he marched for Attica, the Boeotians at the same time having invaded the Territories of the Plataeans.

5. Ere Archidamus invaded Attica, Pericles his friend, who by the Athenians with nine others was appointed General, foreseeing that if he should spare his Villages, either upon the account of their particular friendship, or by order from the Spartan State, to render him suspected, it would create him abundance of envy and ill will, to avoid all suspicion, called the People together, and gave the said Villages to the Commonwealth, and advised them to gather all their things out of the Villages, and contain themselves within the City, to take care of their shipping, and not to neglect their confederates, from whom they might be supplied with money, which together with good counsel and advice is the fineness of War. He told them that they had six hundred Talents of Tribute yearly coming in, besides other revenues; that they had in the Castle left six thousand Talents of Silver ready coined, besides in bullion and plate five hundred Talents more, and money in the Temples, besides forty pound of pure Gold about the statue of Pallas, which it was lawful to use in extremity, making it up again afterwards. They had ready nineteen thousand Foot-men, and twelve hundred Horse, besides others that used bows on Horse-back, and six thousand Archers on foot: of Gallies fit for sail three hundred, and he added other things to make them courageously begin the War. They obeyed him in fetching their goods into the City, and shutting up themselves there, though much to their prejudice and trouble; but such authority had he with the people, having first, to ingratiate himself, enlarged the authority and liberty of the multitude, whereby afterwards in effect he ruled alone. They set themselves also with all their might to the rigging of their Fleet, and gathering together the forces of their Confederates.

6. The Peloponnesian Army entred Attica by Oenoe a Castle of the Athenians, upon the frontiers of Boeotia, and there Archidamus staid, providing all things for the storm. Being somewhat long in his preparations, his adversaries thence found matter wherewith to accuse him, as one who affected the Athenians, and one purpose before at the Isthmus, and now also protracted the time till they should have removed all their goods out of Attica. He indeed thought they might be inclined to a compoture for the saving of their goods, and therefore did delay his march, but finding no message sent, and not being able to take the Castle, he removed about eighty days after the Thebans entred Plataea, in the height of Summer, Corn being now ripe, and invaded Attica, which he wasted as far as Acharne, the strongest Garrison of all the Country, and but seven or eight miles distant from Athens. When they in the City understood this, having not suspected he would have peirced so far, and afflicted for the loss they sustained, they began to be much moved, (especially they of Acharne, who seemed to themselves a considerable part in the State) and tumultuously gathering together, now began to rail at Pericles, that he being General did not lead them out against the Enemy. He would not call the assembly nor any Conpany together, for fear they should resolve rashly upon any thing; but was very careful of the defence of the Citie, and sent out a party of horse, of which some were Thessalian Auxiliaries, to restrain the excursions of the Enemy into the parts adjacent, which was beaten back with some loss. At length the Peloponnesians seeing the Athenians would not come out to fight, removed from Acharnae, and waiting other places, departed through Boeotia into Peloponnesus, and went severally to their own homes.

7. Whilest they were yet in Attica, the Athenians, to divert them, sent out a Fleet of one hundred Gallies, on which were aboard one thousand Souldiers of heavy Armour, and four hundred Archers, with which the Corycraean joined fifty Vessels more, and other associates contributed their numbers. Coasting the Peloponnesian shoar, besides other harm done, they landed in Laconia, and had taken Metheon, then unwall'd, and meanly manned, but that Brasidas the Spartan with one hundred men brake through, and getting into the Town, defended it so, as they were glad to retreat to their ships. Then went they to Elis, where they seized on Phia, and staying there two dayes, harra'd the Countrey, and overthrew such as were sent to restrain them: but their ships being forely tossed with a Tempest, and hardly recovering the Haven of Phia, and understanding also that greater forces were coming against them, they departed thence, and grievously distressed such places as they came to. At the same time also another Fleet was sent from Athens to infect the Locrians, and defend Enbea, which did much harm upon the Coasts of Locris, took Thronium, took Hostages with them, and overthrew the Locrians that came out to resist them. In the same Summer the Athenians cast out the Inhabitants of Ægina, for that they imputed to them the especial cause of the War, and judged that Island convenient for them to place a Colony therein of their own. The Lacedemonians out of requital for the kindness received from them during the Earth-quake, and War with their slaves, and out of hatred to the Athenians, gave them Thyrea and its Territories to inhabit (which separate Laconia from the Countrey of Aigæos, reaching as far as the Sea,) but such of them as this place for its straightness could not receive, were dispersed up and down Greece itself.

8. This same Summer, at the change of the Moon, hapned such an Eclipse of the Sun (at which time saith Thucydides, it is judged that it can only happen) that at Mid-day the Stars were seen, which according to the Fulian account hapned on the third day of August, as the astronomical Tables demonstrate. About the same time the Athenian Fleet of one hundred Gallies having in Acharnaia taken several Towns, came to Cephalonia, an Island lying over against Acharnaia and Leucas, which being inhabited in four Towns, they reduced without one stroke, and so returned home. In the beginning of Autumn, the Athenians with a vast Army invaded Megaris, which waisting in an Hostile manner they returned, and so they did once a year, till they got Nisæa into their hands. At this time also they placed a Garrison in Atalante, an Island belonging to the Locrians of Opus, which hitherto no body had peopled, lest it should prove an Harbour for Robbers that from Locris might prey upon Enbea. In Winter, according to their custom, they solemnized the Funeral for those that first died in the War on this manner. First, their bones for three dayes were laid out to be seen in a Tent, where it was lawful for their friends to come, and do such duties as was usual to the dead. Then when they were carried out, each Tribe came, and putting the bones of their fellows into Cypresse Coffins, carried them away on Chariots, and one Chieft was carried empty for such as had not been found; the women of their kindred making lamentation as for them. Then were they buried in a publick Sepulchre, in the most famous Suburb of the Citie, called Cerameicus, where all slain in War were constantly buried, except they that fell at Marathon, who for their greater honour were buried in the place of the fight. After they were buried, some one Eminent for prudence and eloquence made a Funeral Oration in commendations of them, which at this time was most excellently performed by Pericles. The scope of his speech was to shew they deserved immortal glory for shedding their blood in their Countreys behalf, and to excite the living to seek after such renown. With this Winter ended the first year of the Peloponnesian War, whose History for its influence into the whole is the more considerable.

9. In the Spring the Peloponnesians again under conduct of Archidamus their former General invaded Attica, at which time fell also upon it, a most fearful plague, as it is described by Thucydides, who was sick of it, as seldom hapned; during the rage of which they plundered and wasted the Countrey all over.

Attica the second time in winter, when it was seized with a fearful plague.

returning to his former Countel, hindered the Citizens who were very desirous to issue out and fight, and provided an hundred ships, with which and fifty of the associates of Chius and Lesbus, armed with four thousand foot and three hundred horse, he departed to Peloponnesus, the Coasts of which he fore waisted, and forced the Army to return home to defend it, which they were willing to do all because of the plague, after they had been in Attica fourty dayes. After the return of Pericles, his Army was sent under the Command of Agnon and Cleompus, against Chalcis and Podidas, at the later of which it was seized by the pestilence and greatly diminished, and Agnon with one thousand and five hundred, which remained of four thousand, returned home. But the people being fore afflicted by the plague and War together, were angry now against Pericles, as him that moved them to take up Arms, who calling them together sharply reproved them; and they confessed what he said to be true, and that he had advised them upon good grounds, but being iraged at their private difcommodities, they fined him eighty Talents, and banished him the City, and yet presently after, according to the inconstant nature of the multitude, recalled, and created him General with full power.

10. In the same Summer a Navy from Peloponnesus of an hundred Gallies fell upon Zazynthus, an Island addicted to the Athenians, which waisting, and being not able to do any more, they returned home. The Peloponnesians also in the end of Summer sent Ambassadors to the Persian King to desire aid, who were also commanded to go to Sitalces King of Thrace, to desire a League of confederacy with him; but they were taken near the Hellefpont by some Athenians, through the assistance of Sadocus the Kings son, and free of Athens, and being brought thither, in revenge for some Athenians, Merchants, and others, slain in Peloponnesus, they were put to death. In Winter twenty Gallies were sent from Athens to Naupactus to secure the Straights lying betwixt Peloponnesus and Ætolia, and other six to Caria and Lycia, to gather money, under Command of Meleander, who in a fight was there slain with part of his forces. Podidas now also being in despair of any supply from Peloponnesus, and fore afflicted with famine (which raged so far as they ate man's flesh) yielded to the Athenians. Of the besieged such as were Males had liberty to depart with one Garment apiece, Females with two, and a little provision. The City being thus emptied was replenished with a Colony from Athens, to which state this siege stood in two thousand Talents. And so the second year of the War ended with this Winter.

11. In the next Spring Archidamus the Lacedemonian King marched against Plataea, and besieged it. The Plataeans sent him to desire he would forbear to use any extremity against them; but he returned them very harsh conditions, requiring them to forsake the Athenians, to give up their City, and all they had, for the time of War, and in the mean time to go and dwell somewhere else, promising that as soon as the War should be over, they should have all entirely restored to them. They desired a Truce, till such time as they could send to the Athenians, their associates, and know their mind, who being utterly against it, they then sent Archidamus word, that they were resolved to undergo whatsoever the chance of War should lay upon them, for that they neither could, nor would revolt from the Athenians. He then fell of waisting their grounds, and with all his might attempted the City, which was as valiantly and powerfully defended by the Inhabitants. No way taking, at length the Spartans attempted it by fire, which consumed most part of the Town, leaving but a few houses for the Plataeans to live in. Yet still the matter succeeded not, and at length despairing to take the place by force, they raised a Wall round about it, which they fenced with a double Ditch to shut them in, and leaving sufficient Guards, departed home. Before this the Town-men had sent out to Athens all their useless Company. This same year the Athenians fought with various success in Thrace and Acharnaia.

12. In the latter end of this Summer, and the sixtieth Month of the year died Pericles, of the Epidemical Disease, or the Plague, as Plutarch reporteth, though not by its sudden force as others, but in a way of Consumption, which, if so, was extraordinary. As he drew towards his end, some of the principal men of Athens that were left alive of his ancient friends, as they sat by him, not thinking that he understood any thing, discouraged much of his great and many victories and Trophies which he had erected, placing therein the main of his commendation. He understanding the discourse, interrupted them, saying, that he wondered they should especially take notice of those things, which fortune made common to him with others, and make no mention of that which was most worthy and remarkable, for No man, saith he, upon mine account hath put on a black Garment. A man he was to be had in constant admiration, not only for his equity and mildness, which he shewed in so many businesses of concernment, and such enemies as were exercised against him; but also for his greatness of spirit, that this he especially charged upon himself, not to indulge his anger in so great power, or his malice; neither to be implacable towards his greatest adversary: and this seemeth to be the reason that he enjoyed the surname of Olympius without envy, because he was of so sweet a disposition, and in the greatest power preferred his life unblemished. The great misse the Athenians had of him made them soon perceive what man he was, whose power whilst alive they ill bore, as dazing their eyes; when dead, and they had experience of others, they confessed that no man could in that height of place have carried himself more moderately, or in that modesty more gravely, and that height of power which used to be branded with the name of Tyranny, appeared in him to have been the wholesome preservative of the Commonwealth; such depravedness of manners, and excess of wickedness falling upon all things after his death, which he weakening and keeping under as long as he lived, procured that it exceeded not the strength of the remedy.

Archidamus the third time invaded Attica.

The Athenians besiege Aegina.

13. The Summer following being the fourth year of the Peloponnesian War, Thucyd. lib. 2. 1. the Peloponnesians and their confederates made the third invasion of Attica, when Corn was now ripe, under the Conduct of the same Archidamus, which they waited up and down as long as their provisions lasted. In the mean time all the Island Lesbus (except Methymna) revolted from the Athenians, having had a great desire to do it before the War, but that the Lacedæmonians would not receive them. A Fleet of forty ships were then presently dispatched from Athens, and War was denounced to the Inhabitants of Mitylene, except they delivered up their ships, and pulled down the walls; which being denied, War was made upon them, their Gallies put to flight, and the Haven blocked up. Hereupon they desired a Treaty, and obtained truce to send an Ambassage to Athens about a Peace; but in the mean while they sent underhand Ambassadors to Lacedæmon, to desire a straight League and alliance, with present aid. The Ambassadors being ordered by the Spartans to stay at Olympia at the time of the solemnity of the eighty eighth Olympiad pleaded there their cause, and in the name of their City were received into the League, and assistance out of hand was promised to them. Another Expedition was then resolved on into Attica, but the Spartans being ready, at the Isthmus, whereas their associates loitered, and the Athenians then with a Fleet of thirty ships prey'd upon Peloponnesus, they being advertised of the loss they sustained in Laconia, returned hence.

14. Yet the Peloponnesians in performance of their promise made to the Mityleneans, dispatched away a Fleet of fourty Gallies, which found another from Athens to oppose it, consisting of one hundred; for the Athenians now abounded in shipping, having ready furnished two hundred and fifty Gallies, on which they expended much, so as to defray their expences, they now first of all were assailed, exacting yet from their confederates the usual Tributes, which they paid with much repining. At the same time the Mityleneans and the rest of the Lesbians, made War upon the Methymnians, who persisted in their obedience to the Athenians. These understanding of it, sent at the latter end of Summer a band of men into the Island, which drew a line round about Mitylene, upon which Guards being set, the Inhabitants were straitly besieged. In Winter the Inhabitants of Plataea being greatly distressed for want of victuals, and despairing of any aid from Athens, resolved to break through the Enemies Fortifications, though exceeding difficult to be passed, and save themselves by flight. Many for the difficulty of the thing changed their minds, but three hundred stood firm in their resolution, and taking advantage of an exceeding dark and tempestuous night, two hundred and twelve with remarkable courage and constancy brake through, and (the rest being repulsed into the City) came safe unto Athens. Towards the end of Winter Salathus was sent from Lacedæmon to Mitylene, to encourage the besieged to hold out, by promise of help; and another Expedition to be made by the confederates into Attica. And so the fourth year of the Peloponnesian War ended.

Attica invaded the fifth time, and the Mityleneans yield.

15. In the beginning of the fifth year, the Peloponnesians sent forty ships to Lesbus to the relief of the Mityleneans, under the conduct of Archidamus, and they themselves with an Army, over which Cleomenes (Uncle and Guardian to Pausanias) their young young King yet under age), was Captain, invaded Attica the fifth time; which they most grievously distressed; but hearing nothing from Lesbus that they liked, and being in scarcity of Victuals, they returned the sooner into Peloponnesus. The Mityleneans being sorely distressed in the same nature, whether the Magistrate would or not, yielded themselves to the mercy of the Athenians, which the Peloponnesian Fleet understanding before they arrived at Lesbus, went over to the Coast of Asia, and there having cast many things in their heads, without any thing of note performed, returned, through the perswasion of their General, into Peloponnesus, being from Lesbus in vain pursued by Paches the Athenian Captain. He returning from the pursuit, settled things in Lesbus according to his own mind, sent Salathus the Lacedæmonian Messenger (whom he took in the Town) with the authors of the revolt, and some of whom the Townsmen sent to intercede for them, unto Athens, staying there himself for further orders. Salathus was presently put to death, and the people being called together to consult about the Mityleneans, resolved, at the instigation of Cleon, a man of bitter severity, that all those of ripe age should be put to death, as well as they that were sent to Athens, and all the women and children should be made bondslaves; and this decree was without delay sent to Paches to be put into execution. But considering of this rash and cruel sentence, they repented of what they had done, and the next day met to advise further of it, when again Cleon a man in great grace with them, pressed vehemently the former decree. But Diodorus one of a milder spirit opposed him, and having endeavoured the day before to no purpose to do it, now by very few voices carried it from him.

A severe sentence against them.

Reversed.

16. Then was there dispatched a swift Gally, with order if possible to get before that which carried the former Decree, and command Paches to abstain from putting it in execution. Yet the former arrived at Mitylene first, having set forth a whole day before it; but whilst Paches was considering of the sharpness of the Decree, and how to perform it, the latter arrived, and so the lives of the multitude were saved, being so near to destruction; as scarcely any thing nearer. But to punish the revolt, above one thousand of those whom Paches had sent to Athens as authors of it, the People commanded to be put to death, Mitylene was deprived of it's walls and ships, all Lesbus except the Methymnians had hard conditions imposed upon them. The fields were taken from all the owners, of which the tenth part being dedicated to the gods, the remainder was distributed to the Citizens of Athens, the tillage thereof being left under a vast rent to the Lesbians; and all such Towns as were now subject to the Mityleneans, the Athenians reduced under their Dominions. The same Summer they seized upon Minoa, an Island lying before the shore of Megaris, and the Port of Nise, and fortifying it, made the Coasts more safe and convenient to all intents. In the mean time those that were left in Plataea were forced by meer famine to yield themselves and City to the judgment of the Lacedæmonians, who sent five men to hear their Orators, and the Thebans their Enemies. These men adjudged them all to death, which accordingly was executed upon them to the number of two hundred, with whom were slain twenty five Athenians found in the Town, and the women adjudged to slavery. The City for some time was given to some exiles to inhabit: then, scarce a year being past, was by the Thebans utterly destroyed, an Inn only being built out of the ruins of the Temple of Pano, and the Temple itself enlarged, all the grounds being seized on by the Thebans. This was the fortune of the Plataeans (who thought they might have had some favour shewed them for the merits of their Ancestors in the Median War) after they had continued ninety two years in fidelity with Athens; and no more is to be heard of them till Plataea was rebuilt by Alexander the Great.

Plataea at length yielded and destroyed.

A lamentable sedition at Coreyra.

17. During these things, a most lamentable sedition hapned at Coreyra, part of the Citizens being for Popular Government, and the rest for that of a few of the most potent; the former trusting to the aid of the Athenians, as conformable to their policy; and the other to the Peloponnesians. Twice within the City did they fight; and both the Athenians and Peloponnesians sent their Fleets to the assistance of their friends; but the Athenians being stronger at Sea; and sending fixty Gallies more to the help of the former Navy, the Peloponnesians withdrew themselves, having only lightly skirmished with the Enemy in the sight of Coreyra, before the latter Fleet arrived. Then those for the Popular Government, strengthened by the assistance of the Athenians, cruelly ragged against against their Adversaries, no mercy being shewn to such as took Sanctuary, or hung upon the Altars, neither from Parents to their own Children, inasmuch that the City was almost shaken to pieces and made desolate, and a grievous Sedition indeed came afterwards proverbially to be termed a Coreyran. And it was not only fatal to Coreyra, but to all Greece besides, being drawn into Example by other States which afterwards broke out into factions.

18. At the same time the Greek Cities in Sicily fell into Diffentions, some being of the Dorick, and others of the Ionick Faction, the Head of the former Syracuse, and of the latter Leontium, which two made War upon each other. The Leontines craved aid of the Athenians, for that they were not only of the Ionian Stock, but conjoined with them in an ancient League of confederacy. The Athenians willingly took the opportunity to get some footing in Sicily, to hinder the exportation of Corn thence into Peloponnesus, and especially to make way for their Power and Dominion there. At the end of Summer they sent thither twenty Gallies. In Winter these Ships assisted with ten more from Rhegium in Italy, invaded the Æolian Islands near to Sicily, and waited such as refused to yield. At the same Season the Plague began again at Athens, which took away a great number of Soldiers, but much greater of the common People: Earthquakes also hapned in several places. And with this Winter the fifth Year of the Peloponnesian War ended.

The sixth Summer of the War.

19. In the beginning of the next Summer, the Peloponnesians came the sixth time to the Isthmus, with intent to invade Attica, under the conduct of Agis the Spartan King, but being affrighted with the frequent Earthquakes, they returned. In the mean while the War in Sicily variously proceeded; Laches the Athenian Captain taking some Towns. The Athenians sent out one Fleet to infect Peloponnesus, and another the Island Melus, which stubbornly withstood their Commands, both which did nothing of very great concernment. The Spartans planted the Colony of Heraclæa, in the platform of old Trachinæa a City in Thessalie, being for the convenience of its situation upon the Sea, and the Haven, very fit for carrying on the War against the Athenians. These received a great loss from the Æolians, but in Winter thrice overthrew the Ambracians, who were forsaken by their Friends the Peloponnesians, which made them now embrace a Peace with their Adversaries the Acarnanians and Amphibolians (who called in the Athenians against them) and entered into a League and Society for ten Years with them. The War proceeding all this while in Sicily, a greater Fleet was sent under conduct of Eurymedon and Sophocles, to oppose the Syracusians, towards the end of Winter, at which time the Hill Ætna belched out great store of Fire into the Territories of Catanæ, fifty years after it had the last time so done. Thus the sixth Year of the Peloponnesian War ended.

20. In the beginning of the next, the Peloponnesians under the command of Archidamus the Spartan King, again invaded Attica. The Athenians having furnished forty Ships for Sicily, gave order to the Captains, in their way to have an eye to the Coreyrans, who were much infested by their own exiles, and were in fear of sixty Peloponnesian Gallies sent thither: and to Demosthenes was given the command of some Ships wherewith he should infect Peloponnesus. As all the Ships sailed by Laconia, Demosthenes a man of a prompt and earnest Disposition, advised the other Captains to fortify Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory joyned to the main by a little neck of Land. Before it lies a small barren Island of less than two Miles Compass, and within that a Creek which is a good Harbour for Ships, the force of Weather being born off by the Head-land and Ile. The Promontory which had antiently belonged to the Messenians, and was now desolate, he pressed fore that they might seize upon, and make their own, being very convenient for the wafting of Laconia; but the other Captains dissented from him, halting for Coreyra, when in the mean time such a Tempest arose as forced them to take into the Harbour. Then did he again urge his former advice, and though he nothing more profited with the Captains, yet the Soldiers desirous to make home stay there, and seeing the commodiousness of the Haven, fell upon fortifying the place, and with wonderful diligence and pains perfected the Wall in six days. Then was Demosthenes left there to keep it with five Ships, and the rest directed their course for Coreyra.

21. The news of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians in all haste thither out of Attica, fifteen days after their arrival, and they brought their whole Force both by Land and Sea to recover this piece of Ground, which they well foresaw how bad a Neighbour it might prove in time. In the Island named Sphaerteria, they placed and topped up the Haven on both sides, that there might be no entrance in for the Athenian Ships: then furiously did they assault Pylus both by Land and Sea, but it was valiantly defended by Demosthenes; So that with several new onsets the Storm was continued till the next day, and then the Peloponnesians drew off to recruit themselves, and provide for a new onset. In the mean time came in forty Athenian Ships (to which Demosthenes had before-hand sent to acquaint them with his condition) and with them some belonging to their Allies, which first offered fight to the Peloponnesians in the open Sea; but that being refused, set upon them in the Haven, brake, and sunk many of their Vessels, took some, and forced the rest to run themselves on Ground, about which afterwards ensued a great contention, whilst the Athenians would become Masters of them, and the Spartans out of Shame, and Grief for their Friends in the Island, laboured with more earnestness to get them off, which they effected by some, and the rest fell as Prize to the Enemy, who now closely besieged the Spartans that were left in the Island.

The Lacedæ-
monians desire a Truce.

22. Pylus being now secure, but the Spartans in the Island as good as lost, the Magistrates were sent for from Lacedæmon into the Camp (as the custom was in great Dangers) who perceiving that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens, than by composition with the Enemies, took Truce for a time with the Captains, till they might send to Athens about a Peace. The conditions of the Truce were, that the Peloponnesians should deliver up to the other all their Ships, as well such as were upon the Coast of Laconia as there, to be restored to them if the Peace should not succeed, and that they should attempt nothing upon the Fort, nor the Athenians against their Camp. That certain quantity of Victuals should be daily carried into the Island, but no Ships should pass into it secretly, that the Truce should end at the return of the Ambassadors, and if in the mean time it should be broken in any one point, it should be esteemed utterly void in all. The Ambassadors coming to Athens put the People in mind of that moderation all men ought to shew in Prosperity, and with what credit they might now, at their request, make a Peace. But Cleon a man very vehement, and much in request, withstood it, so that in stead of Peace on equal Terms, and recompence for harm received, the Athenians demanded certain Cities, which had been by the Spartans long before this War taken from them, and refused to continue the Treaty, except the Spartans in the Isle were delivered up to them as Prisoners. The Ambassadors returned without success, and the Truce being ended, both sides betook themselves to their Weapons again about Pylus.

And send to A-

23. The Peloponnesians demanding their sixty Ships which they had given up, and now at the end of the Truce were to be restored to them in as good a condition, were put off, under pretence that they had broken the Truce. The Island was also afresh besieged, and the Spartans valiantly standing out, things went on but slowly, so that Cleon himself, who much vaunted what he could do, was by the People, who now began to relent of their not embracing a Peace, forced, whether he would or not, to command a new supply of men thither. He and Demosthenes (whom he chose for his Colleague) first offered Conditions to the Spartans, and then upon their refusal forced them, after the loss of one hundred and twenty eight, to yield themselves to Mercy. The number of those that yielded were two hundred and ninety two (whereof one hundred and twenty of the Nobility of Sparta) which were carried to Athens, and being closely imprisoned, it was resolved, that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, they should all be slain; and then was a Garrison of Messenians (the old Inhabitants and bitter Enemies to the Spartans) sent into Pylus: The Lacedæmonians forely discouraged by these Events, and fearing worse things, sent to Athens again about the liberty of the Prisoners, and delivery of Pylus, but the Ambassadors were often rejected, and nothing done, the Athenians being still more puffed up by their good success. This Summer they overthrew the Corinthians in the Isthmus. A Fleet being also sent for Sicily, assisted the Coreyrans in their way against their Exiles (who having got footing in the Mountains, annoyed them) and by their help they now utterly subdued them, and using them with unwonted cruelty, the sedition here had an end. Anachorium a Town to Corinth, upon the Bay of Ambracia, they also took. In Winter Arctaphernes a Persian being sent from his Prince to Lacedæmon, was intercepted in Thrace, and brought to Athens, where his Letters being opened and read, they contained no secret, and he was sent back with Ambassadors to Ephesus to the King of Persia, Artaxerxes Longimanus, concerning whom they there had intelligence that he was deed, and so the Ambassadors returned home. The Inhabitants of Chius being suspected by the Athenians, were commanded to demolish their new Wall. With these things the seventh year of the War ended.

24. In the beginning of the eighth year hapned a partial Eclipse of the Sun, which the Astronomical Tables shew to have fallen out on the twenty first day of March after the Julian account, before noon, half of the Diameter or above being obscured, the fourth year of the eighty eight Olympiad now drawing to an end; and an Earth-quake hapned on the first of the Month Munichion, which some make to fall in with the same day. The Athenians this year fell upon the Island Cythera, lying near to Laconia, and inhabited by a Spartan Colony, which they took, and putting therein a Garrison for a time, thence made excursions into Laconia. Afterwards they removed thence a great part of the Colony, and took, and burnt Thyrea, standing upon the Confines of Laconia and Argolis, given by the Spartans to the Æginetans, whom now they carried away, and plundering the Town set it on fire. Conveying their prisoners to Athens, the Æginetans were condemned to death, and the Cythereans being dispersed throughout the Islands, such as they left in Cythera were subjected to a great Tribute. But in Sicily, at this time, an Universal peace was made, and embraced by all the Cities, through the earnest perswasion of Hermocrates a Syracusan; so that the Athenian Forces were forced to quit the Island, for which at their return two of the Generals were unjustly banished, and the third underwent a great fine.

25. The Exiles of Mitylene with others of Lesbus, and some Mercenaries, seizing upon Rhetium in Asia, took Antandrus; but selling the former again to the Inhabitants, they were drawn out of the later to fight, by Aristides, and Demodocus, (or Symmachus, as Diokorus calleth him) who overthrew them, and took the Town from them. These two were Captains of the Fleet, and collected Tribute from the Islands; their Colleague Lamachus being gone into Pontus against the Heracleans, who being in League with the Persian King denied to pay it. His ships, by the vehemency of water which ran down the River, were shattered, and he lost one way or other the greatest part both of them, and his Forces; so that he could not move thence, either by Sea, or Land; whereupon the Heracleans thinking it a more honourable part to do good than to take revenge, furnished him with provisions, and sent him away with a Convoy, concluding that the waisting of their grounds would be well recompensed if they should make friends of their Enemies. With this Convoy he passed through the Country of the Thracians in Asia, and so came to Chalcedon.

26. At this time the Inhabitants of Megara were much distressed, what by the several inroads of the Athenians, and their own Exiles whom they had cast out, who now preyed upon them from the Villages. Wearing with these continual disturbances, they thought of recalling the Exiles; but the Magistrates understanding that, and presently apprehending what danger might arise to themselves from those men of whose banishment they had been the cause, conspired with Hippocrates and Demophilus, the two Athenian Captains, to betray the Town to them. The Gates were opened, and the Athenians had been Masters of the place, but that some of the Conspirators changed their minds, and obstructed the business, which the other seeing seized upon part of the long Walls, and casting up a cross work against the Town, set themselves with all their might to compels about the Nisæa, or Port, hoping, if they could get it, the more easily to obtain the Town. And the Garrison in it being presently discouraged by the stopping of victuals, which they were wont daily to receive out of the Town, yielded, the Spartans to mercy, and the rest upon condition of liberty to Ranom themselves. Then the Athenians prepared for setting upon the Town: but were hindered by the coming of Brasidas the Spartan, who hovering about Corinth, upon notice how things passed here, hastened, thinking to prevent the taking of Nisæa, and after he had heard of its surrender, yet used all expedition, hoping to save the Town, and to recover it. But when he came the Megarians were divided in their affections, yet both parties feared to let him in, for that they thought it best to reserve themselves for that party that should have the better, and Govern themselves according to Emergencies, and therefore he was forced to depart at this time without having done one thing or other.

27. Not long after, the Boeotians came, and joyned themselves to Brasidas, and thereupon followed an Engagement with the Athenians, which ended with equal success to both sides. That party of the Town which favoured the

The Exiles re-admitted rage against their Adversaries, contrary to their Oath.

Several amongst the Boeotians attempting to bring in Democracy are disappointed.Brasidas the Spartan sent into Thrace to give credit to the Alibians.Thucydides the Historian, the Athenian General.

Exiles, being incouraged with the presence of their friends, sent for Brasidas, and other Peloponnesian Officers into the Town, to consult with them, who confirming them in their resolutions then departed home: The Athenians all so following, such as sided with them for fear betook themselves to flight. Then were the Exiles recalled, having first taken an Oath to forget all things past, and not consult their own passion, but the good of their Country; but having got the power into their hands, and having the Guards of the City at their disposal, they caused one hundred of those they suspected to be apprehended, and being condemned by a forced judgement of the people, they put them to death. Then taking all the Government to themselves, it continued in an Oligarchical way a long time.

28. At the same time, several amongst the Boeotians attempted to change the frame of their Government, being much desirous of Democracy as it was established at Athens; and to this purpose held correspondence with them there, plotting to betray several places into their hands; but the matter being discovered succeeded not, but only to the loss of the Athenians, who were overthrown in battle. In the mean while the Lacedæmonians being invited by Perdiccas King of Macedonia, and some of the Inhabitants of Chalcis (who promised them some pay for their men) resolved to send some Forces into Macedonia, and Thrace, to divert the power, and design of the Athenians, who now began to be ill thought of by many in those parts, and feared by reason of their growing strength. They made choice of Brasidas for their General, a man of approved valour, and remarkable integrity. They did a thing at this time, which is noted with cruelty and injustice. Being something down the wind in their Fortune, they suspected the power and number of their slaves the Hædres, left in this their weakness they should attempt something against them, and took occasion at this expedition, by offering all such of them liberty as would cheerfully embrace the service, to observe who amongst them were most active, and when they expected to be manumitted, instilled thereof they made away (though how is not known) about two thousand of them, and sent seven hundred away with Brasidas, together with one thousand Mercenaries hired out of Peloponnesus.

29. Brasidas after his arrival, by fair means reduced Acanthus and Seagirus (both Colonies of the Andrians) from the Athenians, and then in Winter set upon Amphipolis a famous Colony of theirs, situate upon the River Strymon, which almost compassing it gave an occasion to the latter name of it, being before called Nine-mys. In a dark night he seized on the bridge, and all but the City it self, and 'tis thought had taken it also had he led his Souldiers on, but such as had conspired with him to betray it being overmarched, and firing not, he onely wasted the grounds about it, and attempted nothing further for the present. The Inhabitants who assisted the Athenians, being more in number, sent to Thucydides the son of Oronoe, and the Writer of the History of the Peloponnesian War, then the Athenian General, lying in Thasus, an Island inhabited by a Colony of the Parians, half a days sail distant from Amphipolis, who with seven ships hastened thither to prevent the delivery of it, or however to save Eione. But Brasidas being aware hereof, to obtain Amphipolis before his coming offered them most large conditions; that all should there remain, and live in the same State as formerly, as well Athenians as others; or if they liked better to remove, it should be free for them so to do, which they accepted of, hearing nothing from Thucydides, who yet came to Eione that very night, and saved it, whereas Brasidas else had taken it the next morning. Yet he took three other Towns near to Amphipolis, and left them to be Garrisoned by Perdiccas.

30. The Athenians were much moved for the loss of Amphipolis, which had been of great use to them in affording them Wood for shipping, as well as money, and besides this, how a free passage seemed to be open to the Lacedæmonians to invade their confederates, who thereupon might be induced to revolt by Brasidas, who being a very moderate, and just man of himself, gave out, that his design was to set Greece at liberty. And even so it fell out, for the Cities hearing what had hapned, and great commendations of Brasidas, sent to him to hasten his march towards them with promise to revolt, thinking they might safely enough do, for that they fully perswaded themselves, that the power of the Athenians was not so great as they found it afterwards, when it was too late to repent them of their rash and inconsiderate resolution, into which they were hurried by an earnest desire of liberty. The Athenians having intelligence of this, used all diligence to send Soldiers into all of them, as the shortness of the time, and the Winter season would bear. Brasidas sent to Lacedæmon for a new supply of men, but little heed was given to his message, partly because the great ones there envied his glory, and especially because the people being well wearied now with the War, desired to have their men that were taken in the Island, and to make peace. Yet he having made provision for the building of ships upon the River Strymon, went on with the War, drew all the Towns upon the Mountain Abos, except two, to submit, and then by surprise taking Torone, a Town of Chalcidæ, and tributary to the Athenians, he stormed the Castle the third day after. The remainder of the Winter he spent in fortifying the places taken already, and providing for taking of others which he designed. And thus the eighth year of the War ended.

31. In the beginning of Spring the Lacedæmonians for the reasons above-mentioned were desirous to come to a composition, and they hoped that now the Athenians, something discouraged by what Brasidas had done in Thrace, might not be averse to it. And indeed they were inclining to a cessation of Arms, that they might stop his proceedings till such time as they could recruit themselves, intending to be governed in reference to the length of the Truce as their affairs should comport, and so a Truce was concluded for a year, the Articles of which imported these things especially. That what both sides possessed at this time they should enjoy; that free access and regrefs should be given to Ambassadors and Herald, and their Confederates, to treat about a peace: that Ambassadors should not be received; that all controversies should be decided by Law, and not by force: and something was added concerning the use of the Sea; In this Truce the Confederates on both sides being comprised. During this Cessation several Treaties were held about a League, but something hapned which disturbed forely the minds of the Athenians. For Scione a Town of the Peninsula of Pellene of its own accord revolted to Brasidas, and was followed by Menda. Brasidas ignorant of the Truce, after the revolt of the former, laboured for with the latter, and Potidea, to reduce them also; but then news came to him of the Cessation, and much contention there was about the places; for that the Athenians said that Scione revolted two dayes after the Truce was sworn to, and concluded. Being not able to recover them by words, they sent an Army to effect it by deeds, and Menda they recovered, whilst Brasidas was absent, assisting Perdiccas the King of Macedonia in his War with Archibans, where such dissatisfaction passed betwixt the King and him, that thenceforth Perdiccas began to joyn himself to the Athenians. Scione was encompassed about with a Wall, which being finished in the later end of Summer, and a sufficient Guard being left, the rest of the Army was brought home. The Winter following all was quiet betwixt the two States by virtue of the Truce; but the Mantineans and Tegeans fought a battel with equal success, both parties erecting their trophies. The Spring drawing on, Brasidas attempted by night to surprise Potidea, but missed of his purpose. And with this Winter the ninth year of the War ended, in which the Temple of Juno at Argos was burnt through the negligence of Chrysis the Woman-Priest, who flying for it, another was placed in her room, after she had during this War continued eight years and an half therein.

32. The Truce being expired on the day of the Pythian Games, the seventh of the month Thargelion, Cleon having himself persuaded the Athenians to undertake the Expedition was sent into Thrace with a Fleet of thirty ships, aboard of which were one thousand and two hundred Foot, and three hundred Horse, besides Confederates. Hearing that Torone was but manned with a mean Garrison, he departed from the siege of Scione, and set upon it with such earnestness, both by Land and Sea, that in the same day he took it, and though he attempted Stragirus in vain, yet he effectually did it upon Galoplus, a Colony of the Thracians, after which he staid at Eione expecting some Auxiliaries out of Macedonia, and Thrace. Here he grew very secure, being exceedingly puffed up with his late success and that at Pylus, which he arrogantly imputed to his own wisdom; but his men disdained to lye idle, and pretended to be wearie of his Government, as thinking him unfit to command. Herewith he moved from Eione in a secure posture, thinking of nothing less than fighting, which was taken notice of by Brasidas, who having fewer men than he, and less experienced, thought it not wisdom to try a battel with him, nor at once to let him fight with all his Forces; but pouring them violently upon him by degrees, thereby to confound and overthrow his Army. He had a discovery of Brasidas his intents, and began to retreat, but then he fell upon him out of Amphipolis in the manner aforesaid, and without much ado put his men to the rout. Cleon himself flying was slain outright, and Brasidas before this was mortally wounded and carried to Amphipolis, where he died, after he had heard how his men had got the Victory, being honoured by the Townsmen, as an Heroe, by sacrifice, anniversary Solemnities, and naming a Colony after him, which they did to ingratiate themselves with Sparta, because of the fear they stood in of the Athenians. Of the Athenians were slain six hundred; but of the Conquerors but seven men; such disadvantage was there in the battel.

33. In the beginning of Winter Ramphias with others in commission with him, was sent from Lacedæmon with new Forces, and came as far as Pieria an hill of Thessaly; but there the Thessalians opposed his passage, and news of Brasidas his death arriving, other causes also moving him (whereof this was not the least, that the Spartans before his coming from home were inclined to a peace,) he returned to Lacedæmon. And after that the action at Amphipolis, and his return, came to be known, both sides for weighty and urgent reasons were much more inclined to it, Cleon and Brasidas being both slain, whereof the one was a man of a turbulent spirit, and the other a great Soldier, who fought after glory in Military matters. The Athenians having received two great blows, at Delium first (when the change of the Government was to be made in Boetia) and now at Amphipolis, had learnt not to trust too much to the smiles of their fortune: therefore they who before would hear of no conditions, as certain of Victory, now were much abated in their confidence, and repented they had not embraced peace, when it was offered them upon such honourable terms, after the action at Pylus, fearing that their confederates would be incouraged by this change of their fortune to change their affections. On the other side the Lacedæmonians who thought they should have ended the War, and brought the Athenians to terms by an invasion of Attica, now found they were much mistaken; the defeat in the Island they had ever before their eyes, and felt the excursions from Pylus and Cythera; they feared their slaves, lest they should rise against them; and another danger pressed them fore; for the State of Ayos which had ancient enmity with them, was now after a truce of thirty years well-nigh expired, would probably take the benefit of their present troubles, by joyning with those who alone found them work enough, being so powerful at Sea. Above all, the liberty of the Prisoners at Athen, whereof most of them were of the greatest quality, provoked them to a pursuit after peace.

34. The business was much helped on by Plistonax the Spartan King, and Nicias the Athenian, the former being weary of those calamities which were raised against him upon any miscarriage in the War, and the other much enamoured of Peace, by the obtaining of which he thought he should be famous to succeeding Ages. Several treaties all the Winter were on foot about it, and towards the Spring the Lacedæmonians to make the Athenians the more readily to embrace it, gave out, that they would with the whole force of all their confederates invade Attica, and fortifie a Castell therein. After much tickling about it, a peace was concluded for fifty years, upon these terms especially: that a restitution of places and prisoners should be made on both sides, except Nisæa, which the Athenians might still keep from the Megarians, and Plataea, which the Thebans refused to restore to it's Inhabitants. The two States swore to the performance of it, and all their allies and confederates (except the Boetians, Corinthians, and Megarians, who liked it not) and it was concluded at Sparta, upon the twenty sixth day of Artemisius, Pleistolus being Ephorus; at Athen, upon the twenty fourth of Elaphobolion, Alceus being Archon, in the beginning of the Spring, presently after the Bacchanalia, ten years and a few days being past since the first invasion of Attica, and the beginning of the War.

35. The Lacedæmonians were by lot to make restitution first; which they presently did perform, but as to places, Amphipolis was the cause that they could not perform it; for neither the Inhabitants, nor the rest of the Associates would suffer it, though the Spartans drew out their Garrison, and did all that in them lay to restore it, they being unwilling to come again under the dominion of their old Lords, and counting it unreasonable for the Spartans to desire it.

Several Cities dissent.

The deputies of the dissenting Cities were at Lacedæmon, and being desired to sign the League, flatly refused, except some things were changed in it. Which the Spartans hearing dismissed them, and very prudently applied themselves to the Athenians, making an offensive and defensive League with them, thereby to retain them from joining with the Argives and Peloponnesians, which confederacy it behoved them above all things for to hinder. After this straight League, the prisoners taken in the Island were set at liberty, the eleventh year of the War now rising, and the peace was observed according to agreement; but all the late confederates of Sparta took this exceedingly ill, and let out all their hatred, formerly conceived against the Athenians their professed Enemies, upon their unjust friends. The Corinthians especially took it in great disdain, who had been the greatest incentives to the War, out of envie to the State of Athens, and as their Deputies departed from Lacedæmon they took Argos in their way, where to the principal Citizens they inveighed grievously against this League, saying, it was made with design to enslave Peloponnesus, whose vindicators they the Argives must needs be, and that it was incumbent upon them to decree, that all free Cities which would, might enter into an alliance with them for their mutual safety, which if they would do, they were sure that many, out of hatred to the Spartans, would give their names to it.

And the Deputies of the Corinthians application to Argos.

36. After their departure the thing was first referred to the Magistrates, and then to the People, who chose twelve men, to whom they gave power to make a League with any City or State, except the Spartans, and the Athenians, with whom nothing was to be concluded, without the advice and consent of the whole body of the People. This they did, because they foresaw a War to be made with Sparta after the end of the Truce, and hoped by this means to become master of Peloponnesus; for as the Lacedæmonians were now concerned for their bad success (and the rather more for that all had such vast conceits of their courage, that they thought they would have submitted to no conditions, but have cut out all by the Sword) so they who had been of neither party in this War, but allied to both, had bettered their condition, and now flourished exceedingly. The Mantineans first, who living in Arcadia, stood in fear of the Spartans whole confederacy they had shaken off, entered into an alliance with them, and after them the rest of the Peloponnesians, who thought they might undershand more of the matter than themselves did, and had high thoughts of this great and rich City, conceiving it able to do much, because that of so long it had done nothing. They were grievously incensed against the Spartans, and this offended them especially, that in the straight League betwixt them and Athens it was provided, that by mutual consent they might add new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleasures. This proviso they looked upon as made to enslave Peloponnesus, by the assistance of Athens, for that if any thing was to be changed, it were but just that it should be done by consent of all the Confederates who were concerned in it.

Those of Pro-Lacedæmon apply themselves to that City.The Lacedæmonians vindicate themselves to Corinth.

37. The Lacedæmonians knowing well how much they were concerned in these courtesies, sent Ambassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, whence they well perceived the mischief to have proceeded. They expostulated with them for what had been done, and laid perjury to their charge, in case they left their society and betook themselves to Argos, and blamed them for not admitting the League with Athens, because it was formerly agreed, that what the major part should conclude, it should oblige all; except some divine impediment interposed. The Corinthians replied in the Assembly of the Agents of those Cities which refused the League, that in general the Lacedæmonians themselves had not fully performed the conditions of the League, who had not taken order that the places forced from them should be restored, and that for their part they could not desert their confederates in Thrace, whom they perswaded to rebel against Athens, and taken into protection, and to whom they were obliged by oath taken more than once, which to them appeared to be a sufficient divine impediment why they could not enter into a League with Athens. And as for their conjunction with Argos, after they had advised with their friends, they should do what was right and fitting. After their departure, in the next assembly they entered into a League with the Argives, and so did the Eleans with the Corinthian Colonies, and those of Chalcis in Thrace.

38. All the Summer of the eleventh year, the Athenians and Peloponnesians had commerce with one another, though great consultations were on foot, and the associates bickered with one another, and both parties wanted not dissatisfaction.

For

Diffinification betwixt the parties.

The designs of the Bæotians frustrated.

Panaetius dissuaded.

For the Lacedæmonians restored not Amphipolis, neither procured the associates in Thrace, the Bæotians, nor Corinthians, to sign the League, though they engaged jointly to cause them to do it, and that if within a certain time they did it not, both were to hold them as Enemies. The Athenians seeing that they performed not these things, suspected they dealt deceitfully with them, and for this cause refused to surrender Pylus, repented they had dismissed the prisoners, and withheld other places till the Spartans had first performed the Covenants. They excused themselves, for that they had done as much as in them lay, having set at liberty their prisoners, drawn out their Forces from Thrace, and omitted nothing in their power, in which the restitution of Amphipolis was not: and as for what concerned the Bæotians and Corinthians, they would do what they required. They earnestly desired that Pylus might be restored, or, at least, that the Hæloes and Mæcenians might be taken thence, which after much ado was granted, and these men were conveyed into the Island Cephalenia.

39. In Winter the Deputies of the Confederates came to Lacedæmon, and laboured in vain to dissolve the League betwixt that State and Athens. But now other Ephori having entered into their Office, who had nothing to do in making the straight alliance, and were also much averse unto it, they dealt secretly with the Bæotians and Corinthians, to perswade the former to join themselves to Argos, and then all to enter into a League with Sparta; which they were sure would purchase this willingly, with a breach betwixt them and Athens, for that then the War would be more easy out of Peloponnesus; only they desired much that the Bæotians would deliver up Panaetius into their hands, that therewithal making exchange with the Athenians for Pylus, they might with less difficulty make War against them. As the Ambassadors were in their way, two of the principal men of Argos met them, and were very earnest with the Bæotians to embrace their society, which, when they came home, they laid open to the Bæotarchs, and Ambassadors followed from Argos to perswade them to it, who were kindly entertained and dismissed with hope that some Ambassadors should follow them to conclude the business. In the mean time the Agents from Corinth, Megara, and Thrace, agreed with the Bæotarchs, that they should bind themselves by Oath to assist him who should want it, and not to begin or finish any War without the joint consent of all, and upon this condition, that the Treaty should be signed. But ere this could be done, the Bæotarchs were to refer the matter to the four Councils of Bæotia wherein lay the supreme power, which not being made acquainted by them what advice the Ephori and others of Sparta had given, for fear they should give that State offence by joining with Corinth which had revolted, they judged the contrary, and so by the means of the Bæotarchs, who took it for granted that the Councils would act according to their advice, the matter proceeded no farther now, and afterwards was neglected by them.

40. This Winter also many Treaties were held betwixt the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, about the restitution of places; and the Spartans hoped, that if Panaetius was but restored to the other, they should recover Pylus. But such Towns as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be restored without their consent, and therefore Ambassadors were sent earnestly to request the Bæotians to deliver up Panaetius with the Athenian prisoners. They stoutly refused to do it, except they would enter into as peculiar and straight a League with them, as they had done with the Athenians. Now this could not be legally done, because in the League with Athens it was provided, that neither should make either League, or War, without mutual consent. Yet being possessed with an insatiable desire of recovering Pylus, and the more, because they were moved by the Ephori, and others that desired a breach with Athens, they struck up a League with them. Then did the Bæotians utterly demolish Panaetius instead of giving it up, and so the eleventh year of the War ended.

41. In Spring the Argives hearing nothing of the Bæotian Ambassadors promised to be sent, but great talk of the demolishing of Panaetius, and the League betwixt them and the Spartans, whom they thought to have drawn them in with the consent of the Athenians, were much perplexed, thinking they now should be run upon by all, though they formerly promised themselves the Dominion of Peloponnesus by forsaking the alliance of Lacedæmon. They therefore sent presently thither, and struck up another League with them for fifty years. In the mean while while three were sent from Sparta to receive from the Boeotians the Athenian prisoners and Panaetius, who yielded both persons and place, but this utterly demoralized, pretending for their excuse, that by an ancient League it was to be held by neither of them in particular, but be common to both. The Athenians received their men, but were much moved that Panaetius was demolished (though the Ambassadors put it off by telling them they needed not now to fear any thing from it) being sensible of a double injury received, both as to the Town, and the League made without their knowledge, and then they called to mind other breaches of the peace, and were jealous that they were circumvented by the Spartans. And occasion was hence taken by such amongst them as bare no good will to the peace, to seek all manner of ways to break it. Amongst these was Alcibiades the son of Clinias by the sister of Pericles, who though a young man, yet eminent for his Nobility, Riches, and Favour with the people, bare a secret grudge against the Lacedæmonians, for that despising his youth, and having no regard to the ancient friendship betwixt them and his family (which his Grand-father having dissolved, he fought to restore by kindness shewed to the prisoners taken in the Island) they made use of Nicias and Laches in the conclusion of the League before him, which he thought was much to the prejudice of his honour.

42. He cried out, that their design was first to suppress Argos, and then to do as much for Athens, and at this time there being no good agreement betwixt the Argives and Spartans, he sent to them privately, exhorting them, as they tendered their own safety, to enter into a League with Athens. They who were now not consulting how to become masters of others, but how to save themselves, were well pleased with his message, and though they had Ambassadors now resident at Lacedæmon about the League with that State, yet did they send away others to Athens, together with the Eleans and Mantineans, to make one offensive and defensive with them there. The Lacedæmonians hereat were at a stand, seeing well, that such a Combination tended to their hurt. To keep in with the Athenians the Ephori thought that more was done already than stood with their honour or profit; others held it the wisest course, seeing they had done so much, not to stick at a little more, but rather by giving full satisfaction, to retain the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued than the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, such were sent away to Athens as had most affection to peace, who laid in the Senate, that they came with full Commission to conclude all, excused the League entered into with the Boeotians, as having been done only to pleasure them in the regaining of Panaetius and assured them of the readiness of their State to give all satisfaction, being much grieved that things went otherwise than according to their pleasure. Alcibiades taking notice that they laid in the Senate, that they came with full Commission to conclude, feared that thereby the people might be drawn to a peace, and he interposed by a notable stratagem. He persuaded the Ambassadors of his friendship towards their City, and advised them to take heed that their absolute power to conclude might not be known to the Commonalty, lest the multitude should thereupon grow peremptory, and yield to nothing, except they could draw them to unreasonable conditions.

43. The Ambassadors believed him, and ordered their speech to the people according to his directions. Hereupon he took the advantage which their double dealing afforded, and openly inveighed against them as men of no sincerity, come for no other purpose than to draw the people from strengthening themselves with friends, intending to withdraw the Argives, and their adherents, to their own alliance, as already they had done the Boeotians, though contrary to their Oath. Then he commended the cause of the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans, to the people, which was much moved, having had before no good opinion of the Lacedæmonians; but an Earth-quake intervening before they came to the question, nothing was done that day. At the next meeting Nicias persuaded them to let him first go to Lacedæmon to know their minds concerning the League with the Boeotians, whether or no they would renounce it, and their friendship with Amphipolis, and restore Panaetius in such a condition as it ought. But Xenares the Ephorus, and his party, was so strong, that none of these things could be procured; only the peace with Athens was again sworn to, to gratifie Nicias, who was sensible how he should be blamed at his return, being accounted also the Author of the League. After his return the Athenians made a League with the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans for one hundred years, at large large described by Thucydides, but tending to the mutual assistance of each other. Hereby nothing in terms was done derogatory to the League with Sparta, and the Corinthians, though the Allies of Argos, yet refused to be comprised in it (as in the former betwixt the Argives, Eleans, and Mantineans) alleging that the former Convention was sufficient, which did not oblige them jointly to make War upon any one, though to defend one another. This they said, for that they seemed to find reason to forsake these Confederates, and to apply their Minds afresh to the Lacedæmonians.

44. This Summer the ninth Olympiad was celebrated, from the solemnity of which the Lacedæmonians were kept by the Eleans, being forbidden the Temple, and offering Sacrifice, for which a Guard was set, because they had not paid a Fine of two thousand Minæ imposed upon them by them, according to the Olympian Law, for putting some men into the Castle Phorcyas, and the Town of Leptæa, during the Olympian Truce. They sent their Ambassadors to excuse the matter, but nothing was done, so that they sacrificed at home, which bred very ill Blood betwixt them. After this solemnity the Argives and their Confederates sent to Corinth, to persuade them there to embrace their Party; but the Ambassadors of Sparta being there, and it being much debated, an Earth-quake hapned, and so they returned without any success. In Winter hapned a Fight betwixt the Heraclæans of Trachine (placed there by the Spartans to their loss) and part of the Thebæans; with others, wherein they were worsted, and many of them slain: amongst whom Xenares the Lacedæmonian General. With these things the twelfth Year of the War ended.

45. The next Summer Alcibiades with some Forces out of Attica, and the assistance of Argos, marched into Peloponnesus, which passing over he came to Patras, where he dealt with the Inhabitants about building a Wall thence unto the Sea, intending also of himself to build another as far as Rhium in Achaia; but the matter was hindered by the Corinthians, Sicyones, and others, who would have been endangered thereby. The Argives made War against Epidaurus upon light occasion, thinking, that if that Town was but subdued, they should be more safe from the Corinthians on that side, and the Athenians would have a readier way to send them aid from Ægina. Whilst they were busie about a Peace, Ephamidas the Corinthian threw this in their Dish, that what they made words of, that they contradicted by their Deeds, and upon that account they drew back their Army. But no conclusion coming of their Treaty, they invaded the Territories of Epidaurus again, and wasted the third part thereof. The Lacedæmonians were twice abroad with their Armies this Summer, but were recalled by their superstitious Ceremonies. The Athenians also sent the Argives one thousand men under Conduct of Alcibiades; but they having drawn away their Forces, and having no employment for them, they returned home. In Winter the Lacedæmonians conveyed three hundred Garrison Soldiers into Epidaurus, which passing through the Borders of the Athenians, the Argives expostulated with them for suffering it, contrary to the League, and complained that they restored not the Helotes and Messenians unto Pylus, whence they had taken them upon the desire of the Spartans. This accordingly was done at the instance of Alcibiades. All others were quiet this Winter, except the Argives and Epidaurians, who skirmished sometimes, and towards Spring the former hearing Epidaurus to be naked, came suddenly with their scaling Ladders, and endeavoured the taking of it, but in vain. Together with this Winter the thirteenth Year of the War ended.

46. The Summer following, the Spartans seeing in how bad a case their Friends the Epidaurians were, and that the rest of Peloponnesus had either already revolted, or was ill affected to them, fearing that if they delayed, all things would go worse, they armed themselves, and Slaves, with their Confederates, under the conduct of Agis their King. It hapned that the Argives were compelled round about by their Enemies; but when they were about to fall on, two of their Captains stepped out, and persuaded Agis to abstain from Fight, saying, that the Argives were willing to do all just things, and make Peace with the Lacedæmonians. This they spoke of their own Heads, without the consent or knowledge of the Multitude; and Agis, without acquainting any more of the Captains or Confederates, consented to a Truce for four Months, and there-with drew off his Army. The Lacedæmonians and Confederates, obeyed him for the rigour of the Law, but grievously blamed him for letting slip, or rather wilfully losing to great an opportunity, having the Enemy at such an advantage, and having such a numerous and well-furnished Army as had not been seen of the Grecians to that day; there being met together besides the Spartans, the Arcadians, Boeotians, Corinthians, Sicyonians, Peloponnesians, Phliansians, and Me-garians, and the choice of all these States, who seemed not only able to fight with the Argives, and their Associates, but with any other in Combination with them. The Argives also not considering what danger they had escaped, were foreiraged against their Officers, who had as they thought let the other escape out of their Hands, inasmuch that they had flung one of them, had he not taken Sanctuary, and yet they sold his Goods. Not long after a party of one thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse coming from Athens to their aid, the People, by the persuasion of Alcibiades, renounced the Truce made with Argos, and the Confederates gathering together, went and besieged Orchomenus, wherein the Spartans had put the Hostages received from the Arcadians, and which was, without much to do, delivered up to them.

47. The Lacedæmonians being grievously intreated against Argos, especially after the news came about Orchomenus, beyond all precedent decreed his House should be demolished, and fined him one hundred thousand Drachmes, which he deprecating; and promising to redeem his credit by some notable exploit, they yet made a new Law, that there should be ten men assisting to him, without whose consent he should not as much as lead the Army from the City. News presently was brought that Tegea was besieged, whereupon he took the Field, and came to a first Battle with the Argives and their Confederates, wherein though his right Wing was over-borne through the negligence of the Polemarchi (who did not soon enough communicate the orders received from him) yet he put to flight the Enemy in the other, and then coming to the help of it, obtained the Victory. This was that noble Fight, as Thucydides extollet it, betwixt the most eminent and powerful States of Greece, than which there was none more remarkable that hapned amongst the Grecians themselves. Yet the number of the slain was not great. Of the Argives and their Allies about eleven hundred, of the Confederates of Sparta not many, and of the Lacedæmonians themselves three hundred were reported to have fallen. The Day after, the Epidaurians, while Argos was naked, fell in upon their Grounds, and killed many of those that came out of the City against them. While the Lacedæmonians were busied in their Ceremonial Solemnities, the Eleans and Athenians, assisting the Mantineans, went and threw a line about Epidaurus, upon which they left a sufficient Guard, and departed.

48. In the beginning of Winter the Lacedæmonians after their Solemnity was over, again took the Field, but thinking now the Argives might be humbled, sent to feel their Minds about a Peace. At this time such as desired a change of the Government at Argos became powerful, and hoped if they could conclude with the Spartans, to take it out of the Hands of the Multitude, and bring it to a temper agreeable to the constitutions of that State. By the artifices of those men, the Argives were brought to forsake the Mantineans, Eleans, and Athenians, and join themselves in a League with the Lacedæmonians to continue for fifty Years: It was agreed, that no intercourse should be held with the Athenians, except they would draw out all their Forces from Peloponnesus (The freedom of Epidaurus being especially looked at herein by the Spartans as much concerning them) and that no Treaty or War was to be entered upon without mutual consent. They then took care for several other things, and sent to Perdiccas King of Macedonia, to enter into a League with him, but he did not thoroughly assent to it, though he bore respect to Argos, whence he accounted himself descended: but they renewed the League with them of Chalcis, and obliged others unto them. The Argives sent also to the Athenians, to require them to draw off their Guards from Epidaurus: but they hereupon sent Demophanes thither to get all the Fortification into their own Hands, after which they furnished it to the Towns-men, and renewed their ancient League with them. The Mantineans at first refused to join with the Argives in the League with Athens; but after considering that they could not subsist without them, subscribed, and gave up those places they had in their Hands. After this, one thousand men from Lacedæmon, and as many from Argos, were sent to Sicyon, where by the endeavours of the Lacedæmonians, the Supreme Power was transferred out of the Hands of the People to few Men, which was after affected at Argos also, an Oligarchy being introduced, agreeable to the Government of Sparta. With this Winter the fourteenth year of the War ended.

49. The Summer following, the People of Argos bearing heavily the change of the Government, took their opportunity when the Lacedæmonians were busied in the naked exercises of their Youth, and killing some of their adversaries, and expelling others, restored the popular Government, renounced the League with Sparta, and renewed that with Athens. Then they fell on building of their long Walls from the City to the Sea, thinking, that if they should be blocked up by Land, to have intercourse with the Athenians by Sea. In Winter the Lacedæmonians knowing that they were busied (men, women, slaves and all) in this work, with their Associates (all but the Corinthians, who stirred not) came against Argos, hoping to take the City by means of those within that were of their party; but being frustrated of their expectations, they demolished the Wall, and taking Hyllas a Castle of Argolis, put to the Sword all the Males of free condition, and so returned. After this, the Argives wasted the Territories of the Phliansians, for harbouring their Exiles. This same Winter the Athenians renounced the League with Perdiccas, accusing him of Conspiracy with the Argives and Laconians, of non-performance of the League betwixt them, and laying the blame upon him that the Expedition miscarried which they had made, under the conduct of Nicias against the Chalcidians and Amphipolis in Thrace. With these things the Winter ended, and together with it the fifteenth year of the War.

50. The Year following, Alcibiades with twenty Ships sailing to Argos, took thence three hundred men suspected of Laconism, who were carried into the Islands subject to the Athenians, and there committed to custody. After this the Athenians with strong force invaded the Island Melus, the Inhabitants of which being a Colony of the Lacedæmonians, denied them obedience. They first sent Commissioners to the Town to treat with the Melians, where there was much canvassing the case; but in conclusion they continuing in their resolution not to yield, Fortifications were made against the City, and strong Guards left upon them. Almost at the same time, the Argives making excursions into the Phliansian Territories, by the lying in wait of the Phliansians, and their own Exiles, lost eighty of their men. The Athenians that lay in Pylus now also wasted Laconia, notwithstanding which, the Lacedæmonians would not take so much notice as to account the League broken, and thereupon to take Arms; but only caused it to be proclaimed by a Crier, that whosoever of their Subjects would, might prey upon the Athenians: the Corinthians only about some controversies made War upon them, all Peloponnesus besides being quiet. The Melians made two sallies against the Besiegers, with good success; but a fresh Army being sent from Athens by the help of some Treachery took it this Winter, upon terms of yielding to Mercy. All the Males of ripe age that could be taken were put to the Sword, the women and children made Slaves, and the Town was re-peopled by a Colony of five hundred Athenians.

51. This same Winter the Athenians, with greater preparations than ever, thought it to be resolved seriously to look after Sicily. Their pretence was to give assistance to their Friends and Allies there, but the true and only cause was the desire of propagating their Empire, by the bringing under of all that whole Island. A good occasion was now given them by the Egeans, who upon account of former Alliance, came and sued to them for Aid against the Selinuntians their Enemies, upheld by them of Syracuse, offering them Money for carrying on the War; whereupon they thought fit first to send Ambassadors to be informed concerning the Money boasted of, and the state of the War. The Lacedæmonians this Winter made excursions into Argolis, and carried away much Booty. The Argives caused Ornea to be demolished, where their Exiles harboured, by the help of the Athenians, who sent some Forces to Methone a Town bordering upon Macedonia, thence to infect the Territories of Perdiccas. The Chalcidians hereupon solicited the Lacedæmonians to send Aid to the King, but they thinking it no Policy to break quite with Athens, refused. Thus the Winter with the sixteenth Year of the Peloponnesian War ended.

52. In the beginning of Spring the Ambassadors sent from Athens returned out of Sicily, bringing from the Egeans sixty Talents of Bullion, with a months pay for sixty Ships, as was required. The Ambassadors affirming (though falsely) as well as the Egeans that they had much Money in their Temples and publick Treasury; the People thereupon much elevated decreed Aid to be sent to them, under the conduct of Nicias, Alcibiades, and Lamachus, to whom they gave in charge, that, if it might be, they should restore the Leontines, and do those things which they saw to be most advantageous to the Commonwealth; according to the comportment of affairs. Nicias laboured with all his might to divert the People from such a sudden resolution, proposing all the difficulties and dangers of the War, and thought to have excused himself by magnifying the power that was required to such an undertaking; but his mouth was stopped by a Decree, which gave him as much as he could exact. For one hundred Gallies were ordered for the Expedition, besides others of their Confederates, which amounted to above thirty, over and above Vessels of burthen, and others necessary for the transportation of six thousand and one hundred men, with the greatest care and industry imaginable; the Soldiers were completely furnished with Arms, cloths, and all things necessary; and a drachm a day assigned for their wages.

52. Before the departure of the Fleet, all the Herme throughout the City (these were the images of Mercury set up at every man's gate) in one night were mangled and abused, which was taken as an ill omen, and the People was jealous that it was done by some that were Enemies to the Popular Government. Great inquisition was made in vain to find out the Authors, but the suspicion light upon Alcibiades one of the Generals, through the practice of his emulators, who made use of his lofty deportment, which ill suited with their kind of policy. He offered himself to the trial, being fearful to be condemned absent; but his Enemies put it off for the present, and got him to be sent away, intending to make use of that which he feared, that being condemned unheard, he might be the sooner oppressed, because now by his own authority and interest, he had drawn many to give their names to the Expedition, and therefore they could not easily carry any thing against him, because of his popularity. As the Fleet sailed towards Sicily, the Generals sent some before to discover further in what conditions the Egestans were, who bringing tidings clean contrary to what both they, the Egestans themselves, and the Ambassadors sent to them had asserted, the Generals were all divided in their opinions what to do, but Alcibiades hot and youthful, was for their proceeding, to which Lamachus at length assenting, his desire was obtained. They then landed and seized upon Catana, attempted Camarina in vain, when Alcibiades received orders to come and plead his cause at Athens about the Herme, his Enemies having obtained it should be so. In truth he was condemned beforehand, but to colour the matter, he was sent for to plead, and that must be with bonds laid upon him. He was aware of the danger, and departed straight to Lacedæmon, with intention to teach the Athenians what person they had compelled by unjust Judgment to forsake his Country, and betake himself to their Enemies. After this was known, sentence of death was published against him of his Partners, many (whether justly or no Thucydides much questions) being put to death without proof already in the City.

54. The Syracusians, though not fully persuaded of the design of the Athenians against them at first, (and thereupon not so well provided as they might have been) yet made all possible provision for resistance. The two Generals, after the departure of Alcibiades, by a stratagem drew them out of the City, and in the mean time brought their Forces near unto it, and worsted them when they fellied out, but without any great loss sustained on either part, and then drew off to their Winter-quarters at Catana and Naxos. The Syracusians at length encouraged by Hermocrates one of their new Generals (a wife man, who had forsworn them of the design of the Athenians) sent to Sparta and Corinth for aid; strengthened their Fortifications, made excursions to Catana, where they wasted the grounds, plundered, and burnt part of the Athenian Camp which was empty. Both sides laboured to draw the Camarinians to their side, but in vain; yet many Cities especially in the In-land, embraced the society of the Athenians, who sent also this Winter to the Carthaginians to procure their amity; the Cities upon the Tyrrhenian shore they also drew in, and all Sicily was now divided into these two factions. The Corinthians readily resolved to send aid to Sparta to procure as much for them from that State. The Spartans made difficulty at first to do it, for fear of giving the Athenians offence; but hearing from Alcibiades what their designs were (who was come thither upon the publick faith) at his persuasions resolved also upon sending Forces under the Command of Gylippus they also embraced his Counsel concerning renewing renewing the War, and fortifying Decælea a Castle in Attica. At the same time, the Athenian Generals sent to Athens for money and horsemen, which was readily decreed to be sent. Herewith the seventeenth year of the War ended.

55. The next year the Argives and Lacedæmonians preyed mutually upon one another in Peloponnesus. In Sicily the Athenians with their whole force, and new supply of horse, layed to Syracuse, about which they seized upon many places, and several skirmishes ensued about the Fortifications; wherein the Athenians had the better. Then was the Athenian Fleet conveyed into the Haven of Syracuse, whence great contention ensued, and Lamachus one of the Generals assisting his friends was slain. The Syracusians endeavouring the recovery of Egesta were repelled by Nicias, who thence drew a double work against the Town, and strengthened himself by the access of Confederates, and store of provision. The besieged receiving no assistance from Peloponnesus parled with Nicias; but the besieger receiving no assistance from Peloponnesus parled with Nicias; but the matter succeeding not, they made choice of new Captains, whilst Gylippus was not now far off, but despised by Nicias for the small number of his men. In Greece the Spartans distressed the Argives, who were assisted by the Athenians with thirty ships. These made excursions into the Territories of Epidaurus, so that the League which had long continued betwixt them and Sparta, though in a doubtful condition, was now openly broken, and the War resumed; and that more by their fault than any blame of the Lacedæmonians; if Thucydides be judge.

56. Gylippus arriving at Syracuse disturbed the work of Nicias about the Theraps (see 77) Wall, and changed the constancy of his good fortune, who yet was not discouraged thereby, but proceeded in his utmost endeavours for the service of those that sent him, making preparation for Sea-matters, wherein the Athenians seemed to excel all others: hereupon ensued several skirmishes with various fortune, and the remaining of Summer was spent on both sides, in increasing their Forces and procuring aid. Nicias writing to Athens for supplies, new Levies were made, and Demophanes, and Eurymedon joyned in Commission with him, whereof the latter was sent in mid-winter with ten Gallies, and a great sum of money into Sicily, and the other staid till Spring to get ready what was remaining: twenty ships they also ordered to attend the motions of the Peloponnesians. These things being known, the Spartans and Corinthians calling upon their Confederates provided for the invasion of Attica, accordingly as Alcibiades had advised. With these things the eighteenth year of the War ended.

57. In the beginning of the Spring the Peloponnesians under the Command of Agis the Spartan King, invaded Attica, where they fortified Oecælea, a place some twelve miles distant from Athens, and as much from the Borders of Beotia. The Athenians sent thirty ships to waste Peloponnesus, and sixty (with five of Chias) into Sicily under Demophanes his Command. Out of Peloponnesus were sent to the aid of the Syracusians, from Sparta six hundred men, from Corinth five hundred, Sycion two hundred, and out of Beotia three hundred, to the Corinthian Gallies lying at Naupactus were ordered to be a Convoy. At Syracuse the affairs of the Athenians, through the skill and valour of Gylippus and Hermocrates, went down the wind, who being also much distressed at home by the excursions out of Decælea, yet kept up their spirits to the admiration of all men. After Demophanes had arrived in Sicily, and heard of the miscarriages of their Fleet at Sea, he blamed Nicias, that he had not as soon as he came, applied all his endeavour to Syracuse the head of the War, and caused him to agree to set upon Epipole, a difficult and craggy place, where falling on in the dark night, they could not discern betwixt friend and foe, all speaking in the same dialect, and thereby great slaughter being made of them, partly by themselves and the Enemy, the Athenians received a great defeat. The Generals hereupon consulting together, were not of the same opinion; Demophanes now was for departing away speedily out of the Island, seeing all things hapned cross therein, though he had been the cause of the fight: on the other side Nicias, who had laboured with all his might against the War, now pressed earnestly that it was for the honour and interest of their Country to stay and carry on the siege, and though Eurymedon was of the same opinion with Demophanes, yet could not Nicias be removed from his, so that their departure was deferred till they understood that Gylippus was come with new supplies out of Peloponnesus and Sicily. This resolution he stuck to so much, for that he knew the multitude rather to look at success than the reason of things, and was unwilling to hazard his Sect. 3. his life and reputation in the hands of those who would be ready to condemn before they heard him, as they had done Sophocles and Phidodorus the former Generals, pretending they had taken money for making peace, when indeed there was not any possibility of making War.

58. But upon the report of Gylippus his coming, Nicias was content, and order was given for the Army to dislodge with the greatest secrecy; when in the mean time fell out an Eclips of the Moon. By this, which was accounted an ill Omen, was Nicias again so terrified, that out of a superstitious conceit he would not have the Camp break up till twenty seven days were past. The Syracusians much rejoiced hereat, and resolved to hinder their flight, or force them to transfer themselves to some other place. They first beat up their Camp, and the next day provoked them to fight, both at Land and Sea, and in the mouth of the Haven engaged in a great and bloody battle, wherein Eurymedon one of the Athenian Generals was slain, and though the Squadron of Gylippus was worsted, which made the Athenians erect a Trophy, yet had they the worst of it, all considered. This made them too late repent that they had so ambitiously and unjustly undertaken a War with a City as great as Athens it self, and one of the same kind of Government, Enemy to Oligarchy. But the Syracusians were more and more animated, conceiving now great hopes of obtaining much glory and favour amongst the Græcians, of whom some they might free from slavery, and others from the fear of it for the time to come, by chastising their Tyrants, as they were accounted. As a way hereto they resolved to block up the mouth of the Haven, that the Athenian Fleet should not pass out thence by stealth.

59. The Athenians seeing themselves in this strait, concluded it the best for them to make a new, and a more narrow Camp near to their ships, and attempt another battle at Sea, in which, if they had the better, then to remove to Catana, but if not, to burn their Vessels and depart by Land to some convenient place. This was attempted with all care and expedition; but the Syracusians opposed them, and in the straitness of the Haven was such a dispute, as scarcely ever before had hapned, which was beheld by the land Armies with passion suitable to the condition of their friends: Notwithstanding the Syracusians lost almost as many Vessels, yet the other were so weakened, and the Sea-men so discouraged, that though the Generals would have attempted to break out another time, yet they refused any more to go aboard; so that they concluded of getting away by Land the next night. If this had been done it might have fallen out well for the Army, but by the cunning device of Hermocrates they were circumvented, and perswaded to stay till the third day after.

60. Their departure was most full of out-cries, sorrow, and misery, set out to the life by Thucydides, so that none can read it without compassion. Gylippus seized upon their hundred and thirty ships left in the Haven, then pursued them, and set upon them behind, before, and on all sides, so that distressed for all necessities, they took another way than that which lead to Catana, otherwise than they had intended, and they were divided into two bodies, whereof that with Demosphenes soon yielded upon promise of their lives. Nicias required better terms, and refused to submit; but at length was forced to it, craving favour for himself and men, at the hands of Gylippus and the Spartans; eighteen thousand in one day were slain, seven hundred taken and condemned to Mines, were after sold. The two Generals were (contrary to the utmost endeavour of Gylippus, who would fain have had the honour of carrying them to Sparta) put to death, or as Diodorus saith, killed themselves in prison. This was the end of the Sicilian War, so indiscreetly undertaken by the Athenians, who when they had those already that gave them enough to do, would needs make to themselves more Enemies, and so by labouring to grasp, lost all. Meton (a) the Astronomer (mentioned before) was so certainly perswaded of the danger of this expedition, that when he was enrolled amongst those that were to undertake it, to prevent his going, he counterfeited himself mad, to confirm the belief of which he set fire on his own house. But (b) Hippocrates the Coan (Prince of Physicians) is said to have set out his own son at his own charge, as Physician to the Athenian Army.

61. The Athenians were loath to give credit to the first report of the loss of their Army and Fleet, because of the greatness of it, but then knowing it to be so indeed, were much incensed against those that perswaded them to undertake the War, and for that they feared the Sicilians would now come upon them whilst they they were destitute of all things, the City was filled with great consternation. Yet within a while, they took courage, and making all provision for defence, gave Commission to some few of the most ancient and experienced amongst them, to consult and provide fit matter for the multitude to debate. In Winter following all Greece was elevated upon this their bad success. They who were stoutest before, now offered themselves to joy in suppressing those of whom formerly they stood in fear: the Confederates of Lacedæmon more vigorously provided against them, and all those that had been subject to them were earnest to shake off the yoke. The Lacedæmonians having such encouragement, let themselves very seriously to the War. Agis their King went into Thessaly to raise money, and a Fleet of one hundred Gallies was prepared amongst the Confederates. Pharnabazus one of the Sarapæes of Perfia, and Lieutenant of those parts of Asia about the Hellefpont, and Tissaphernes another of the Sarapæes, desir'd to Sparta, and offered them assistance. These designs were carried on as secretly as could be, that the Athenians might get no knowledge of them; who labour'd all the same time about the Rigging of a new Fleet. With these preparations the nineteenth year of the War ended.

62. The next year the Athenians were at the beginning somewhat encouraged by some success at Sea; and thereby the Lacedæmonians so far discouraged again, that they thought seriously of concluding the War, till otherwise perswaded by Alcibiades, who undertook an expedition into Ionis to withdraw it from the obedience of Athens, and did very much effect it. The Athenians hereat abashed, and fearing all their Associates would revolt, took out one thousand Talents, which as yet had been untouched, as forbidden by the Law, and laid them out in this case of extremity in provisions, and especially in preparing a new Fleet. Then by Alcibiades his means was a League of Alliance made betwixt Darius Notus King of Perfia, and the State of Sparta, by virtue of which the King allowed money for the payment of their Soldiers. The Athenians recovered Lesbos, and Clazomene, the Milesians and Chians (principal in the revolt) were destroyed by them, but again they had the worst of it in a Sea-fight near to Rhodes, which the Peloponnesians then by fair means drew to their society, exacting of the Inhabitants twenty three talents in the name of tribute, which success, because of the strength of that City, made them confidently despise the money, and alliance of Perfia.

63. For, Tissaphernes and they were at some difference about the form of the League, which they complained was not rightly drawn, for therein they were tied to give up to the Persian the Islands, Thessaly, Loeri, and Beotia, which heretofore had been under the power of that Empire: which seemed unworthy for the Lacedæmonians to do, who pretended themselves the vindicators of the liberty of Greece, against the incroachments of the Athenians; Herewith Tissaphernes was grievously nettled, and departed in discontent from Cadus, where eleven Spartans had met him to require that the instruments should be corrected. At this time it also hapned that Alcibiades was envied for his glory, and suspected by the Peloponnesians, and hated by Agis the Spartan King, for that he had corrupted his Wife, inasmuch that order was reported to have been sent to Apochus the General, to kill him; but he withdrew himself to Tissaphernes. He laid open to him the full State of the Peloponnesians, perswaded him to diminish the pay that his Master allowed them, by changing a Drachm into three Oboli a day, part of which also he should ever keep unpaid, to have the Seamen at his devotion. He further suggested crafty counsel to him: especially that they should not suffer the Athenians to be suppressed by the Lacedæmonians, but to keep those two States ever in an even balance, and let them weaken one another by their mutual enmities; yet to favour a little more the Athenians, because they would be content with part of the sovereignty of the Seas, and would go no further, whereas the Spartans would not rest here, but contend for the sole Dominion, and to bring all the Græcians from under the Persian yoke. These things he pressed upon him as great mysteries of State for his Master's service, and as such he embraced them; wherefore the promise he had made of joining the Phenician Fleet with that gallant one of the Peloponnesians was not performed, and the power of this was weakened by the withholding of the Soldiers pay.

64. Alcibiades had a great desire to return into his own Country, which would not be to any purpose except it were preserved, and therefore he communicated these things to Tissaphernes. He wrote to some of the chief of the Athenians then lying lying at Samus concerning his desire, and told them wherein he was dealing with him; and yet he signified that he had no mind to return, as long as the Popular Government (under which he was banished) should continue. The Athenians that lay at Samus liked the matter well, and generally inclined to change the Government, for that they were made to believe that Tissaphernes by the procurement of Alciades would be their friend, and they should have money from him for the payment of their Army. But Phrynus the General standing in fear of Alciades, by reason he had spoken too freely against him, opposed it with all his might, and when he could do nothing by words, very boldly acquainted Alychus the Lacedæmonian General with the matter. He who now had not Alciades in his power, was no whit eager for his destruction, and being withheld corrupted by Tissaphernes to betray his trust, went and acquainted him and Alciades with what he had received. Hereupon Alciades wrote to the Athenians in Samus, and acquainted them with the treachery of Phrynus, required them to put him to death as a Traitor to his Country, who hereupon was exceedingly troubled, and boyled with anger against Alychus; yet in so desperate a case adding one rash act unto another, he wrote again to him, upbraided him with unthankfulness, and signified that he would betray Samus with all the Athenian Army there unto the Lacedæmonians, which he could do, because the Town was unwall'd, and would do, so far as it was lawful in so eminent a danger, as he was in, to provide for his own security.

65. Alychus without taking this opportunity to serve his Country, made this known also to Alciades, which Phrynus understanding, and knowing that Alciades would write hereof to the Army, that he might prevent him, he told the Soldiers that the Enemy intended to set upon Samus by Sea and Land, now that the City wanted walls, whereupon he commanded them, having absolute authority, to raise a work about it, and keep diligent watch. This was done accordingly, and then though Alciades his letters presently after arrived, yet no credit was given to the accusation, as proceeding from his bitter Enemy, but more confidence reposed in him. Alciades then applied himself to Tissaphernes to reconcile him to the Athenians; but he being unwilling to lose all his credit, was cool in the business. But whilst he dealt with him, the Soldiers in Samus having sent to Athens to deal with the People about the change of Government, Pisander chief of the messengers laboured to convince them of the absolute necessity thereof, for that otherwise they could not be freed from imminent destruction. The People being circumvented yielded to it, and gave him with ten other Commissioners power to treat, and conclude whatsoever they found necessary for the State, with Tissaphernes and Alciades: but the former of these standing in fear of utterly losing the Peloponnesians, and having this always in his mind to keep the two States in an equal balance, would not give any encouragement, or open his mind fully to Alciades, who fearing to lose his power and credit with him, which he had so boasted of to the Athenians; that he might put them by, demanded such hard Conditions as he knew they could not grant, and so the Commissioners returned with great stomach and disdain, to have been so abused by him.

66. And Tissaphernes to prosecute that design of setting the Grecians upon each other, and keeping them in equal power; fearing that if he detained any longer the pay from the Peloponnesians, that they would be too much weakened by the Athenians, who now of late had the better of it in some engagements, and thereby the King's Provinces should be exposed to danger, went this Winter into Caria, where he renewed the League on better terms for the Peloponnesians, paid the arrears due to the Army, and promised to dispatch away the Phœnician Fleet. This new alliance was made in the thirtieth year of Darius, (Alcibiades being Ephorus at Sparta) upon the River Maander, attested by the names of Tissaphernes, Hieramenes, and the Children of Pharnaces. Towards the end of Winter Oropus a Town situate upon the confines of Attica and Boeotia, revolted to the Boeotians, being formerly in the jurisdiction of Athens. Hereupon the Boeotians conceived hopes to alienate all Eubœa from the Athenians, especially for that the Eretrians who were principal in that Island, inclined to a revolt, and sent away to the Peloponnesians to desire they would come into Eubœa. But their care for Chius which was distressed by the Athenians suffered them not to comply with their desire; for they set out a Fleet to relieve that Island, but the Athenians being masters of the Sea, it durst not venture further than Miletes; and therefore the Athenian ships returned unto Samus. Thus ended the twentieth year of the War.

67. In the beginning of Spring Dercylidas was sent from Sparta by Land to the Hellepont, with no great force, where with ease he brought off Alychus (a Colony of the Milians) from their obedience to Athens, and after that Lampiscus, but attempted the same upon Sestus to no purpose. The Athenians and Chians had a battle at Sea upon equal Terms: but Strombichides the Athenian hearing what was done in the Hellepont halted thither, recovered Lampiscus, was repelled by the Inhabitants of Alychus, and then went to Sestus in Europe, where he placed a strong Garrison for the security of those parts. In the mean time Pisander and his Colleagues being returned from Alciades to Samus, in conjunction with those therein, resolved without him to change the Government. They first did it in most of the Cities which were subject to Athens, and found it almost effected there, after that Androcles, a man who was most earnest in the defence of Democracy, with some others, were secretly murdered by some Conspirators, who laboured thereby to gain the good will of Alciades and Tissaphernes. These designed to have the State governed by five thousand men of the most able with Bodies and Estates to serve it, and the People durst not contradict them, such factions and jealousies had risen, that no man was secure of his Neighbour. But Pisander and his Colleagues arriving, obtained of the Multitude, that ten men might be empowered, to conclude and set down in writing such things as seemed to them requisite for a settlement, which on a certain day were to be referred to the People.

68. When the day came, these ten men first required, that it might be lawful for any one to speak his Opinion without danger of incurring any penalty by the Laws. Then they proposed, that no Magistracy should be undertaken and exercised after the usual manner, nor any receive salary for the exercising thereof: that five Presidents should be chosen, who should pick out one hundred men, and each of these chuse three more, that all might make up the number of four hundred. That these four hundred men should be invested with the supreme Power and Authority; should decrease and ordain what seemed good unto them; and might call together the five thousand when they thought it convenient. These Propositions, though of so great consequence for the change they were likely to produce, were yet admitted of, not as much as one man gaining them, such a change there was made in the minds of the People, which now since the banishing of the Tyrants, had only been governed by its Laws and Constitutions, and not only not subject to the Authority of others, but reigning over many, devalued itself of so great Sovereignty and Power. But these four hundred men thus authorised, were conducted in a solemn manner to the Senate-house, with Daggers under their Coats, and compassed about with armed Men, where the old Senate having their Salaries paid were dismissed. They chose the Prytanes or Presidents out of their own Body, and then began to exercise their Authority; but not without Blood, Bonds, and Banishment. They sent to Agis the Lacedæmonian King, then lying at Decelæa, to treat of Peace, but he not having any Opinion of their Power as long to continue, but thinking the People would shortly resume it, rejected their Ambassage, and sending for more Forces out of Peloponnesus, came to Athens, hoping that in these Commotions he might affright the City into a Surrender. But he found the contrary; for all agreeing in this to resist him as the common Enemy, they stood notably to their defence, and sallied out upon him; so that having no hopes, he dismissed his new Forces, and with the other returned to Decelæa.

69. After his return, the four hundred sent other Ambassadors to him about a Peace, who referred them to Sparta, whither they went, but what success they had, doth not appear from Thucydides. They knew the common Soldiers at Samus (though Pisander and his Companions had stickled for it) to be Enemies to Oligarchy, and therefore to take them off, they sent to acquaint them that the Power was not in them only, but in the five thousand also, and laboured to satisfy them in this point, that this was equivalent to Democracy, seeing that during that Government, when all things were done by the Body of the People, a greater number did not use to meet. But they at Samus being impatient of any but Popular Government, after the departure of Pisander and his Colleagues, had restored it there, and sent to Athens to signify so much, not knowing what had hapned there, which was very unwelcome news to the four hundred, who cast some of the Messengers into Prison. But Chares, hiding himself for some time, escaped, and carried back a report how things stood, amplifying much the oppression and insolence of these Governours; whereas the Soldiers were grievously enraged, and threatened death, not only to the Authors of the Oligarchy, but to all that had been partakers of it; and at such a Season when the Enemy expected such advantages, they had committed something, tending to the ruine of their Countrey, had they not been restrained by the interposition of more stayed and prudent men. Thraſybulus and Thraſylus, who had been most earnest for restoring the Popular Government, that they might do it in a safe and honourable way, caused all the Soldiers, especially such as they knew to favour Oligarchy, to take an Oath unanimously to act for the restitution of the power of the People; to fight resolutely against the Peloponnesians; to take for Enemies the four hundred men at Athens, and to admit of no entercourse with them by any Officer at Arms; which Oath also they caused to be taken by all the Samians that were at Age, whose conjunction they thought necessary for carrying on the Design.

Take an Oath of Combination on against them.

70. Then did the Soldiers chuse them new Officers, of whom were Thraſybulus and Thraſylus, and encouraged one another to the Enterprize, both from the justness of their undertaking (for that the Army had not revolted from the City, but the City from it) as also from their Strength, far superiour (especially in respect of the Fleet) to that of the four hundred, adding also, that Alcibiades upon promise of security, and restitution, would be assisting to them, and that they might hope well concerning Tissaphernes, and the King of Persia. In the mean while the Peloponnesians fore mutined against Tissaphernes, and Aſtyochus, that they had not their pay, and were not lead out to fight with the Athenians, whilst they were so at odds amongst themselves, which forced the later to draw both Sea and Land-forces to Mycale for antingagement, but the Athenians refusing to fight, for that they were inferior to them in number of Ships, when more came from the Helleſpont presented themselves; but then the Peloponnesians conceiving themselves too weak for the encounter, refused to engage. Thraſybulus in the mean while persuaded the Army to recall Alcibiades. Audience being given him, after he had complained of the injustice of his Enemies, he discoursed much of the State of Affairs as they then stood, Magnified above measure his Power with Tissaphernes (which he did, both to discourage them at Athens, and to render the Satrapa the more odious to the Peloponnesians) who he said would assist them to the selling of the bed he lay on. Hereupon the Soldiers mightily elevated with Hopes, presently created him one of their Generals, with full power, thinking of nothing but the punishment of the four hundred, and resolving without any regard of the Enemy at hand to sail directly for the Piræus.

Recall Alcibiades.

71. Alcibiades withstood their Resolution, saying, that nothing was rashly to be committed, and seeing that they had put the Power into his Hands he must go to Tissaphernes. This he did, not only to transact what he pretended, but also to boast of his new Power, to let the Persian know he could either pleasure him, or incommode his Affairs, and so this crafty man procured, that he both made him fear the Athenians, and the Athenians stand in Awe of him, whilst hereby he made up his own Interest. That also which he intended concerning Tissaphernes, and the Peloponnesians, came to pass; for distrusting him before, they were now very bitter against him, since he hindered the Fight at Miletus, and defrauded them of their pay, and Aſtyochus their own General they had killed in a Mutiny, had he not taken Sanctuary. Presently upon this came Mindarus, sent from Sparta to succeed him, who then departed home with an Agent from Tissaphernes, whom he sent to excuse himself to that State, and answer such Objections as were made against him. Alcibiades returned from Tissaphernes to Samus, where met him the Ambassadors of the four hundred men (who upon hearing how things there had been, had all this while out of fear staid at Delos.) The Soldiers would not hear them, and voted they should be put to death, but he caused them to have leave to deliver their Message, which they did with all the advantage they could, in excuse of those that sent them, accusing of falsehood what had been reported by Chæreas; but still the Army was dissatisfied, and cried out to sail to the Piræus. Alcibiades now timely interposed himself; for, had the Army then departed for Athens, all Ionia, and the Helleſpont had been presently lost; but he put a stop to their heat, and checked those that were so fierce against the Ambassadors. He himself bad them return this Answer, that the five thousand might retain their Power, but the four hundred were commanded to desert, and restore the Senate of five hundred whom they ousted; that they should do well at Athens to take care of the Commonwealth, and not to give place to the Enemy; for whilst the City was safe, he hoped to make up the breaches; but if either it should be lost, or the Army at Samus miscarry, there would want those who should be reconciled to each other.

72. With this answer he dismissed the Messengers in safety, as he did also with much kindness Ambassadors sent from Argos to offer assistance against the four hundred. Tissaphernes now upon what design is uncertain, went to Aspendus where the Phœnician Fleet lay, pretending he would purge himself to the Lacedæmonians, and give order to Tamus his Officer to pay the Arrears due to the Army. But neither did he remove the Fleet from Aspendus, according to agreement, pretending frivolous things, nor did Tamus accordingly pay the monies; which raised many conjectures and much discourse. Thucydides thinketh his design to have been to hold the Græcians in suspense, and suffer them to weaken one another, for that if he had joyned himself to either party, by the help of his Fleet he might in a short time, and without difficulty have finished the War, and given the victory to which side he pleased. Alcibiades went to him with thirteen ships, promising either to induce him to joyn his Fleet with the Athenians, or to procure that he should not assist them of Peloponnesus; it being likely enough that he knew his intention of not moving to the one part or the other; but this he did, especially by his entercourse, and familiarity with him, to increase the indignation and choler of the Peloponnesians, and thereby to constrain him to joyn himself with the Athenians. But the return and report of the Ambassadors sent from the four hundred men raised great perturbations in the minds of men at Athens, whilst those, who either out of some ambitious design (all men being greedy of power over others) or for the publick good, desired that the Supreme Authority might be in the five thousand, had the advantage of the other factions. The other were as busie as concerned, especially Phrynichus, because so obnoxious to Alcibiades, Pisander, and others. They sent to Lacedæmon to make peace with that State upon any terms, and Fortified that part of the Piræus, which commandeth the mouth of the Haven, which made the other party, which affected Democracy, very jealous; Theramenes crying out that they intended to betray the City to the Enemy, who now with forty two Gallies hovered about the Coasts.

Tumults at Athens.

73. Neither were these mere Calumnies; for these four hundred men for the most part desired to retain the Dominion over both Citizens and Allies, but if not that, yet to continue Masters of the Fleet and Fortifications, and if this could not be obtained, then to call in the Enemy, to redeem their lives, and part of the City, with the ships and works; being resolved never to give way to the Popular Government, from which they could expect nothing but sudden destruction. To this purpose they made the Wall upon the Piræus with several Gates to let in the Enemy if need were. But Phrynichus returning from Sparta whither he was sent Ambassador (though to no purpose) was stabbed in the Forum by a conspiracy; after which Theramenes and his party grew more bold, and by the help of the Soldiers seized upon some of the Chief of the four hundred, whence ensued a very great tumult, all being ready to fall one upon another, and certain mischief had followed; but that the ancient men somewhat repressed the younger, and Thucydides the Phœnicians, then sojourning in the City, laboured earnestly to persuade them, crying out, that they should not themselves destroy their Country, now that the Enemy was ready to assail it; and with much ado he kept them from offering violence to one another. Theramenes also checked the Soldiers in the Haven; but he giving way to it, the new Fortifications there were demolished. The next day the four hundred met, though in great fear, and sent some of their number to appease the Soldiers, saying, that they would chuse five thousand men, who from amongst themselves should chuse the number of four hundred by turns to rule the State, desiring they would not undo the City by compelling it to yield to the Enemy. Herewith the minds of the Soldiers were somewhat quieted; and with much ado they agreed that a general Assembly should be had at a certain day for an agreement: but when the day came, and the Assembly was scarce gathered together, news came that the forty two ships, under Command of Hegæstrides the Spartan, held their course directly from the Coast of Megara, to the Island Salamine.

74. The Soldiers now concluded of the certainty of what Theramenes had told them, and that these ships intending for the Piræus, it was good that the Fortifications were demolished; and likely enough it was that Hegæstrides hovering so long about Epidauros, expected some good opportunity to fall on Athens. Here:

upon the all Assembly hasted to the Piræus, but the Fleet making towards Eubœa at length came to Oropus, which making them very solicitous for Eubœa wherein their hope only remained, they sent Thymochares with some ships to Eretria, which he joyning to those that were in the Island, made up thirty six sail. He was forced to fight sooner than he intended, by the fraud of the Eretrians, who delayed to bring victuals to sell as they were wont, and thereby drew the Soldiers further off from the Fleet, and made great disorder; so that the Peloponnesians setting upon them, whilst out of good order, quickly put them to flight. They took twenty two ships, killing some, and taking the rest of the men: such as fled to Land, and betook themselves to Eretria as to friends, were killed by the Inhabitants; then presently all Eubœa, except Oreus, revolted to the Peloponnesians. When tidings hereof came to Athens, never did so great consternation seize upon them there, no not after the overthrow of Scyly. For the Army at Samus dissented from the City; they had neither ships left, nor men to serve in them, and were broken into factions, of which they could not foresee the event; and the loss of Eubœa was exceeding great, because that Island furnished the City with more Commodities than Attica itself. And their fear was increased by the nearness of it, from which the Enemy might presently come and seize upon the Piræus now destitute of ships, which they did not only think would be, but imagined to be already done.

The contrary
dispositions of the Athenians
monians.

75. And had the Enemy been a little bolder, he might easily have done this, and more. Had he besieged the City, it would have been more grievously broken by seditions, and constrained to call home the Army at Samus; and thereby he might have reduced with ease Jonias, the Hellepont, all the Islands, and all as far as Eubœa; and so consequently all the Athenian Dominion into his power. But well was it for the Athenians that they had such an Enemy to deal with as the Spartans, who were of so contrary dispositions: they being speedy and bold in executing all their designs; but these slow, and something fearful, especially in Sea-matters, whereby they afforded many opportunities to the Athenians. These things are confirmed from instance in the Syracusans, who being of the same nature as the Athenians, were good enough for them at all assays. The Athenians in the midst of all their fears took yet all care possible for their Affairs, furnishing out twenty ships, and meeting together in Præce, the usual place for popular Assemblies, they abrogated the power of the four hundred, and gave it to five thousand, amongst whom some were to furnish the Commonwealth with Arms, ordering that none should receive any wages for his employments. Many other meetings then succeeded, in which certain Law-makers were chosen, and other things decreed for the good of the State, at which time Thucydides thinketh the Athenian Commonwealth to have been better than ever tempered and qualified, a moderate, and equal way being brought in betwixt the power of a few, and that of the whole people. A decree also passed for the restitution of Alciades, and those with him. Upon this change Pisander and the rest that adhered to Oligarchy fled to the Enemy.

76. In the mean while the Peloponnesian Fleet lying at Mytilene, in vain expected money from Tissaphernes, and the coming of the Phœnician Fleet: on the other side Pharnabazus, Lieutenant to the King upon the Hellepont, promised them all kindness, and in particular used his endeavour to draw all the Greek Cities within his Government from the society of the Athenians; which Tissaphernes also had promised, but performed like other things. Minkarps the General of the Fleet moved herewith, went from Miletus towards the Hellepont, with a Fleet of seventy three ships, which Thrasyllus the Athenian understanding, made after him with fifty five sail, labouring to get before him. Some stop was made by the way, but nothing very considerable done till they came towards an engagement at Quæsemæ. Sixteen Gallies of Athens were first met with by the Peloponnesians, who took three of them, and burnt another; and at length both the Fleets joyned battle, being enlarged since they came into the Hellepont by the access of other ships. At first the Peloponnesians put to flight the middle battel of the Athenians, and driving the ships to Land had the better of it there; but being too eager in the pursuit, they brake their ranks, which Thrasyllus and those with him observing in his wing, wound about and fell upon them with such violence, as forcing them to flee. They took twenty one ships, the rest by reason of the straightness of the Sea getting into some Harbour or other, and though they lost fifteen of their own, yet obtained they a seasonable Victory, which made them lift up their heads (having been dejected by so many disasters) and cease to complain of their Fortune.

77. The report of it at Athens, as of an unexpected thing, mightily encouraged the people also, so that notwithstanding the revolt of Eubœa, and intestine Seditions, they had hopes still, if they prosecuted the War with diligence, to have the better. Four days after the Fleet removed from Sestus towards Cyzicus, where in their way they took eight Gallies that came from Byzantium, and taking the Town, which then for want of walls could make no resistance, fined the Inhabitants; the Peloponnesians at the same time endeavouring to recruit their Navy. In the mean while Alciades having been with Tissaphernes returned to Samus with thirteen Gallies, bringing word, that he had stopped the Phœnician Fleet from joyning with the Peloponnesians, and had rendered the Satrapæ more friendly towards the Athenians. Then presently adding nine ships to the former, he constrained the Helicarnassians to pay a great sum of money, and fortified Cot. Tissaphernes, when he heard that the Peloponnesian Fleet was gone towards the Hellepont, hasted from Spendus into Jonias, where understanding that the Inhabitants of Antandrus had received a Garrison from the Peloponnesians of Abydos, because they had been ill dealt withal by Astachus, whom he had made his Lieutenant in those parts, as also that the Peloponnesians had cast his Garrison out of Miletus, and Cnidus (which they did to affront him, laying grievous matters to his charge) lest they should proceed any further, and grieving that Pharnabazus in a less time, and with less experience, should make more use of them against the Athenians, he determined to follow them into the Hellepont, to expostulate with them about Antandrus, and purge himself as well as he could of those things laid to his charge about the Phœnician Fleet, and other matters. And when he came to Ephesus he sacrificed to Diana. Here the history of Thucydides (a) ends (b) the Summer of the twenty first year of the War, which afterwards was continued by Thucydides (c) for seventeen years; but by Xenophon for twenty eight. (d) The work of the former is lost; and that of the latter extant, but without a beginning, in the judgment of a learned man, who, besides the proeme, will have the history of two years to be wanting; from the end of that Summer at which Thucydides left, to the conclusion of the Summer of the twenty third year of the War. But Diodorus placing the last things of Thucydides in the second year of the ninety second Olympiad, in the very next relateth those which are mentioned in the beginning of the first Book of Xenophon, so that if the whole was extant in his time, he either missed these two years, and so inverted the Chronology of all his history succeeding; or else only the proeme of the first Book of Xenophon is lost (if there was any) and the history entire.

78. Not long after the Athenians and Lacedæmonians engaged twice in fight at Sea, wherein the Athenians had the better first and last, the second having been fought to no great purpose on either side. Tissaphernes, after this coming to the Hellepont, Alciades went to visit him, whom he secur'd, and committed to close custody, pretending he had orders from his Master to make War against the Athenians; but rather for that he feared he should be accused by the Peloponnesians to the King, and therefore thought by this enterprize to redeem his credit. But after he had been secur'd thirty days, he made his escape to Lacedæmon, where pretending to have been sent by Tissaphernes, he say'd thence to the Athenians an Army lying at Cardia. Sailing thence to the Hellepont or Cyzicus, he overthrew Mindarus both at Sea and Land, who died also in the fight, taking all the Peloponnesian ships, after which he forced from the Town a great sum of money, and prosecuted the Victory by fining and securing other places. In the mean while letters were intercepted, and sent to Athens, which were to Sparta, written from Hippocrates Lieutenant to Mindarus, and found to contain the distress of the Fleet in these few words, according to the Lacedæmonian custom: All is at a loss; Mindarus is slain, the Soldiers are famished: we know not what to do, till we see you. But Pharnabazus laboured with all his might to encourage the Lacedæmonian Army, telling them they had lost nothing but wooden ships, their men being saved, and that new ones should be built at his Masters cost (who had wood enough at the Mount Ida) in which work he was very diligent, and relieved the Chalcedonians then distressed.

79. The news of the success with the letter of Hippocrates coming to Athens, did fill the people with excessive joy, who offered sacrifice to their gods, and kept holy day. They chose then one thousand of the most valiant Foot, and one hundred Horse for prosecuting the War, and sent thirty Gallies more to Alciades, that he might with greater success set upon the allies of Sparta now the Sea was in his power.

Alcibiades besieges Chalcidæ.

The Lacedæmonians when they understood how things went, dispatched away Ambassadors (the chief of which was Endius, unto Athens;) about a Peace. They offered that both States might retain such places as they had already in their Power, that the Garrisons might be dismissed on both sides, and the Prisoners redeemed man for man; and much in a little was said by Endius, to shew that the Athenians were more concerned to be for Peace, though he denied not but that the War was hurtful to Sparta. The most moderate men amongst the Athenians were willing to hear of an accommodation; but such as made their own Markets out of the publick loss, and gained by the War, withstood the proposition. Amongst these as principal was Cleophon, the most eminent of the Demagogues (or leaders of the People) at this time, though formerly a maker of Harpers, whom many remembered to have been bound with Fetters, but he was furiously registered amongst the Citizens. He speaking many things fit for his purpose, especially made use of the late success; which he so improved, as if Fortune now had forgot to be inconstant. The People herewith puffed up, and conceiving great hopes that by the conduct of Alcibiades they should re-obtain their ancient Power, refused to entertain the Proposals made by Endius; of which ill advice they were afterwards sensible, when it was too late, falling so low from this height of Presumption; that they could never after recover themselves.

80. After this, Agis the Spartan King made excursions from Decelea, as far as the Walls of Athens, at which time it happened that Thrasybulus was in the City about business; who leading out his Athenian Soldiers and others that were present, offered him Battle; at which he was troubled, and hasted away, losing a few of his men in some light Skirmishes. At this service got Thrasybulus great credit, that he easily obtained what he came for, one thousand Foot of heavy Armour which he himself would pick out, one hundred Horse, and fifty Gallies, being decreed to him; but Agis seeing that it was to no purpose to besiege Athens by Land, as long as they could bring in what Provision they pleased at the Piræus, sent away Clearchus the Son of Ramphius to Byzantium and Chalcidæ, to make provision for Sea matters, who got through the Hellespont with much ado, and with the loss of three Ships out of his fifteen he had with him, came to Byzantium.

81. The next Year in which the ninety third Olympiad was solemnized, wherein Eubotas the Gyrenean got the Prize in the Course, Euklippius being Ephebe at Sparta, and Andromon Archon at Athens, Thrasybulus having obtained the Ships decreed to him, with five thousand Sea-men, sailed to Samius, whence after three days he departed, and took Colephon, made excursions into Lydia, where obtaining much booty, he also went against Ephesus. Tissaphernes coming in in good time, he was beaten back from the City with double loss, whence he sailed to the Hellespont, and in his way at Zebeus put to flight a Fleet of twenty five Syracusan Ships, four whereof he took with the men in them. Then departed he to Sestos to the other Athenian Forces; and thence removed to Lampascus with the whole Army in the beginning of Winter, which Town they fortified, and besieging Amydas overthrew Pharnabazus, who came with a considerable Body of Horse to relieve the Town; which Victory reconciled the Soldiers, who before this were at odds, because those under Alcibiades being hitherto Victorious, would not be joynd with the followers of Thrasybulus who had been beaten. In the same Winter the Athenians made frequent depredations in the Territories of the Persian King. Then also the Phocians that fled from Maceda to Corinthium, were upon agreement dismissed by the Lacedæmonians; and the Plantation of Heraclea, and Trachinias, were by the Athenians the ancient Inhabitants, betrayed into the hands of the Oreans the common Enemy, and seven hundred of them slain, together with Lobotas the Lacedæmonian Governor. Thus the twenty fourth Year of the War ended, wherein the Mædes having rebelled, were reduced to Obedience by Darius Nottus, and the Temple of Pallas at Phœas was burnt with Thunder and Lightning.

82. In the beginning of the next Spring Pantacles being Ephorus at Sparta, and Antigones Archon at Athens, the Athenians with their whole Army and Fleet went into Proconessus; thence to Chalcidæ and Byzantium, and late down before Chalcidæ. The Chalcidians aware of their coming, sent all their Booty to the Bythinians their Neighbours, which being known to Alcibiades, he went with a sufficient Force, and by Thrace got it delivered up to him, after which returning he compassed Chalcidæ from Sea to Sea with a Rampire, and to the River.

Sect. 3.

ver. Hippocrates the Lacedæmonian, Governour of the Town, troubled hereat, fell out, and fought with that party that was under Thrasybulus, for a long time with ambiguous Fortune, till Alcibiades coming in, Hippocrates was slain, and his men repulld into the Town. Pharnabazus during the Fight came to relieve him, but could not get to them by reason of the Athenian Fortifications. He, whilst Alcibiades was absent, gathering Money from the Cities, made an agreement with the other Athenian Captains, that he should pay them twenty Talents, that the Chalcidians should pay all their Arrears, and afterwards as much as they were wont: in the mean time the Athenians should offer them no Violence, till the Athenian Ambassadors, which he took upon him to convey, should return from the King. Alcibiades at this time was at Selymbria, which having taken, he returned to Byzantium with a body of Horse and Foot newly raised in Cheronefus and Thrace, where Pharnabazus expecting him to have his Oath to the agreement. He refused to take his Oath except Pharnabazus did the like, who confederated to him, and so they both swore not to hurt each other. Together with the Athenians, others went as Ambassadors to the King from the Lacedæmonians; as also Hemocrates and his Brother Proxenus now banished from Syracuse.

83. The Athenians then presently besieged Byzantium, which having no hopes to obtain by strong hand, they attempted by Treachery, and had it delivered up to them, whilst Clearchus the Governour, a Lacedæmonian, was gone to Pharnabazus to sollicit him about Money to pay the Soldiers, and to gather a Fleet together wherewith if possible he might raise the Siege. News hereof was carried to Pharnabazus then wintering at Gordium in Phrygia with the Ambassadors whom he was carrying to the King. In the beginning of Spring when they were on their Journey, they met with some Spartans, who already had been with him, and said they had obtained from him for the Lacedæmonians what they desired, and how he had appointed his younger Son Cyrus his Lieutenant for the Sea-coasts, whom he had commanded also to assist the Spartans in the War, bringing a Commission with him whereby he was constituted Governour over all that used to meet upon the Plains of Capstus. The Athenian Ambassadors hearing this, desired first to see Cyrus, and then to go to the King; but if not, to return home. But Cyrus required Pharnabazus, either to deliver them up into his Hands, or to send them back, because he would not have the Athenians privy to what was done. But he neither sent them to the King, nor dismissed them, but kept them off and on for three Years, after which he obtained leave of Cyrus to dismiss them, seeing he would not permit them to go to his Father, and so procured them by Arctabanus to be conveyed through Mysia to Sea: and so they sailed to the Athenian Army.

84. Alcibiades having a great desire to return to Athens with the Army, first betook himself to Samos, whence he went and gathered up one hundred Talents amongst the Carians, and returned thither. Thrasybulus with thirty Ships going into Thrace, reduced several places into his Power, and Thesus amongst the rest, for at this time distressed with Seditions, Famine, and Pestilence. Thrasybulus with the rest of the Army failed to Athens, before whose coming the People had created anew three Generals, Alcibiades, and Thrasybulus, who were absent, and Conon present in the City. Alcibiades discouraged hereby failed to the City, where at his landing multitudes of People came to meet him, admiring his person, and the present posture of Affairs, which they ascribed to his good conduct, whom they now acquitted from what was laid formerly to his Charge, and executed him for siding with the Enemy, seeing he was thereunto led by necessity. He spoke to the Senate and People in his own defence, and gave such satisfaction, no body opposing, that he was created General with full Power, as able to restore the Commonwealth by his own Industry to its ancient Power. He first on Land (which of late had not used to be done for fear of the Enemy) celebrated the Eleusinia, and then in the third Month after his Arrival, with a Fleet of one hundred Gallies, aboard of which were one thousand and one hundred Foot of heavy Armour, and one hundred and fifty Horse, he failed to Andrus, the Inhabitants of which he worsted in Fight, and thence departed to Samos, intending to make use of that Island as the Seat of War. At this time Lisander was sent from Sparta to succed Cratippidas in the Fleet, who went to Cyrus to desire him in earnest to undertake the War, blaming the backwardness of Tissaphernes. Cyrus promised him his utmost assistance; but he desired that the Sailors might have a Drachm a day assigned as their Wages, thereby to entice the Athenian Mariners to forsake lake their Masters. He answered, he could do nothing against his Fathers Order, who had appointed for every Ship thirty Mine a Month, it being in the power of the Lacedæmonians to furnish out as few, or as many Ships as they pleased; but afterwards he condescended to increase their pay to four Obols a day: Moreover, he paid them all their Arrears, and gave them a Month's Pay before-hand, which made them very cheerful, and ready for all Duty.

85. The Athenians were much troubled hereby, and sent also to Cyrus to obtain his Favour, but could not be admitted, though Tissaphernes used all his interest in their behalf, relating, that his design had been according to the wife Council of Alcibiades, not to promote the Affairs of either, but to suffer them to destroy one another. Alcibiades understanding that Thrasybulus being gone from the Hellepont fortified Phocæa, went thither to speak with him, leaving the Fleet with Antiochus his Pilot, whom he commanded expressly not to Fight, no, not although he were provoked to it, until his return. But he being not at all used to command any thing except the Helm of a Ship, could not bear his new Power without making trial of it, and with two Gallies went, and provoked Lysander in the Haven of Ephesus (where he was intent upon mending his Fleet consisting of ninety Sails) who first sent out some particular Ships against him; but the whole Athenian Fleet coming in to his Aid, he was also forced to carry out his, and so engaging with it, there ensued a sharp Conflict upon uneven Terms. For, the Athenians came on without order, and so within a short time were discomfited, Antiochus slain, and fifteen Ships lost; the other returning back to Samus. Alcibiades returning within a while, in great chafe for what had happened, went, and offered Battel again to Lysander, but he contenting himself with his former Victory would not stir, and not long after the Lacedæmonians took Dolphinum and Eion, two Towns in Thrace. This loss was at Athens by Thrasybulus imputed to the neglect, and luxury of Alcibiades, who thereupon by the people was outed of his Command, and ten other Captains chosen for the management of the War, amongst whom was Thrasybulus himself, Conon, and Pericles the Son of Pericles the great. He then went and made War upon the Thracians that were not under the Command of that King, and thereby enriched himself with great Treasure, having built a Castle for his security, called Bisanthe, in those parts. Conon who at this time was governor of Antandrus, Phanisthanes being assigned his Successor, according to the decree of the People, went to Samus, took Thuria, and made excursions into the Territories of the Enemy. So this Year ended, in which the Carthaginians with a Fleet of one hundred and twenty Gallies, and one hundred and twenty thousand men invading Sicily, overthrew the Agrigentines, whom after a seven Month's Siege they also forced to a surrender.

An Eclipse of the Moon.

The Athenian Generals overthrew Callicratidas.

86. The Year following wherein the Moon was Eclipsed in an Evening (April the twenty fifth, some three hours after Sun-set, as the Astrological Table demonstrates) and the old Temple of Pallas was burnt at Athens, Pitæus being Ephorus at Sparta, and Callias Archon at Athens, the twenty fifth Year of the War commencing, Callicratidas was sent from Lacedæmon as Successor to Lysander, whose time was now expired. He having furnished himself with Money subdued Methemna, and charged Conon the Athenian General to depart out of those Coasts, and when he perceived him putting out to Sea, made after him, intending to stop his Passage to Samus. He pursued him to the Haven of Mitylene, where he worried him, took thirty of his Ships, and then besieged him in the Town, from which he cut off all Provisions. Conon sent out two Gallies to carry word hereof at Athens; one of which escaping clear from the Enemy, came thither with the News, whereupon relief was presently decreed to be sent. Callicratidas in the mean time overthrew Diomedon, who came to relieve Conon with twelve Ships, ten whereof he took, but when he heard that the Athenian Fleet was now come to Samus, consisting in all of one hundred and fifty Sails, he left Eteonius with fifty Ships to continue the Siege, and with the other one hundred and twenty betook himself to Malea, a Promontory of Lesbus over against Mitylene, where he supped, and it happened that the Athenian Fleet coming to Arginae (a place also over against Lesbus) supped there the same Night. Here they fought the next Morning a long, and earnest Battel, wherein at length Callicratidas his Ship being Sunk, and he init, his men began to flee towards Chius and Phocæa. The Peloponnesians lost seventy nine Ships, and the Athenians nineteen, with most of the men in them.

87. The Athenian Generals resolved that Theramenes, Thrasybulus, and others, with with forty two Ships, should hasten to such Vessels as were as good as lost, to preserve them and the men, and the rest should fly to Mitylene against Eteonius; but a vehement Tempest arising they were all hindered, and forced to continue in the same place, during which stay, Eteonius having notice by a Pinnace how things went, told his men the clear contrary, with which artifice encouraging them to take the Sea, he escaped. It might have been expected that the ten Captains, who joyntly had the Command in chief over the Athenian Fleet, might have received great Honour for such a Victory: But they were instead hereof, by the especial endeavour of Theramenes, brought to Judgment, for suffering many Citizens to perish in the broken, and sunken Ships; whereas, as it was pretended, they might have saved them. They alleged justly for their excuse the Tempest which followed the Fight; but after much canvassing, both in the Senate and Assembly of the People, the Malice of Theramenes (who set persons on to make great Lamentations for those that were dead) so far prevailed, together with the forgery of a certain fellow (who saying that he himself escaping in a Meal-Tub, had been intreated by those that were in peril of drowning, to desire the people to revenge their death against the Captains) that against the form of Law (contrary to which Socrates the Philosopher only refused to act as one of the Protagoras) eight of them were condemned, and six being present were put to death; amongst whom was Pericles the Son of Pericles. Those that were absent escaped, the heady multitude quickly repenting of their rashness, and the accusers of them were bound over to answer what they had done. Afterwards a Sedition being raised, wherein Cleophon was slain, they took the opportunity and fled; but Callixenus one of the most faulty returning to the City, and hated of all men, was famished to death.

And for that he was rewarded with a sentence of death executed upon six of them there present, amongst whom Pericles the son of Pericles.

Lysander is sent for by the Allies to relieve the Government of the Fleet.

88. The Soldiers of Eteonius wintering in the Island Chius, where they wanted both Victuals and Clothes, most of them conspired together to seize upon the City Chius, to which whosoever agreed was to wear a Reed as a distinction. He having notice of it, was sensible what ill will, disgrace, and damage it would bring upon him if it proceeded, and fearing his own Life, he boldly killed one of the Soldiers, whom he met with the Reed upon him, and being asked the reason of it, said as boldly, it was for wearing that mark of Sedition, whereas the rest were so daunted that they for fear cut away their Reeds, and so the Plot was broken in pieces. Then received he Money of the Chians, and gave them a Month's Pay, and taking no further notice of the Plot, encouraged them with fair Words, and promises, and so layd away. After this the Allies met together at Ephesus to consult about their Affairs, where it was agreed, that ten men should be sent to Lacedæmon to desire that Lysander might be sent back to the Fleet, of whose abilities they had already sufficient proof. By the Laws of Sparta he could not be twice General, and therefore they found out a middle way, to appoint Aracus to that place, and send him as his Lieutenant. Five and twenty Ships were then delivered to Lysander, at the end of the twenty sixth Year of the War, wherein Cyrus killed his two Cousins Autobasces and Mitranes, because they had not given him the Honour due to Kings of Persia, by holding their Hands within their Cloths when they came to him. For this he was accused to his Father, who upon pretence of Sickness sent for him to come to him.

89. The Year following wherein Archytas was Ephorus at Sparta, and Alexis Archon at Athens, Lysander gathering his Navy together, went to Cyrus for Money, which being obtained with some difficulty, he paid his Soldiers and Sea-men their Arrears. At Samus also the Athenians provided for fighting; and in the mean time came a Message to Cyrus from his Father, who now being sick desired to see him, although at this time the King lay incamped against the Thamneri of Media, Neighbours to the Cadusians, who had revolted. Cyrus hereupon sent for Lysander, and consulting with him about the War, desired him not to Fight the Athenians, except he overmatch them in number of men, told him his Father and he were able enough to increase the Fleet upon occasion, and to bind him and the State of Sparta to him, he gave him all the Revenues he had in those parts; with all the ready Money, and so took his Journey. Lysander neither daring to Fight the Enemy with so few Ships, nor to be idle with so many, subdued some places, and having given Agria a Visit in Attica, layd unto the Hellepont, which finding clear, he besieged Lampacus, and took it. The Athenian Fleet, which consisted of one hundred and eighty Gallies, hearing of this, came from the Chersonesus to Sestos, and thence layd to Agropotamus.

a River over against Lampſacus, the Helleſpont at this place being not two miles broad. Lysander contained his men in great order, and refused to fight without an advantage, which was at length given him by the Athenians, who braved him, but were in continual disorder, carelessly running up and down, inſomuch that Alcibiades having notice of it, came and adviſed the Captains to look better to themſelves, but returned with no other recompence than bad words. But Lysander keeping diligent watch upon them, obſerved his time when they were moſt of them landed, ſome eating and drinking, others looking for victuals, and others wandering up and down, and ſetting upon the Fleet eaſily became Maſter of it all without any oppoſition, except eight, wherewith Conon fled into Cyprus unto Euagoras as the King, knowing how bad entertainment he ſhould have at home.

A conſultation what is to be done with the priſoners.

Such Athenians as had conſulſedly got into their ſhips were ſlain or taken, and thoſe that were yet on Land by the Land Forces, which Lysander had in a readineſs for that purpoſe. He took three thouſand men, with the Captains and all the ſhips, except thoſe eight of Conon, and a Packet-Boat, which tacking to his own ſhips, with the ſound of Pipes and the Peaan ſung, he returned in triumph unto Lampſacus. Then called he the allies together to conſider what was to be done with the priſoners. Many crimes were objected againſt them, as that they had done many unjuſt things, and now had determined, if they had got the Victory, to cut off the right hands of the Peloponneſians (or the thumbs rather, as Plutarch hath it, of their right hands, that they might never be able more to handle ſpears, but row with Oars) and having taken the two Gallies of Andrus and Corinth to caſt headlong all the men into the Sea, the perſwader to this being Philocrates. Hereupon it was reſolved, that they ſhould all be put to death, except Adimantus who had withſtood the Decree of cutting off the hands, which ſentence was accordingly executed. Lysander then ſailing about to the Cities under the Athenian power, diſmiſſed the Garrifon Soldiers and all others he found, with charge to get them to Athens under pain of death, which crafty policy he uſed to fill the City with men, that it might not be able long to endure a Siege for want of Victuals. When they of the City heard the news, they were affected accordingly, bewailing not only the fortune of the ſlain, but their own alſo, expecting now that ſhould be done to themſelves, which heretofore they had done to the Melians, a Colony of Sparta, and to the Eliftians, Scironians, Toroneans, Æginetians, and many other Greek Cities, not in way of revenge for any injury, but out of indulgence to their own luſt; for that they rejoiced in other men's miſeries. Yet as grief would give way to prudence, they took care for fortifying the City againſt a Siege, in which they could not look for any aſſiſtance from elſewhere, all their Confederates, except the Samiſians, having forſaken them, and ſuch as they had baniſhed from their dwellings, being again reſtored to thoſe places which they had filled with Colonies of their own.

All of them put to death except Adimantus.

Lysander having taken away Democracy, brought in the power of a few into all the Cities. Herein he dealt with much cruelty and ambition, (putting in ſuch men only as were his creatures, that he might obtain an unlimited power or Tyranny over all Greece) and ſending for Land Forces from Sparta, he beſieged Athens both by Sea and Land. The Athenians continued to reſolve for a long time, that till many were already dead of famine, not a word was heard of aſking Peace. Then Ambaſſadors were ſent to Aſis the Spartan King about it, who referred them to Sparta, having as he ſaid no commiſſion to entertain their overtures. Thither then they went, offering, that they might gain the friendſhip of Lacedæmon, to part with all places beſides the City and Piræus, where they would retain the Fortifications; but they had for answer, that if they ſeriouſly deſired peace, they muſt return home, and not return till they had better adviſed of the matter. Hereat the Athenians were much aſhamed, thinking now of nothing but ſervitude; none daring to propoſe the demolishing of the walls; for the Lacedæmonians having offered them Peace upon thoſe terms, Archeſtratus for adviſing them to embrace it, was imprifoned, and it was decreed that it ſhould be unlawful to mention it for the time to come. Theramenes then procured to be ſent to Lysander to get out what his intention was, whether to enſlave them, or to have the walls demolished, and thence he returned not till the fourth month, that in this time they might be conſtrained to reſolve of ſomething. At his return, he ſaid he could get no other answer, but that they muſt ſend again to Sparta, and thereby he procured himſelf and others to be ſent with full authority for concluding a Peace.

2. The Ambaſſadors of the Confederates being aſſembled at Sparta, many of them, eſpecially the Corinthians and Thebans, urged that no compoſition was to be made with them, but that Athens ſhould be deſtroyed; but the Spartans would not not give way to it, ſaying, it was not their intention to deſtroy a City, which in the greateſt dangers of Greece had done the greateſt things for it's deliverance. They then without much delay made peace with them upon theſe terms: That the long walls and the fortifications of the Piræus ſhould be demolished; that they ſhould deliver up all their ſhips except twelve, receive their exiles, follow the Lacedæmonians both by Sea and Land in the Wars, and have the ſame Friends and Enemies with them. Some at the return of the Ambaſſadors would have reſuſed theſe terms; but the far major part ſiding with Theramenes accepted of them. Lysander then ſeized upon the ſhips, and the walls, upon the fixteenth day of the month Manichion (on which they had formerly overthrow the Perſians at Salamine) and went about to alter the Government, which the People ſtrongly reſiſted, inſomuch that he ſent back to Sparta to complain of them, ſaying, they had broken the League, in that their walls were not demolished; and though no worſe thing was yet decreed againſt them though preſſed by ſome, yet this made them willing to receive any thing. Then ſent he for all the Pipers out of the City, to whom joining thoſe in his own Camp, at the noiſe of their inſtruments he cauſed the walls to be demolished, and the Gallies to be burnt, the Confederates making great ſolemnity, as if that day gave beginning to the liberty of Greece. Herewith, the twenty ſeventh year, and the War it ſelf ended, which being carried on for ſo long a time with moſt various fortune, dubious and inconstant events, with infinite charges, all forts of conteſts, and the ruine of ſo many Captains, as had not periſhed in all the Wars of Greece beſides, was finiſhed by the politick induſtry of one man, whom ſome thought A. 1. The year following being that wherein the ninety fourth Olympiad was celebrated, in the courſe of which Crocotus the Theſſalian got the prize, Endiscus was Ephebus at Sparta, and Pythodorus Archon at Athens, whom yet the Athenians did not ſo account, becauſe that the Oligarchy being brought in this year, they eſteemed it as Anarchical. As ſoon as the long walls and the Piræus were demolished by the command of Lysander, thirty men were choſen to make Laws, by which the Commonwealth might be governed. After their creation and inveſtiture in the power, they deſerred both to publiſh or write the Laws; but conſtituted the Senate and other Magiſtrates at their pleaſure. Then, firſt, they laid hold of all ſuch as had under the Democracy lived by informing, and falſe accuſing of others, which was not diſpleaſing to honeſt men. So that thoſe being condemned by the Senate, they were put to death. But afterwards they began ſeriouſly to lay their heads together, how they might make themſelves Maſters of all. They ſent Alcibiades and Aristotle two of their company to Sparta to deſire a Garrifon for the better government of the City, till they had taken out of the way all naughty perſons, and had ſetled the Commonwealth, promiſing themſelves to pay the Soldiers. Lysander being made uſe of procured what they deſired, and Callippus was ſent as Heſperophorus X x 2 unto unto Athens, whom they so flattered, that they brought him to consent to whatsoever they should act. Now then they fell upon, not only naughty and disloyal persons, but on the best, whosoever they thought ill affected, and would endeavour to stop their proceedings. Therameus one of them protested against this cruelty, and added, that it was impossible their power should continue in that State without a sufficient company to assist them. Hereupon they fearing him, lest he should make himself Captain of the discontented, which was almost the whole City, chose out of the Citizens three thousand which they thought meetest for their purpose, and gave them some part of the power, with this privilege, that none of them should be put to death without the consent of the Senate; all the rest of the People being left to the discretion of the thirty, whom they also disarmed at a general muster.

Fill all places with murders and rapine.

2. Now thinking themselves secure enough, they filled all places with murders, not only of their private Enemies, but such whose wealth might enrich them, of which they were excessive greedy; and to this purpose they agreed, that every one should name one man whom he would put to death for to seize upon his goods. Therameus having disliked the election of the three thousand, uttered now also his detestation of this wickedness, refusing himself to commit it. For this they were more jealous of him, fearing he might cross their abominable practices, and resolved upon his destruction; so that having provided a company of young men with daggers to assist them, they called the Senate together, and therein Critias (his once familiar friend, but now his deadly Enemy, because the most cruel Tyrant of the thirty) bitterly accused him as a turbulent and unfeeling man; being now for the People, and another while against them; he objected against him the death of the six Captains procured by him, and concluded he was not a fit man to live in a Commonwealth, especially so constituted. Therameus replied with undaunted courage, and gave satisfaction to the Senate, as Critias perceived by their muttering, who thereupon concluding, that if he escaped it would endanger his own life, he consulted with his Companions, and then returning to the Senate, told them, that having first expunged his name out of the Catalogue of the three thousand, and hereby he being subjected to their censure, they condemned him to death. Therameus replied again, that his name was no more easie to be blotted out than any other mans, in consideration whereof, he advised them all to make his case their own: but none daring to oppose, for that they knew the men that were present to be privily armed, he was let away, and compelled to drink poison, which he did with a resolute and gallant spirit. After this the Tyrants, as being at liberty to do what they pleased, forbade all that were not contained in the Catalogue, to come into the City, from which they expelled them and the borders, that they and their Associates might enjoy their Lands. The Citizens brook themselves to the Piræus, but being thence also expelled, they filled Megara and Thebes with their multitudes.

Therameus one of them, for detesting their wickedness, is put to death.

3. This banishment of the Athenians procured their liberty. For, now they entered into consultation, and resolved to hazard their lives for the freedom of their Country; seeing that now what would have been Treason at home, would have no danger abroad, but such as might be found in the execution. First Thrasybulus who was then at Thebes, with but a thirty in his company, seized upon Phyla, a Castle in the Territories of Athens; which the Tyrants understanding, endeavoured to recover, but to no purpose; for he having gotten to him within a while seven hundred men, put to flight the Garrison Soldiers of Sparta, whom they had set to watch two miles off from the Castle, killing of them about one hundred and twenty men. Herewith the Tyrants were somewhat discouraged, but thinking it best to get Eleusine into their power, they went thither, and perceiving the Inhabitants that were able to bear Arms to go out at the gates, that they might only as they pretended take the number of their heads, most wickedly murdered them. After this Thrasybulus with one thousand men seized upon the Piræus, against whom, though the Tyrants came out with their whole power, yet he obtained the Victory against them, killing seventy, and what more, Critias the Arch Tyrant, with Hippoclitides one of the Collegues, and Charmides one of the ten Captains which had been placed over the Piræus. When the slain were delivered up to be buried, and thereupon both parties met, Cleocritus a Cryer belonging to the Priests, and a man famous for his loud and audible voice, expostulated with those who sided with the Tyrants for expelling their fellow Citizens, educated together, partakers heretofore of the same times, faced sacred and prophane, prosperous and adverse, and all for to satisfy the lust of those Monsters, who had kindled such a flame as had already consumed more than the Peloponnesian War did in ten years. His speech produced such effect, that the three thousand fell at difference amongst themselves; such as had been bused in the destruction of other men, together with the Tyrants, vehemently contended that nothing was to be granted to them in the Piræus; but those that were confident in their own innocence, crying out there was no reason that they should obey the will and pleasure of the thirty, and suffer the City to perish, prevailed against them. Then was the power of the thirty abrogated, and ten chosen in their room, one out of every Tribe, after which they quitted the City, and retired to Eleusine.

Their power is abrogated.

They send for aid from Sparta.

Lysander is sent and besiegeth Thrasybulus and his fellows in the Piræus.

4. Notwithstanding the change of the Government, yet there was no accord betwixt them in the Piræus and those in the Town, but several acts of Hostility they committed against one another. At length the three thousand in the Town, and the Tyrants of Eleusine, sent to Sparta to desire aid against the other, saying, that the people revolted from the Lacedemonians; and Lysander procured them one hundred Talents to be sent out of hand, himself ordered to go General to assist them, and his brother Libys General of the Fleet. Then besieged he the Piræus, both by Land and Sea, and sorely frightened them; but Pausanias the Spartan King thinking much that he should get the glory of Conquering Athens the second time, which he would make as his own, he perswaded the Ephori to give way, that he should follow him with another Army, under pretence of assisting him; upon which account the Corinthians and Boeotians amongst the Confederates refused to follow him, alleging they should break their Oaths by fighting against them, who had done nothing prejudicial to the peace. This they did, concluding that the Lacedemonians would lay the Territories of Athens to their own demands. Pausanias, after his arrival, sent to them in the Piræus to bid them depart and they refusing it, for a colour to his designs, he led his Forces against them. But returning without any thing performed, he went to view the Walls the next day, at which time they sallied out upon him, and still fresh supplies coming in on both sides, wrought, and received considerable damage.

The popular Government restored.

5. Yet for all this he underhand sent unto them about a composition, and instructed them what they should offer. They obeyed him, and he perswaded also those in the City to end the controversy, that both might become friends to the Lacedemonians. The two Ephori present with him (for two used always to accompany the Spartan Kings in their expeditions) inclined to his opinion, rather than to the severity of Lysander, and so accordingly they sent Ambassadors from both parties to Lacedemon about an agreement. The Lacedemonians after audience presently dispatched ten Commissioners with them back to Athens, who, together with Pausanias, might make an agreement. They presently composed all on these terms: That all should return home to their own habitations, except the thirty, and the ten, and eleven men which had commanded in the Piræus; and if any feared the people they might remove to Eleusine. These things being done, Pausanias drew off the Spartan Army, and those that were in the Piræus went up with their Arms into the City, and there sacrificed to Minerva. Then by the perswasion of Thrasybulus the popular Government was restored, and all things ordered as in former times. A little after it being heard that they in Eleusine hired Soldiers abroad, attempting new matters, the whole City rose against them, took their Captains as they came to parley, and slew them: the rest by their friends sent to them were perswaded to agree. Then passed a general Act of Oblivion for all that was past, confirmed by an Oath, to keep which they being very careful, even yet faith Xenophon, jointly manage the affairs of the Commonwealth. By which wise order the City returned to its former quietness, upon this Sedition raised by the thirty Tyrants, who being created by a Decree of the Senate, as a former faith, put to death one thousand and four hundred Citizens unheard, and forced more than five thousand to fly into the Piræus.

*Hermias in Anapage.

6. But this Tyranny of the thirty, not only produced the destruction of many in the Town, but of Alcibiades also then living in Athens with Pharnabazus, whom he intended to make use of to bring him to the King, hoping he might deserve no worse, of that Prince than Themistocles had done of his Predecessor. When the Athenians were deprived of their liberty by the means of Lysander, and the Tyranny of the thirty, they then began again to repent of what they had done to him, judging that if he had been yet at the Helm, they should never have made shipwreck of their liberty, and still their confidence was in him, and

and thought their cause was not utterly desperate as long as he was safe. The Tyrants also were jealous of him, procuring all the intelligence they could concerning all his actions, and at length Critias remonstrated to Lysander, that things could not stand as they did long, if he lived, who yet was nothing perswaded to procure his death, till he received a Scytala from the Magistrates at Sparta, who either feared his great abilities, or did it to gratify Agis, to remove him by some means out of the way. He sent to Pharnabazus, requiring him to dispatch him, who enjoyed his brother Agis, and his Uncle Susamithres to be his Executioners: They coming to the Village in Phrygia where he lived, durst not enter his house, but compelling it about set it on fire. He perceiving what was done, took some clothes, and casting them into the fire, which keeping down the flame for some space, he brake out, whereupon the Barbarians fled, not daring to stand to him, but at a distance killed him with Darts, after which his body was burnt (with that matter that was prepared to consume him alive) by the care of his Paramour Timandra, the Mother of Lais the famous Corinthian Courtesan. Thus he died in the flower of his age, scarce exceeding forty years, a man very beautiful, of most excellent parts, fit for any employment, able to accommodate himself to all, both times, and customs, though never so repugnant, and therein yet esteemed to excell. Socrates upon him exercised the true Platonick love, labouring to infuse such virtue into him as might make him truly lovely, but such were his temptations, and inclination, that counterpoising the instructions, nature in this man seemed to try what she could do; it being agreed by all, faith * one who wrote of him, that none was ever more eminent, both for vice and virtue.

7. After these things Cyrus made War upon his brother Artaxerxes, as hath been said elsewhere, at what time he sent to Lacedæmon, demanding a return for his kindnesses shewed to them, who thinking it most just, sent their Admiral to keep in play Synnests the Satraps of Cilicia, till he passed that Country. After his overthrow, Tissaphernes his greatest Enemy, being a most insolent man before, now grew more haughty (after the King had laid the Province of Cyrus to his Satrapy) and began to be more troublesome to the Greek Cities in Asia. They sent to complain hereof at Sparta, which State sent to their relief Thimbron with an Army of one thousand new raised Soldiers out of Laconia, four thousand Foot of Peloponnesus, and three hundred Horse from Athens; which the City willingly parted withal, with no good prosperity wished to their persons, for that they had been in the service of the thirty Tyrants. What he did in Asia, and how he returned home after Dercyllidas was sent to succeed him, and was banished upon the complaint of the Confederates, is related in the Affairs of Asia. At the same time as Dercyllidas managed the War beyond the Seas, the Lacedæmonians and Eleans reviving their old grudges and complaints, broke out into another War, which was begun by the Lacedæmonians at the instance of the Ephori. They sent out Agis their King, who led an Army into the Territories of the Eleans; but an Earth-quake hapning at his first entrance, which was counted ominous, he returned without any thing at all performed. The year after, he undertook another expedition, the Athenians, and all the other Confederates, except the Corinthians and Boeotians, following him, wherein he sorely afflicted all the Country, sparing the City Elis itself, and though he retreated, yet the Garrison he left behind him, continuing these depredations all the next Summer, and the Winter following, the next Summer the Eleans were constrained to receive such conditions as their Enemies would give them. The Wall about Patra was demolished, Cyllene relinquished, five Towns delivered into the hands of the Spartans, and three to the Arcadians; the management of the Affairs of the Temple belonging to Jupiter Olympius being only left remaining to them.

8. Not long after these things Agis died, having fall'n sick in his return from Delphos. He had born to him by his wife Timæa, a son called Leutychedes, but conceived at that time when Alcibiades sojourned at Sparta, by whom there were great presumptions that he was begotten. He had not been with his wife of ten months before the Child was born; Timæa her self was wont when she would play with it to call it Alcibiades more commonly than Leutychedes, as was acknowledged by her maids; and neither did Alcibiades himself forbear to acknowledge that he had to do with her, saying, it was not out of any carnal affection, but out of a desire that those who should proceed from him might reign at Lacedæmon; upon these grounds Agis owned not Leutychedes for his son, but but told the Ephori he was none of his, divorcing all his Mother; but when he lay sick, having no Children, and moved by his prayers and tears, he owned him for his son before many witnesses. After his death a great contention infused about the succession betwixt Leutychedes and Agellus brother to Agis, a man lame of one foot, but of a most noble and valiant disposition. Agellus was bred after the ordinary strict way, as not having expected the Kingdom being a younger brother, and yet was in great favour with the people, and pressing the illegitimation of his adversary had their ear; but one thing they much stuck at, which was an old Prophecy much urged by Diophites their Prophet, that it should go very hard with Sparta when it should have a lame King. Yet Lysander, who had taken a great affection to him, answered, that by a lame King was not meant lame of a foot, which could be no hindrance to virtue, but one of spurious extraction; and herewith, and by his private interest, procured the sentence to pass for Agellus.

Agellus carried off by the means of Lysander.

9. Agellus had not been a year in his Office, before that being to sacrifice for his Country according to the custom, the entrails of the beast three times did not permit it, which being viewed by the Prophet, he foretold that a grievous conspiracy was hatched against him, and all Magistrates, both in Town and Country. Five days after this a notable conspiracy indeed was disclosed to the Ephori by one of the Complices, the head of which was Cinadon. They presently referring it to the Senate, it was thought fit that he should be sent out of the City, under pretence of some employment, and that some should go after him to make him reveal his fellows, which accordingly was done, and an ignominious death was executed upon them. After the execution Herodas of Syracuse came with news out of Phœnicia, that a Fleet of three hundred Gallies was prepared by Tissaphernes, and the King, but upon what design was not known. The Lacedæmonians moved at this, called the Deputies of their Confederates to Sparta to consult about it. Now Lysander had a great mind to return into Asia, desirous to relieve those his friends, who being by him placed in the Government of the Cities, ten in a place, were for their violence and great misdemeanours, either killed, or driven into banishment. He therefore perswaded Agellus to undertake so noble and pious an expedition, and wrote to his friends in Asia, to desire of the State that he might be sent. Being perswaded, he offered his service on condition they would grant him thirty Affiliants, by whose directions and advice he might manage the War; with two thousand choice men newly to be raised, and six thousand of the Confederates: These were all decreed to him by the dealing of Lysander, who procured himself to be sent as chief of the thirty, to which place he might well pretend for the great glory of his achievements, and his friendship to Agellus, whom as he judged he had more obliged by procuring this employment, than by the former courtesy of preferring him to the Kingdom.

He is sent into Asia by the same means.

10. Having his Army and Provisions in a readines, he marched to Aulis; that thence, after the example of Agamemnon, he might pass over into Asia; but going about to sacrifice a Doe to the Goddess, with which he thought he would be better pleased than the was with Agamemnon for his daughter, he was hindered by the Boeotians from doing that which was contrary to their custom, and was constrained in a great chafe to pass over without the Ceremony, the Omission of which he accounted as a bad presage. When he came to Ephesus, it appeared that he only bore the name, and Lysander had all the credit and authority, all men making application to him; and observing him as a man of whom they had had former experience to exceed all men in earnestness to gratify his friends, and destroy his Enemies. This much moved Agellus, though a man of a most mild spirit (who was famous for bearing with any thing) and troubled also his own Collegues, so that the King resolving to cut off his authority rejected all the suits he made for any, and plainly shewed that his design was to cross him in all he attempted. Lysander hereupon told his friends how the safe road, that they must make no more addresses to himself, and being sensible of the disgrace expostulated with him about it, who let them understand that he could not endure to be overtopped by him; He then desired some employment of him, wherein he might both save his own credit, and do him service, wherein he promised to be faithful. He then sent him to the Hellepont, where finding Spithridates the Persian to be offended by Pharnabazus; he brought him over to him with a great Treasure; and two hundred Horse, although hereafter it was found that he took very hainously the diminishing of his reputation.

Tithraustes by Gold sent into Greece, corrupts the Seres to War against Lacedæmon.

11. Agæslaus in Asia prospered in the War to admiration, gaining great glory for his Wildom, Valour, and Courtesie, both at home and abroad; inasmuch that the Spartans, in confidence of his abilities, and integrity, committed the Fleet also to his command, judging it most convenient for expedition, and that both the Armies might joyn the readlier upon occasion, that they should be in the Hands of one man whom they could trust. But in this one thing he is accounted to have erred, in that not having respect to the publick good, he passed by many far more Eminent for prudence and gravity, and pitched upon Pisander, his wives Brother (a man very bold, but meanly practised in business) for his Admiral. As he was going towards the Fleet, and Agæslaus marching for Phrygia, Tithraustes (who having cut off the head of Tisaphernes had succeeded in his place) considering in how great dangers his Masters affairs stood, sent Timocrates a Rhodian with much Persian Gold into Greece, wherewith to corrupt the principal men in the Cities, and procure them to make War against the Lacedæmonians. This was effected at Thebes and Argos; and the Athenians, though they had no Gold, yet were very ready to embrace the War, believing that therein they should have the chief Command. Those that were corrupted then grievously inveighing against the Lacedæmonians, procured that the chief Cities entered into a Combination against them. The Thebans knowing that they would not begin the War except first provoked, took occasion to do it by the Loerian Opuntians, whom they procured to quarrel with the Phocians, and their other Neighbourhoods, about some grounds in question amongst them, concluding, that thereupon the Phocians would break into Loeris. They did so, and did more hurt than they had received; whereupon Asociades, who had received much Gold, procured the Thebans to assist the Loerians. The Thebans then invaded Phocis, which they wasted, and presently did the Phocians send to Lacedæmon to desire aid, shewing that they had not been the beginners of the War.

12. The Lacedæmonians not unwillingly embraced this occasion of falling out with the Thebans, to whom they bore many Grudges. They exacted the tenth part assigned to Apoko at Decelea, refused to make War against the Persians, persuading also the Corinthians, as they judged, to do the same; they remembered also how they had forbidden Agæslaus to sacrifice, casting the Sacrifice from off the Altar, and would not follow him into Asia. They resolved now that they had no War in Greece, and that their Affairs were in so good a condition in Asia, to curb their insolence. Lysander was then dispatched to Phocis, where he should gather the Forces of the Confederates together; and stay for Pausanias the King, who was to bring the Forces of Spuria and the rest of the Associates to Haliartus. He marching into Boeotia, drew Oreobomus from the League of Thebes, and impatient of delay tarried not for Pausanias, who hovered about Tegea, but went with such Forces as he had already to Haliartus, which he summoned, but in vain, the Thebans which already were in the City hindring the Surrender. Upon refusal he led his men to the Walls, and they of Thebes upon notice hereof halted out of their City to help their Friends, and falling upon Lysander (whether aware of their coming or not is uncertain) slew him in the place, and routed his Forces, of which were slain one thousand men, and of the Thebans three hundred. This was the end of Lysander, which he partly brought upon himself by his eagerness to make this Expedition, being in his old age fallen into Melancholly, which rendered him more peevish than usual. He left a great name behind him, but purchased rather by his good Success than Virtue. He would neither spare for Cruelty nor Falshood, to compass his designs, taking no estimate of any thing by any balance but that of Profit. He scoffed at such as said, that those who were defended of Hercules (amongst which he was reckoned, though not of the Royal Families) ought to manage Wars without deceit, saying, that where the Lion's Skin would not serve, the Foxes was to be found to it. A Design of his was discovered after his Death, whereby he intended to have taken the Regal Power out of the two Families, and have made them common to all in general. To this purpose a Writing was found containing a Speech he intended to offer to the People; which Agæslaus would have published, that it might have been seen what kind of Commonwealths man he was; but was dissuaded by Lacratidas chief of the Ephori, who said, that Lysander was not to be digged up again, but rather that Speech to be buried with him. Notwithstanding his Ambition, yet he died poor, which rendered him the more famous, so that to do Honour to his memory, the Spartans imposed a mulct upon certain Citizens, who being contracted with his Daughters before his death, afterwards when his Poverty appeared, refused to marry them.

13. The Thebans having lost so many men in the late Fight, thought they had but small cause to Triumph, counting their loss equal with that of the Enemy. The Day after, when they understood that the Phocians and others had retreated, they took more Courage; but again, when they perceived Pausanias to draw near, they esteemed themselves in no small danger. Yet the day following the Athenians joyning themselves to them, and Pausanias not moving forwards, they then had no small confidence in the goodness of their Fortune. Pausanias being doubtful what to do, called a Council of the Confederates to consult, whether he had best by main Force or by Truce recover the Body of Lysander, who for that it lay near the Town Walls, and it was very dangerous to fetch it off by strong Hand, concluded a Truce was to be desired; and the rather, for that the Corinthians refused to joyn with them, and the Enemy had good store of Horle, which they wanted. The Thebans refused to give up the dead Bodies, except the Lacedæmonians would engage to depart out of Boeotia, and therefore to their great grief they were constrained to do it, and in their Retreat the Thebans grown very insolent, killed such as staid behind never so little in the Villages. The Expedition was unfortunate to the Spartans in general; but especially to Pausanias, who at his return was accused capitally for not meeting Lysander in convenient time, according to agreement, for that he had not by Fight but Truce recovered the slain, and dismissed such Athenians as had been taken in the Piræus; and lastly, had not appeared at his Tryal. Being condemned he fled to Tegea, where afterwards he fell sick and died.

Pausanias condemned to die.

14. The Lacedæmonians awaked by their loss, and now knowing for certain that Money had been sent out of Asia to the several Cities, which had moved them to take Arms, they thought themselves in some danger, and recalled Agæslaus to defend his Country. He having had success in the War suitable to his Military Skill and Valour, was now gathering of greater Forces, wherewith he intended to march into the higher Countries against the King himself; but notwithstanding this, and that it troubled him to leave Asia, yet he resolved to obey, acknowledging in his Letter to the Ephori, that then a General truly and justly commands, when he is governed by the Laws and Magistrates, upon which account he said, he would follow the Letter, if not prevent it (seeing they had set him a day, and that he commanded not for himself but the City and Confederates) although he had subdued a great Part of Asia, overthrow the Barbarians, and had made great preparations for the War in Ionis. He left Exæcus the Harmostes of Asia with a Guard of four thousand Soldiers, but making all Provision for his Country, drew over many out of the Cities to the Service. Having passed the Hellepont into the Cherronesus, he held the same way that Xerxes formerly had done, when in the mean time the Ephori and Aristodemus guardian to Agæspolis the young King, with an Army of fifteen thousand men overthrow that of the Leaguers, consisting of twenty thousand (whereof thirteen thousand bore heavy Armour) making great slaughter, though they lost no more than eight of their number. Care was taken that Agæslaus should have notice of this success (with the Confederates in Asia) who grieved only that Greece should destroy so many of its own Worthies. As he passed through Thrace, he would not ask any of the Barbarians leave to go through their Countries; but only sent to know whether he should pass as a Friend or an Enemy. All friendly received and conducted him, except the Trallers, who having formerly sold the passage to Xerxes, now also demanded of him one hundred Talents, and as many Women. He jeered them, asking why they came not to receive what was demanded? and going forwards made great slaughter of them. The King of Macedonia, when he asked the question of him, said he would consider of it; so let him, said he; but in the mean time we will proceed in our journey, which boldness so awed the King, that he suffered him to pass quietly.

15. Having passed through Thessalie notwithstanding all opposition, by order of the Ephori he invaded Boeotia, judging always obedience best, though he could have wished, and had intended first to have been better provided. As he invaded Boeotia the Sun was eclipsed (August the twenty fourth according to the Astronomical Table) and he received the news of the overthrow of Pisander upon the Coasts of Asia by Pharnabazus, and Conon the Athenian, who being for his Skill in Sea-matters in great request with the Persians, improved his interest for the restitution of the Fortune of his Country. Upon this report he put

But now in Boeotia, when he was come near to Coronea, the Leaguers opposed themselves against him, being the Boeotians, Athenians, Argives, Corinthians, Eubœans, Ænians, and both the Locrians, with whom was fought such a Battle as had not hapned in that Age. At the first onset Agæfilus had the better in one Wing, but the Thebans in the other, and being in the Pursuit were forced to retire to help their Friends, where he charging upon the Front of the Thebans, and not on the Rear, as he might have done, did great execution and was wounded himself, notwithstanding the Valour of his Guard, consisting of fifty stout young-men, lately sent him from Sparta to do him Honour. At length he had the better of it, and dismissed un-hurt eighty of the Enemies, who had taken Sanctuary near hand, after which he went to Dolphos, and consecrated the tenth of his Spoils, which amounted to no less than one hundred Talents. In the mean time Gylus the Polemarchus brake out into Locris, where the Soldiers being greedy of Plunder, were fallen upon by the Inhabitants, whom though they repelled at first, yet Night coming on they were so intangled, that Gylus himself and very many others were slain, and all of them had been lost, but that the Alarm being taken by the Camp, relief was thence sent to them. After this, the Soldiers were dismissed to their several homes, and Agæfilus went by Ship to Sparta. Yet notwithstanding the War continued, the Athenians, Boeotians, Argives and their Confederates, making excursions from Corinth, which they had made the seat of War; and the Lacedæmonians with their Allies from Sicyon.

16. The Corinthians considering that their Grounds were wasted, and many of them slain, because of their being so near to the Enemy, but their Confederates free from these mischiefs, the most and best of them desired Peace, and began to consider of it amongst themselves. This being understood by the Argives, Boeotians, Athenians, and especially by such amongst themselves as had received the Persian Gold, and caused the War, they fearing Corinth would return again to the Lacedæmonians, to prevent this, they resolved to Massacre all such as were for the Peace. This they performed on a Festival, when most were got together, sparing none that took Sanctuary in religious places, so that most of the elder sort were killed, and the younger fled out of the City. Many of them, by the intreaty of their Friends, and upon the Oath of the Magistrates, that they should be safe, returned home within a short time; but seeing plainly the City was in the way to Ruine by the tyranny of that which governed, as that for Corinth it was to be called Argos, the Laws of which City they must be forced to receive; moreover being sensible that they had no more Power at home than meer strangers, some of them resolved it was better, by attempting the freedom of their Country, to die in the Quarrel, if it should fall out, than to live in that slavish Condition. In prosecution hereof they let in Praxitas Governour of Sicyon for the Lacedæmonians within the long Walls, who having no great Force with him, fortified himself as well as he might, which being understood at Argos, they flocked out thence to assist their Friends, and the Lacedæmonians opposing themselves they came to a Fight, wherein after much difficulty and various Fortune, the Lacedæmonians were Conquerours, making great slaughter of their Enemies. This Victory was the more eminent, for that so small a number had vanquished such multitudes, after which they put to the Sword a Garrison of Boeotians, which held the Haven called Locheus.

17. Praxitas pursuing his Victory, brake down part of the Walls to make a passage for his men, and then going on in the way towards Megara, took two Towns, wherein he left a Garrison and departed, after which followed only some light bickerings, till at length the Lacedæmonians issuing out of Locheus, with their Friends besieged Corinth, at which time the Athenians fearing they might pass the long Walls and invade their Territories, came out of the City with Malcons and Workmen, and repaired that part which was towards them. The Lacedæmonians grudging that the Argives should flourish at home, and prosper abroad, sent Agæfilus with an Army against them, who laying wait all their Territories, brake through to Corinth, and took the Walls which the Athenians had repaired, his Brother Telenax Admiral, taking the Ships and Arcevals upon the Gulf. Returning home, he was not long after sent out again, who when he came to Corinth, thought to have surprised it, but the Citizens aware aware of it, called in a Garrison of the Athenians, under the command of Sphicerates, and thereby prevented him. At this time Ambassadors came to him from several parts, and amongst the rest from Boeotia, to know what terms of Peace he would propound; but he carried himself so high, that he would take no notice of them; though Pharax interceded out of an inveterate grudge he bore towards the Thebans. But before their departure there came news that the party he had left in Locheus was defeated by Sphicerates, at which unusual message being much affected he leaped out from his Throne, and in all haste went to relieve them, but in his way met with three Horse-men, who acquainted him how late his assistance would be. Hereupon he returned, and the next day sent for the Ambassadors to hear what they had to say; but they something encouraged at what had hapned, and minding to require him for his disrepect, made then no mention of peace, but desired leave to go to Corinth.

18. He easily apprehending them, told them they should the next day see their friends in the Town rejoicing, and the defeat of his men, which was the true cause of their desire to go to Corinth, and accordingly waiving all about the City, went to the Walls, and having in vain provoked the Inhabitants to fight, marched to the Locheus the place of the defeat, after which he dismissed the Ambassadors; not suffering them to go to Corinth. His Army now beholding with their eyes the monument of the late mischance, were sorely afflicted, having not at all been accustomed to such a sight, only the Parents, kindred, and relations of the slain, according to the Lacæonian custom seemed to rejoice in the Calamity of their Country. Having re-inforced the Garrison of Locheus, he returned home his men, shunning the light and sight of all men, out of shame for what had hapned in this expedition contrary to their former fortune. But Sphicerates after his departure, in confidence of his good success proceeded, and reduced such places as had been taken by Praxitas and Agæfilus. After these things the Acheans being put to it by the Acarnanians, who endeavoured to wrest from them Calydone, a Town formerly belonging to the Ætolians, sent to Lacedæmon, and expostulated with them for not assisting them, who always were ready to follow them into all places. The State upon this complaint sent Agæfilus to aid them, who invading Acarnania, wasted the Country, made prey of most of their Carrel, and being opposed by them, was much put to it on the mountainous and precipitous places, by Darts and Arrows; but coming to hand-strokes, they were presently put to flight, and three hundred of them slain. Then consumed he all things with fire and sword, and attempted some Towns by the perfuasion of the Acheans; but in vain. Now Autumn growing on, he could not be staid by their intreaties to prevent the Acarnanians from sowing their Corn, telling them they were not well advised in their request; for his intention being to return the next year, how much more Corn they should have upon the ground, by so much would they be the more desirous of peace.

19. And according to his promise, the Winter being over, he returned, at the report whereof the Athenians seated in a mid-land Country, and thereupon more obnoxious to damage in their Corn, and in great danger of losing their Towns, made an agreement with the Acheans, and entred into a society of War with the Spartans. This War being over, the Lacedæmonians not thinking it safe to contend with the Athenians and Bœotians, whilst the Argives were at their back, they resolved to send their Forces against them. The conduct falling to Agæfilus, the other King, he would not undertake it, till he had consulted both the Oracle of Pythia Olympus, and that of Apollo at Delphos, concerning the lawfulness of the War, because the Argives desired a Truce, but being satisfied therein, he invaded, and wasted their Territories; yet ere long terrified with divers prodigies, he retreated without any considerable thing done. In the mean time Pharaxus and Conon, having overthrown the Lacedæmonians in a Sea-fight at Chidus, freed the Greek Cities from the Lacedæmonian Governours, which Conon suggested to the other as the only way to make them his own, and not to attempt to deprive them of liberty, which would force them to combine against him, and thereby give him work enough. He attempted Sifnus and Abydos; but Dercyllidas having secured them, he lost his labour, and gave order to Conon to procure a Navy from the Cities upon the Helleſpont against the Spring, being much incensed against the Lacedæmonians, and resolving to invade their Dominions. At Spring he did so, and having strengthened the Enemies of Sparta, as much as possible, he furnished Conon with a Fleet, and money to rebuild the long Walls of the Piræus, than which Conon persuaded him he could not do any thing more

SECT. 4. fuitable to his own interest involved in the damage of the Lacedemonians, and gaining the good will of the Athenians. The Spartans understanding that their own affairs must necessarily decline as much as those of Athens were advanced, (notwithstanding Telemias brother to Agessilus had recovered the Sovereignty of the Gulf of Corinth) yet thought it necessary as much as in them lay to prevent it.

20. Left Conon should again recover the Islands to the Athenian state, they thought good to advertise Teribazus, another of the Persian Satrapes, hereof, hoping either to draw him to their party, or at least to procure that no more furtherance should be afforded to the design of Conon. To this purpose they sent Antalcidas to him, to lay open these things, and to try what could be done with him about a peace, who according to his instructions, to gain it the more easily, fully left to his disposal the Greek Cities in Asia, provided those without were but left to their own freedom. Teribazus well well of this, but the Athenians, Boeotians, Corinthians, and Argives, having also dispatched away their Ambassadors upon report of his employment, refused to assent upon their own private interests. The Athenians feared, if the Islands should be left to their own liberty, lest they should lose Lemnus, Imbros, and Scyros. The Thebans, lest they should be compelled to set at liberty the Cities of Boeotia, and the Argives concluded, that then they must lay aside all thoughts of Corinth, which they had conceived great hopes to make their own. Their diffidence hindered Teribazus from concluding a peace with the Lacedemonians without the Kings special Warrant; but underhand he supplied them with money to maintain their power at Sea, and committing Conon to custody, went to the King to know his pleasure.

the Lacedemonians.

21. The King upon his giving account how affairs stood, sent Siruthas to take care of the maritime affairs, who being sensible what damage Agessilus had done his master, was inclinable towards the Athenians, which being understood at Lacedemon, they sent Thimbro into Asia to keep him in action, who at first forely afflicted the places subject to his command, but at length was slain, and his Forces defaced. At this time certain Rhodian being banished by the people who had the power in their own hands, came to Sparta, and complained that the Athenians had brought the Island under their power by that kind of Government. The Spartans understood their interest in so powerful an Island, and sent Ecdicus with eight Gallies to revive, if possible, the Oligarchy which was agreeable to their own model; and in this Fleet they ordered him to convey Diphridas into Asia, who was to gather up the Reliques of Thimbro's Army, and renew the War against Siruthas. He ordered his affairs very well, being a man fitter for the purpose than Thimbro was. But Ecdicus fearful of the power of the people did nothing at Rhodes, into his room Telemias was dispatched, and with a Fleet of twenty seven Gallies did that for which he was sent. The Athenians hearing of these motions sent out Thrasybulus against the Spartans, who despairing of Rhodes went into the Hellepont, where in Thrace he reconciled two Princes, Odryses and Scutheas, and made them friends of the Athenian State. Departing thence, he recovered several Cities, and amongst the rest Byzantium and Chalcis, whence going to the Island Lesbos (all the Towns whereof except Mitylene were joyned to the Lacedemonians) he had good success, taking several places, and waisting the Territories of the other.

In Asia.

22. From Lesbos he failed victoriously unto Rhodes, where he obtained money from the Inhabitants of Apandus; but his men after the receipt thereof dealing injuriously with them, they issued out in great anger, and killed him in his Tent. This is he, who if virtue be to be valued without fortune, one doubts whether he be not to be preferred before all others, seeing that for faithfulness, constancy, greatness of mind, and love towards his Country, no man is to be preferred before him; and whereas it happened rarely to any to free his Country from the slavery of one man, he did it from the Tyranny of thirty. But whereas no man excelled him in worth, many overtopped him in nobility, and hereupon it fell out, that though in the Peloponnesian War he doing many things of himself, Alciades did nothing without him, yet the eminency of that man easily swallowed the glory and profit of all achievements. The Lacedemonians having notice of what he had done, and fearful of what the friendship of Pharnabazus to the Athenians might produce, though they had nothing to say against Dercylidas, yet sent Anaxibius out to restore their fortune, who had prevailed with the Ephors for this employment, and promised great matters if he were but assisted with money and shipping. They gave him three Gallies, and pay for one thousand men. He coming to Abydos skirmished with Pharnabazus, and then getting three ships more, inflicted the Athenians. But the Athenians being sollicitous for keeping what Thrasybulus had recovered, though they had nominated Argyrius to his place, yet now sent Sphierates with eight Gallies and twelve hundred men, who was lately returned from the Corinthian War. He setting upon Anaxibius whilst he carelessly went abroad, slew him as he was going to Abydos, and with him twelve more Governors of Towns, and thence betook himself into the Cheroneus.

desire peace.

23. At this time Agina was withdrawn by Eteonicus from the Athenians, who thereupon besieged it, but to no effect. At Sea both sides as it were played the Pyrats with each other for some time: But Telemias being made General of the Lacedemonian Fleet, fell in upon the Haven at Athens, where he took some Vessels laden, with the men, and putting the Citizens into a great fright, in his return preyed upon the Coasts, whence he took many Fisher-boats with other booty, the places being not aware of any such things. In the mean while Antalcidas the Spartan returned with Teribazus from the Persian King, having concluded a League offensive and defensive with him, in case the Athenians and others would not consent to their propoals for a general peace. He coming to Sea took eight Athenian Gallies which came from Thrace, under the Command of one Thrasybulus, and making up the Fleet to the number of eighty sail, with twenty Syracusan Gallies; and others which he procured of Thrace, obtained the Sovereignty of the Seas. The Athenians were startled herat, fearing the issue of this War might be the same with that of the Peloponnesian, especially the Persian being now Confederate with the Lacedemonians, and the Inhabitants of Agina infesting their Borders; upon all which accounts they were very desirous of peace. The Lacedemonians also being much straightened in maintaining Garrisons in so many places, both affected to them, and weary of them, began to have enough of War, having moreover much trouble about Corinth. The Argives not ignorant that War was decreed against them, and that their old shifts and pretences would stand them in no stead, were also ready to embrace peace. They all then sent their Agents to Teribazus to know what was propoed by Artaxerxes Mnemon.

Antalcidas.

24. Teribazus shewing them the Kings Seals, read the Contents of the writing, which imported, that he thought it just that the Cities in Asia, the Islands Clazomenae and Cyprus, should be under his Jurisdiction: and all the rest, little and great, should be left to their own freedom, except Lemnus, Imbros, and Scirus, which having been time out of mind subject to the Athenians, he thought it fitting they should so continue. And such as would not admit of these conditions, he with the rest of the Confederates would prosecute with War, both at Sea and Land, to the utmost ability. The Agents returning home, all the States embraced the conditions, except the Thebans, who were unwilling to set at liberty the Cities of Boeotia; but Agessilus making preparations to invade them, they were so far awed thereby as to receive them. He constrained also the Argives to leave Corinth, from which the Authors of the late Massacre then flying, the Exiles returned home. These things being done, and the League sworn to by all parties, this first peace was made betwixt the Lacedemonians and Athenians with their followers, after the ending of the Peloponnesian War, and casting down of their Walls, being called the peace of Antalcidas; for so it was termed, from the procurer, being indeed the shameful betraying of those Cities into the hands of Artaxerxes, for which Agessilus had prosecuted the War in Asia.

The Spartans
grew high.

25. The Lacedemonians were they who had the benefit thereof, being the Protectors and Patrons of it; and grew so high upon the success, that now they resolved to chastize such of the Associates as had in the late War born greater affection to their adversaries than themselves. First they fell upon the Marineans as guilty of this Crime, whom by their King Agessipolis (for Agessilus, because of the friendship that passed betwixt his father and them, desired to be excused) they forced first to break down their Walls by turning the River upon them, which ran through the City, and then to divide themselves into Villages. After this they forced the Philiatians to receive their Exiles, and made War upon the Olymptians in Thrace, at the request of the Acanthians and Apollonians, who accused them of clandestine practices with the Athenians and Thebans. By these courses they hoped that all the small Towns in Greece, upon occasion, would willingly follow them in their Wars as Authors of their liberty.

liberty; and the great Cities, having lost their Dependents, would be unable to make opposition. And in particular they had conceived an emulation against Olynthus, now grown so mighty, that not only the commanded her neighbour Towns, but was become terrible to places far remote, and to Sparta her self: The Olynthians had taken a great part of Macedonia, together with Pella the Metropolis of that Kingdom, and now imitating the old pretence of the Lacedæmonians to set at liberty the places over which Amintas did Tyrannise, had almost driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. They of Acanthus and Apollonia further adding, that either they must War upon Olynthus, or become subject to it, and fight shortly in its defence, Eudemidas was sent before with two thousand men. He arriving in Thrace, fortified the Cities, and recovered Potidea, which had associated it self to the Olynthians, and managed his Affairs with success answerable to such force. In the mean time his Brother Phæbidas, according as he had requested of the Ephori, was employed in raising the main Body of the Army, and having completed the levy marched away for Thrace to joyn with him.

26. At this time the Thebans were much divided amongst themselves, being headed by two Polemarchi, Ismenias, and Leontidas. When Phæbidas was come on his journey as far as Thebes, Ismenias out of his hatred to the Lacedæmonians would not see him, but his Colleague betrayed Cadmeas the Citadel of Thebes into his Hands, seized on Ismenias, and got the Command of the whole City, whereat those of the contrary Faction to the number of four hundred fled to Athens. Then another being chosen into the place of Ismenias, Leontidas went to Sparta, where he found the Ephori and People much displeased with what Phæbidas had done, being both against the League, and without any Commission from them; and such as were Enemies to Agæslaus, especially aggravated the matter, labouring to draw him into suspicion about it. He otherwise as great both a Commander and practiser of Justice as any, yet took upon him to defend the Fact, saying, that Phæbidas was worthy to be punished if he had done any thing that was hurtful to the Commonwealth; but if it was profitable, then according to the ancient custom he was not bound, in such cases where haste is required, to stay for a Warrant. Following herein his Ambition, or giving way to his Passion (which most shewed it self against the Thebans) he not only indemnified Phæbidas, but persuaded the City to own what he had done, to keep the Castle, and prefer Archias and Leontidas, who had betrayed it, to the chief command of Thebes. The rest of the Græcians were so aggrieved at what was done; but the Confederates durst not contradict it, and each City joyned one Commissioner to three sent from Sparta, who all together should take Cognizance of, and judge the cause of Ismenias. He was accused before them of having favoured the Barbarians, and held intelligence with the Persian; that he had received part of the Money sent from him to corrupt the Græcians, and together with Andocides, had been the great incendiary who kindled and fomented their intestine Broils. He answered severally and apart to all; but being believed to have attempted great and pernicious things, was condemned and put to death. Then was the Power established in Leontidas and his Complices, who did more in favour of the Lacedæmonians than was desired of them.

27. Things thus prospering, the Lacedæmonians more cheerfully pursued the War against Olynthus. They sent General thither Teleutias, who with the help of Amintas the Macedonian, and Doridas Prince of Elimeia, overthrew the Olynthians under their Walls, and waisting their Grounds, for that Summer was ended, withdrew to their winter Quarters. But the next Year when he returned, the Olynthians sallied out against him, whom to repel, he sending a party which drove them back beyond a River which ran by the Town, and followed them over, they then thinking they had his men at an advantage, turned back upon them, and slew to the number of one hundred. He being in a great chafe hereat, went into the rescue with all his Forces, and following them within bow-shot from the Walls, his men were fore galled by those that stood on the Turrets, and forced to give back, and then being hotly charged he lost his Life, with many others, so that the rest clearly put to the rout, and shifting for themselves to several places, the strength of this Army was broken, which defeat Xenophon chargeth upon the Passion of Teleutias, shewing how dangerous it is in the Leader of an Army. The Lacedæmonians having notice of what had hapned, dispatched away Agæslaus their King with all convenient speed into Thrace, who upon better advantages invading the Olynthians, took Torone one of their confederate Towns, and and harrazed the Country, but at Mid-summer by extremity of heat got a Fever, of which he died the seventh day, being much lamented by Agæslaus his Colleague, for their long familiarity, though emulated by him. Being put into Honey and brought home, there he was interred with Royal Rites, and Polysides was sent to command the Army, who besieging the Olynthians, at length forced them by Famine to yield on these terms: To have the same Friends and Enemies with the Lacedæmonians, and to follow them as Associates whithersoever they should lead them in their Wars.

28. In the mean time the Philistans grown confident upon the absence of Agæslaus, began to act very insolently and unjustly against the Exiles which of late they were made to re-admit. The Exiles complained of them at Lacedæmon, and they thereupon in their absence put a Mulf upon them, which understanding, they still continued and pray'd justice from that State. At length the Ephori resolved upon War, and Agæslaus was sent against the Philistans, who thereupon offering largely to do all things fitting, he refused them, saying, he must have Deeds and not Words, to which now without further confirmation he could give no credit. They asking what he would demand, he required their Castle to be delivered up to him, which being utterly refused, he besieged the City. They held out longer than he expected, because the Magistrate suffered them not to eat above half of the ordinary proportion, and by means of one Delfion, who with three hundred assistants, imprisoned such as spake of a Surrender. But at length consumed with Famine, they desired a Truce, to send Commissioners to Sparta to treat of Peace. Agæslaus stomached that they should pass him by, and therefore sending his Friends to the City, he obtained that the matter should be referred back to him. He ordered that fifty should be chosen of the Exiles, and as many others, who should determine which Citizens should be suffered to live, and which put to death, and that then Power should be given them to make Laws for the Government of the City. Whilst these things should be done he left a Garrison in the Town, and so departed, having spent twenty Moneths in this business.

29. All things thus falling out to the Spartans according to their wish, they judged their Empire sufficiently established; but another event (as Xenophon gravely discommends of divine Vengeance) taught the contrary, it being clear, both from the Histories of Greeks and Barbarians, that God suffereth not to escape unpunished wicked and ungodly Actions. They had sworn not long before to leave the Cities to their own liberty, and yet they kept in their Hands the Citadel at Thebes, and therefore being formerly invincible, were now sufficiently plagued by those alone whom they had injured. There was one Phyllidas Secretary to the present Polemarchi of Thebes, who being not at all suspected by his Masters, went to Athens where the Exiles lay, and there entered into a Conspiracy with Mello one of them, for the killing of the Polemarchi, and recovery of their Countries liberty. Mello and six others being let in by Phyllidas, were in womens apparel brought in to the Polemarchi as Courtezans, whilst they were drinking and celebrating the Feast of Pemus at the end of their Office, whom they stabbed with Daggers hid under their Clothes; after which they did as much to Leontides the chief revoler, as he lay in his Bed, Mello being easily admitted to him without suspicion. Then went they to the common Prison, and killing the Keeper set at liberty their Friends, when now they called the People together, and exhorted them to stand in defence of their native liberty. They presently besieged the Castle, wherein the Lacedæmonian Governour seeing the alacrity of the assailants, was forced to yield upon this condition, to go out with his Army, and for that was put to death at his return to Sparta. The Thebans then slew such as they could come by, who sided with Leontides, and, too rigorously, extended the same punishment to their Children.

30. The Ephori solicited by the Exiles that fled to Sparta, and moved by the authority of Agæslaus (who pretended a sufficient quarrel, for that Archias and Leontidas were slain) sent Cleombrotus their King against the Thebans now in the depth of Winter. He in his passage slew those whom Phyllidas had let out of Prison, to the number of one hundred and fifty, who kept watch upon the Mountains, but did nothing farther considerable, only he left Spheodrias Governour of Thebes to raise new Forces, and be a refuge to the discontented party amongst the Thebans, and so returned. Yet herewith were the Athenians exceedingly affrighted, inasmuch that one they put to death, who had conspired with the Theban Exiles, and condemned another who fled upon it. The Thebans also despaired of being being able to grapple with the Lacedæmonians, and therefore betook themselves to a politic device, which was invented by Pelopidas and Gorsidas principal of the late Conspirators. A Merchant was sent to Sphodrias, then lying at Thespe, a rash and ambitious man, to persuade him to fall upon the Piræus or Haven of Athens, as a work very grateful to his superiours, for thereby he should cut off the Athenian power at Sea, and he might be sure the Thébans would not assist them being already too much incensed. He pricked forwards by these conceits, invaded Attica as far as Elenfine; but there his Design being known, and his Soldiers unwilling to proceed any further, as not sufficiently prepared for such an enterprize, he was forced to return.

31. The Athenians cast into Prison the Spartan Ambassadors as conscious of such an unlawful act; but they utterly renounced the least knowledge of it, and promising Sphodrias should answer it with his Life, they were content to expect the Justice of the State upon him. The Ephori called him to account indeed, and yet though he appeared not, was he acquitted, to the great admiration of all men, especially because of the Author of his acquitment, which was Aegleus. For the King, though at first he refused several times to hear any thing in his behalf; yet Cleonymus the Son of Sphodrias beloved by Archidamus, made such means to him, that at length being very indulgent to his Children, he excused the matter, and saying, he held Sphodrias to be an honest man, and that the Commonwealth stood in need of such Soldiers, he got him acquitted, to his great dishonour. The Athenians hereupon out of indignation joyned themselves to the Thébans, and the Bœotians and they sent to the Cities under the command of Sparta, to draw them to their party, which they effected with most, they groaning under the Yoke of Lacedæmon. They appointed a Common-Council to be held at Athens, for carrying on the War, made up of one out of every confederate City, by which coule and other ways of self-denial, the Athenians recovered much Authority, having constituted their Captains, Timotheus the Son of Conon, Chabrias, and Callistratus.

32. The Lacedæmonians to counterwork them, took off their severity from their Subjects which had not yet revolted, whereby they kept them fast to them, and renewing military Discipline, sent Aegleus into Bœotia with a great Army; for Cleombrotus liked not the cause so well as to ingage in it, and thereupon he was forced to lay aside his excuse of superannuation (being above forty years older than one of ripe age) and submitted to the employment. The Thébans opposing themselves against him with the Athensians and others, took an Hill, where by direction of Chabrias, they received him carefully, with their Shields let down to their Knees, and their Lances advanced, which Courage of theirs as it seemed made him to retreat, and so having done great damage to their Country, and lost many of his men, he returned, leaving the Horse still to make excursions, under the command of Phæbidas. Several Skirmishes then hapned after his departure, in one of which Phæbidas himself was slain, with three hundred of his Followers. This made the Thébans take more Courage, and many then revolted to them. The Spartans sent a party to reinforce the Garrison of Thespe, and in the beginning of Spring prevailed with Aegleus to undertake another Expedition, which was performed to little purpose. He broke a Vein in his found Thigh, and the Blood caused such an Inflammation, that though opening another at his Ankle gave him some ease, yet at his return he was forced to keep his Bed for a long time, the Blood at the Orifice having ran Night and Day, till at length he swooned, which stopped the Flux. The Year after Cleombrotus was again sent out; but the Thébans and Athenians disputing the passage with him in his way, after he had lost forty men he returned. By these Conflicts the Thébans were so exercised, that they became excellent Soldiers, as Antalcidas said jeeringly to Aegleus at his return, that he was very well rewarded by them, whom without either will or knowledge he had taught to fight.

33. The Confederates being met at Lacedæmon, accused themselves of idleness, for that they had not frown with the Athenians at Sea, and being now confident they could farve them in the City, they rigged a Fleet of seventy Ships for that purpose. And hereby they for some time as it were besieged Athens, so that the Corn-Ships durst not approach, till Chabrias overthrew them in Fight, and brought in plenty of Provisions. The Lacedæmonians preparing to send new Forces into Bœotia, the Thébans desired of their Friends at Athens to invade Peloponnesus by Sea, to divert them; which they readily did, under the conduct of Timotheus, the Thébans at the same time taking several Towns upon their Borders. tans sent out one Nicolochus to Sea against Timotheus, who not staying for six Gallies of Ambracia, which he expected, with fifty five Sail set upon the Athenian Fleet consisting of sixty, and was worsted. Hereupon Timotheus erected a Trophy, but Nicolochus getting the six Ships of Ambracia, went and offered Battel again, and Timotheus not stirring erected another Trophy as a Conquerour. But Timotheus mending his Ships, made up his Fleet above seventy Vessels, and prevailed at Sea. The Thébans having got all the Bœotian Cities into their power invaded Phocis, to the Succour of which Cleombrotus was sent from Sparta, and there the Associates both of the one side and the other met; but the Athenians thinking now that the Thébans became too potent by their assistance, were desirous of a Peace. The Thébans with five hundred men went against Orchomenus, held by a Garrison of the Lacedæmonians, which falling out against them, a hot dispute ensued, wherein, although the Spartans were double the number, yet they were beaten, which thing had not happened in former Ages. This added courage to the Thébans, and their military Glory daily increasing, it now became evident that they strove for the Sovereignty of Greece. With this Year Hermæus of Methymna concluded his History of Sicily, which consisted of ten, or, according to some, of twelve Books.

34. The next being the second of the one hundred and first Olympiad, the thirtieth of the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon, Hippodamus being Archon, Artaxerxes having a design to make War upon Egypt, and to use the Græcians therein, sent to persuade them to agreement. They being weary of War consented to it, all the Cities being to be let at liberty, and the Garrisons drawn out; only the Thébans refusing to quit the Cities of Bœotia were not comprised in the League, being very confident in their good Fortune, and much encouraged by several excellent good Soldiers amongst them, the principal of which were Pelopidas, and Epaminondas, who from a poor Philosopher became the most renowned for martial affairs of all Greece. This change produced great Commotions in the several Cities, but especially in those of Peloponnesus, which by the Lacedæmonians had been subjected to Oligarchy, and now having the popular Government restored, knew not how to use it moderately, but by unjust Decrees oppressed many worthy men, driving some into Exile, and selling their Goods. Great stir especially hapned amongst the Corinthians, Megarians, and Phliæsiens, whilst those that were unjustly banished endeavoured by Force or Policy to restore themselves. Those that were for Democracy were maintained by the Athenians, and the Spartans assisting the Oligarchical faction, the Peace was but for a small time observed by these two States, whilst both favoured such as bare most affection to their form of Government, and so they renewed the War: Such was the fruit of Animomarchical Government, viz. Nothing but Sedition, Confusion, and disorder.

35. They (a) contested first about the Zacynthians, and afterwards in Coreyra, where the Spartans besieging the City, the Inhabitants almost all famished, yet sallied out, and killing Mimippus their General, with many others, the rest hearing of the coming of Epibrotus the Athenian with a great Fleet, with much Plunder as they had got, disgracefully raised their Siege and departed. At this time the Platæans having a design to commit themselves to the Protection and Alliance of Athens, the Thébans thereupon demolished the Town, and not long after did the same by Thespe. The ruine of Platæa is by (b) Pausanias referred to the next Year when Alteus was Archon, in which also (c) being the fourth of the one hundred and first Olympiad (d) such Earth quakes, and Inundations of the Sea in Peloponnesus, that Helice and Buræ, two Towns of the Athensians, were together with the Inhabitants swallowed up. Hereof Diodorus assigns several causes, laying the stress upon an injury formerly offered by them to Nephele, in refusing to lend the Ionians their Statues, to which they should have sacrificed. Five days before the ruine of these Cities, all the Mice, Weasils, Serpents, and such like Creatures came out of Helice in great numbers, and took the way which leads to Coria. The Inhabitants admiring so strange a Sight, had the next Night their Thoughts diverted by the Earth-quake, which made way for that Inundation wherein they perished, and with them ten Ships of the Lacedæmonians then lying in the Haven.

36. The next Year being the first of the one hundred and second Olympiad, wherein Damon the Thuriar got the prize, Acisthenes being Archon, Artaxerxes sent his Ambassadors into Greece again to persuade the States to an agreement. The Athenians were now grievously displeased with the Thébans for destroying Platæa and

Some of the Arcadians sent and promised them assistance, and the Eleans helped them with thirty Talents of Silver. At this time the Inhabitants of Tegea fell out amongst themselves, whilst some would have all the Arcadians meet together and choose some one man to be their Prince, but others were for living under their own Laws only, and the maintenance of their liberty. These at the first had the better of it; but by the help of the Mantineans, at length the other prevailed, and killing some, drove the rest of their Enemies to Lacedæmon, to the number of eighty.

Alas! Diodorus

42. The Lacedæmonians thought they were bound by Oath to revenge the cause of the Exiles upon the Mantineans, who by falling on them had broken theirs, and gave order to Agesilaus to invade them. They by the advice of their friends the Arcadians contained themselves within their walls newly built, and suffered him to spoil their Country, which doing with great caution and wariness, yet without any loss of honour, he returned home. At this time it must be, according to * Pausanias (who placeth it in the same year with the battle at Leuctra) that by the persuasion of Epaminondas the Arcadians built them one City to inhabit (destroying there many little Towns) which thence had the name of Megalopolis. The fame of Plato being now spread abroad, the Thebans and Arcadians sent him to desire his help, not only for the instruction of their youth, and to teach Philosophy, but also to prescribe them Laws for their Commonwealth. At first he intended to go, but asking the Ambassadors how their Superiours stood affected to an equal distribution of goods and honours, and hearing they were utterly averse to such a constitution, he thereupon refused to go to them. At this same time also Epaminondas sent into Sicily, Italy, as far as the Islands Euxerides, and all over where the old Messinians dwelt, to invite them home into their ancient Country, which was restored to them, and called after the old name Messene. Which restoration hapned two hundred and ninety eight years (reckoned from the first of the twenty eighth Olympiad) after the taking of Tra, and their banishment; in the third year of the hundred and second Olympiad, Dysicrates being Archon. During all this time of their Exile they preserved entirely their ancient Rites, and the Dorick dialect unchanged, which in our Age (saith Pausanias) by them, and only by them, is also preserved uncorrupt and natural.

43. The same year hapned such a Sedition and Maffacre at Argos, as could never be paralleld in Greece. That City was then Governed in a Democratical way; but the Orators so stirred up the People against the Nobility, that some being accused, for fear conspired against the Popular Government, to prevent their own ruine. Being hereupon suspected and examined, some fearing to be tortured made away themselves, and one in the midst of his pains accused thirty of the most eminent in the City. The common sort giving credit to this accusation, put all those to death unheard, and confiscated their goods, and then many others being accused who were wealthy, they put them all to death, and in this manner made an end of sixteen hundred. The Orators themselves now were afraid, left in this to general a Maffacre they themselves also might unexpectedly miscarry, and therefore ceased from their calumnies; which being understood by the multitude, as though they now forsook them, they put as many of them to death as they could find in the City, the vengeance of God thus repaying them.

44. The next year, the Lacedæmonians sent one thousand of their Citizens, and five hundred Argives and Boeotian Exiles, under the command of Polytropus into Arcadia, who there fortified Orchomenus, but meeting with Lycomedes the Mantinean, General of the Arcadians, he was slain in battle with two hundred men. The Arcadians after this desiring help of the Athenians in vain, procured it of the Boeotians, who dispatched into Peloponnesus Epaminondas and Gelopidas, to whom the other Boeotarchs of their own accord left the command of the Army. When they were come into Arcadia, all the Confederates made up the number of fifty thousand men; but yet the Thebans were very unwilling to invade Lacedæmonia. They considered that the Country was well fortified, and that the Lacedæmonians terrible every where would fight more desperately at their own doors. But the other pressing them much to it, and some bringing word how the borders were desolate of defence, and offering to conduct them into it, at length they invaded it in four several bodies, and bearing down all opposition, met together at Sallasia, whence they marched for Sparta it self, burning and consuming all things in their passage. Six hundred years had the Doves now inhabited Lacedæmonia, nia, and for all this time not an Enemy had dared to appear in it, so that this unusual sight caused great tumults in the City, the women having never before seen as much as the smoke of War, nor the men able to endure a Siege. Agesilaus contained them within, bestowing them as he found convenient in several places, for the defence of the City, which had no other walls than the bodies of it's Inhabitants: He was much moved at the arrogance of the Enemy, who challenged him by name, as the cause of these diffentions, to come out and fight; yet so contained himself, as taking great pains for the preservation of his Country, he shewed clearly, that if he had not been, the City could not have continued.

45. The Boeotians laboured to provoke the Spartans to fight, bidding them either do it, or confess themselves to be inferior to their Enemies; to which they answered, that when they law occasion, they would not fear to try a battle with them. They left then the City, and making great waite of all Lacedæmonia, returned into Arcadia. The Spartans in the time of this their extremity, had promised liberty to such of their Slaves as would fight for them, and sent to Athens to procure assistance from that State, which the Ambassadors procured to be decreed, especially by this motive, that the Lacedæmonians had saved that City, at the end of the Peloponnesian War, when the Thebans were earnest for its utter destruction. They made choice of Sphicrates for the General in this Expedition, who otherwise a man of excellent conduct, yet is judged by Xenophon to have been far overseen in the management of this employment. For having loitered at Corinth, and the Thebans being about to return home, he ought to have fortified Cenchreae, where they had the most convenient passage, and when he sent to spie whether they had passed Oeneus, he sent both all his own and the Corinthian Horse, whereas few had been sufficient to spie, and better for a speedy retreat, and hereby he lost no fewer than twenty men, and the Thebans returned without any great molestation. The Lacedæmonians having got four thousand Auxiliaries, besides one thousand Slaves newly manumitted, and many men out of the neighbouring Towns, thought themselves then able to try a battle, yet convenient for them first to send to the Thebans about a peace. They offered it might one these terms; that Messene should be restored by them, and the Lacedæmonians left to their liberty. Most inclined to receive these terms, till Archidamus rising up, said, that peace was not to be received upon such unequal conditions by them, who were wont to give and not to receive it; that Messene was justly destroyed three hundred years before, and could not be restored, but to the great distress and damage of the Lacedæmonians.

Sphicrates sent to assist the Spartans.His conduct is censured by Xenophon.

46. But Epaminondas having to his great honour restored Messene fully (the grounds being divided, and all things done) after eighty five days spent in this Expedition, returned home, and being in his way molested by Sphicrates, pursued him to the walls of Athens. But there was a Law at Thebes, which made it capital for any one to retain the chief command longer than was in that case provided by the constitutions of the City, new Magistrates being to be chosen the beginning of the new month Bacchus. This Epaminondas knowing to have been made for the good of the City, would not keep it to the damage thereof, but continued his command four months longer than his Commission warranted. After his return, he and his Colleagues were accused, and he permitted them to lay all the blame upon himself. They being hereby freed, no man expected any defence from him, as having nothing to say for himself. He appearing, denied nothing that his adversaries objected, confessed what his Colleagues said to be true, and refused not to undergo what the Law inflicted, only he made one request to them: that this might be written upon his Tomb: Epaminondas was punished with death by the Thebans, because he constrained them at Leuctra to vanquish the Lacedæmonians, whom, before he was General, none of the Boeotians durst once look in the face, and for that in one battle he not only saved the Thebans from ruine, but also restored liberty to all Greece; and brought matters to that pass, that the Thebans fell upon Sparta, and the Lacedæmonians had enough to do to preserve themselves, and left not off till Messene being restored, he besieged their City. Having said this the People affected with joy set up a laughter, and none of the Judges dared to pass sentence.

In the same year, according to Diodorus, but the next, according to Xenophon, Epaminondas was sent again into Peloponnesus to the assistance of the Arcadians, Argives, and Eleans, who afresh had made War upon the Lacedæmonians. selves on these Terms: That each should command the Army five days in their course, which before was solely left to the Spartans. The Athenians hearing of the coming of Epaminondas, sent Chabrias with an Army to stop his passage. He coming to Corinth, with the Lacedæmonians and other Allies, made up an Army of twenty thousand, and then all joining together fortified the passage into Peloponnesus, making a Ditch and a Wall across the Isthmus from Cenchrea to Læneus. But Epaminondas observing at what place the Guards were weakest, there with some difficulty brake through, harazed the Country, had Sicyon and other places delivered up to him, but coming to Corinth was gallantly repulsed by Chabrias, who falling out of the City, and getting advantageous ground, not only sustained his charge, but did good execution upon the Assailants. At this time two thousand Gaules and Spaniards were sent by Dionysius Tyrant of Sicilie to the aid of the Lacedæmonians, who arriving at Corinth, the Græcians to try their Valour led them out against the Enemy. They behaved themselves very well, did good service against the Boeotians, many of whom and their Allies they slew, for which receiving great commendations and rewards besides, they returned in the latter end of Summer into Sicilie.

the Thebans.

48. The Thebans being returned home, the Athenians conceived indignation against them, through the complaints of Lycomedes the Mantinean, who urged it was an unworthy thing for the Arcadians, being more noble (as the only ancient Inhabitants of their Country) and more deserving, to be commanded by the other, and follow them in the War. Being much puffed up with such conceits, the Thebans began to be alienated from them, and the Eleans bore them Malice, because they could not obtain of them the Towns which the Lacedæmonians had taken from them. Things being at this pass, came Phyliscus of Hydus, sent from Arioherxanes the Persian Satrap, with much Money, to persuade the States to Peace. The Thebans yet would not come to any conclusion, alleging that Messene ought to be exempted from the jurisdiction of the Spartans, with which he being offended, not enduring that old pretences should be again revived, he left two thousand men already paid to the aid of the Lacedæmonians, and returned into Asia. The Arcadians having chosen Lycomedes their General, sent him into Læconia with an Army, where he took by storm Pallene, and therein put to the Sword three hundred of the Lacedæmonian Garrison Soldiers. To return the like unto them the year following (the first of the one hundred and third Olympiad, wherein Pythostratus the Athenian was Victor) Archidamus was sent into Arcadia with the Confederates, and a new supply of men sent from Dionysius. He took Caryæ, and put all therein to the Sword, and going on in his attempts, Cissidas the General of the Sicilian Forces, pretending he had staid his full time for him by Dionysius, would needs be gone; but in his way was circumvented by the Messenians, and was forced to crave aid of Archidamus.

Megalopolis
now built according to Diodorus.

49. He hasted to relieve him, and in his march the Arcadians and Argives opposed themselves, whom charging with great resolution, he got a most famous Victory, killing ten thousand of his Enemies without the loss of one man; so that as the Priests of Dodona had sung (that it should be a Fight without Tears to the Lacedæmonians) yet the Message being come to Sparta, Agesilaus, the Senators, and the Ephors, are all said to have wept for joy. As this success revived the Spirits of the Spartans, which had been almost extinct by the Battle at Leuctra, so, as Diodorus telleth us, the Arcadians now fearing their in-roads, for their better security built them one great City, twenty of the Median and Parthian Villages being taken in for the site thereof, though Paulanias will have Megalopolis built two years before. The Thebans and Eleans only rejoiced in the misfortune of their Friends the Arcadians, as tending to the humbling of them. The Thebans casting much in their Heads how to obtain the principality of all Greece, resolved upon sending an Ambassage to the Persian King to contract a straight League and Alliance with him, and assembling the Confederates they pretended a necessity thereof, because Eurycles the Lacedæmonian was now with the King in behalf of that State. They sent Pelopidas, with others for the Arcadians, Eleans, and Argives: The Athenians also understanding hereof sent Timagoras and Leon. Pelopidas being very famous even in Asia for his Valour, by his demeanour got all the favour from the rest. He urged the King with the merits of the Thebans, who had never of all Greece born Arms against him, or his Ancestors, either of old in the Median War, or of late in assistance to Agesilaus, and he extolled their Valour, shewing that the reason why the Arcadians were of late overthrown by the Lacedæmonians, was because of their absence. For the truth hereof he appealed to Timagoras the Athenian, whom being at odds with his Collegue, he drew off to his party. He obtained of Artaxerxes what he demanded, viz. that Messene should be exempted from the Jurisdiction of the Lacedæmonians, the Athenians should abstain from the Sea, and all the other Cities be left to their own Laws. Lastly, that the Thebans should be esteemed the near Friends and Allies of the Empire.

credit by his Ambassie.

50. This employment got Pelopidas abundance of Credit (who not long after was slain in a victorious Battle, fought in the behalf of the Thebians against Alexander the Tyrant) but Timagoras returning home received a great present from the Persian, and being acculed by his Collegue of siding with Pelopidas was put to death. The Thebans, though they had got what they desired of the King, yet their design came to nothing, for the commissioners of the Cities first refused to take the Oath of this new League, and then most of the Cities themselves after the example of Corinth, the answer of which was, that there was no need of this new Engagement. This Plot then of Pelopidas having not taken good effect, Epaminondas thought of another to reduce the Arcadians and Allies to Obedience; and that was, first by subduing the Acheans, to which purpose he went again into Peloponnesus. He easily effected this, and receiving an engagement from them to continue faithful to the Thebans, returned, for which being much blamed by the Arcadians, and the rest of that faction, Governours were sent from Thebes into the several Cities, who bringing in the popular Government, thereupon drove away many of the principal men, who uniting themselves, raised again upon their several Cities, and then stood no more Neuters, but openly declared for the Lacedæmonians. So this second device of the Thebans came to nothing, and the Arcadians were pressed both by the Lacedæmonians and Acheans. At this time Euphron the Sicyonian, a man of great power in his Country, persuaded the People to bring in the popular Government, which done, and he with others being chosen Prætors, he murdered some of his Collegues, expelled the rest, and openly established a Tyranny. The Associates he put off by doing them pleasures, through which the Argives being encouraged, together with him fell upon the Phliansians, and brought them to great straits, because of their faithfulness to the Lacedæmonians, where in they excelled beyond Precedent, no adversity nor any advantage being able to affright or allure them from it, as is largely discoursed by Xenophon. The Athenians sent Chares with relief to them, who overcame the Argives in two fights, and restrained their violent attempts against them.

51. But Arctas the Symphalian, General of the Arcadians, judging things not to be as Sicyon as they should, seized upon the Castle there, and forced Euphron to leave the Town, and give up the Haven to the Lacedæmonians. Yet a Sedition following in the Town he took occasion thereat, and repossessed himself, joining with the people against the Nobility, but the Castle being held by a Garrison of Thebans, he thought there was no long continuing without their leave, and so taking money with him, went to Thebes, to procure the good-will of the people there. Thither several of his adherents followed him, to withstand his design, and finding that he was upon the Magistrates and Senate, to hinder the progress of the business, killed him in the Castle, at such time as the Senate was sitting there. One of them taking all the fault upon himself, made such a discourse in his own defence, by telling what the Thebans themselves had lately done in the like case, and by other arguments, that Euphron was pronounced justly slain, and he was absolved. Yet being carried to Sicyon he was honorably buried in the Forum, and worshipped by the people as one of their greatest Benefactors. The Phliansians now had by the assistance of Chares taken Thymia, which was fortified against them by the Sicyonians, but their Exiles had seized upon Oropus; the Sicyonians and Arcadians recovered the Haven at Sicyon, and no body assisted the Athenians at Oropus, but all forsook them, so that it was committed to the trust of the Thebans till the controversy about it should be decided. Lycomedes seeing them dissatisfied with their Allies, drew the Athenians to enter into society with the Arcadians. The Conditions were, that the Athenians, in case Arcadia was invaded, should send Succours of Horse, without being constrained to invade Læconia.

52. The Athenians as soon as this was done, cast in their Heads how they might make Corinth their own, through the persuasion of Demetrios; which being known there, their Soldiers were dismissed, and the Alliance broken betwixt them.

This

SECT. 4.

This made the Corinthians, who now had gotten so new and potent Enemies, look about them for their own security; and to this end levying all the force they could, they made also their peace with Thebes, in which they would have the Lacedæmonians concluded, saying, they were constrained to this accommodation; but the Lacedæmonians giving them, and all other their Confederates leave to provide for themselves (which was accepted by the Philisians and others) said they would persist in the War, and commit the Issue to God, being resolved never to consent that: Messene, which they had received from their Ancestors, should be taken from them. The condition of this Peace was only that each City should enjoy its own; for the Corinthians flatly refused to enter into a Society of Arms, because they would not offend those that had well deserved of them, but presently a contention was revived betwixt the Philisians and Argives about Thymia, which was seized on, and held by the later, notwithstanding all that could be objected. At the same time were twelve ships, under the Command of Timocrates, sent to the aid of the Lacedæmonians by Dionysius the younger (who now had succeeded his dead father) which they used in the forming of Schafia, and then the Fleet returned back into Sicily. At this time Ariarxes sent once more to mediate about a peace, which was submitted to by the Cities, and so the Læonian, or (as it is also called) the Boeotian War ended, after it had continued above five years.

Messene procured another peace.

53. But in the very next year such sparks were kindled, (first betwixt the Eleians and Arcadians) as brake out at length into a mighty flame. Lasion a Castle of Triphylia first belonged to the Eleians, but being in the possession now of them, and another while of the Arcadians, continual controversies were moved about it. The latter now having it in their hands, the Eleians, by means of the Arcadian Exiles with them, seized upon it. This being taken in great disdain by the Arcadians, they procured help from Athens, and recovered it by force; after which they overthrew the Eleians, and waisted their Territories to the City Gates. This put them upon craving aid of the Lacedæmonians, and desiring them to invade Arcadia, who accordingly sent Archidamus the year after the first action at Lasion. He took Cromnus, and therein leaving a Garrison returned; but after his departure the Arcadians recovering the place, and going into Elis, gave the management of the solemnities of the one hundred and fourth Olympiad now drawing on, to the Pileans, who by old and fabulous arguments pretended it once to have belonged unto them. For this purpose they seized on Olympia before-hand, and going on when the time was come in the management of the exercises, the Eleians with all their strength fell in upon them, and with incredible boldness lay about them, that they put the Arcadians to flight, and though they could not keep the place, yet with great honour retreated to their City, having never before been at all accounted of for valour. This Olympiad, because the Pileans managed it by force, was not registred in the Annals of the Eleians, neither is certain who overcame in the course, Phocides the Athenian being named by Diodorus, but Eubotus the Cyrenæan by Pausanias, in the second of his Eliacs.

54. At this time Epaminondas labouring all manner of ways to get the Sovereignty of Greece for his Country-men; perswaded them as a means hereto first to obtain the Dominion of the Seas. He shewed it was an easie thing for those who were strongest at land, to obtain by instancing in the Lacedæmonians, who though in the War with Xerxes they furnished out but ten ships for two hundred of the Athenians, yet for their power on land were obeyed by them. By this, and other arguments, he got them to ordain that one hundred Gallies should be provided, and that the Rhodiens, Chians, and Byzantians should be invited to joyn with them in these preparations. He himself going with a little Force to these Cities, induced them to side with the Thebans, and so terrified Laches the Athenian, who intended to cross his design, that though he commanded a strong Fleet, yet did he quit these parts. During his absence, some of the Theban Exiles having a great desire to change the Government into an Aristocracy, drew into their plot three hundred horse-men of the Orchomenians, who when they were about to execute their design, it was revealed by some principal contrivers to the Boeotarchs. The Thebans had conceived a grudge against the Orchomenians of a very long date, ever since that City having paid Tribute to them formerly, was exempted from it by Hercules. Having now then an opportunity to vent their malice, they first put to death the three hundred horse-men, then taking the Town, they put to the sword all the men, sold the Woman and Children, and so utterly destroyed Orchomenus. This cruelty was utterly detested by Epaminondas, who said, if he had been been present, he would have in no case suffered such wickedness to be committed by the Thebans.

55. The Arcadians having the Olympian Temple in their power, the Magistrates converted the money thereof to the paying of their Epariti, being the strength of their Army. This the Mantineans first protested against as Sacrilege, and sent the money which was due from them for the payment of the Soldiers, which being taken as an affront from the other, they called the Mantinean Magistrates before the Council of the ten thousand, who refusing to appear, they went to fetch them by force, but being repulsed, at length others in the Council appeared for them, being of their opinion, that the money was not to be touched, which would brand them for ever with a note of infamy. This was decreed by the Council, which the great ones seeing, and apprehending in what danger they were, sent to the Thebans to tell them, that except they would come in time Arcadia would wholly revolt to the Lacedæmonians. The most sober men amongst the Arcadians hereupon perswaded the Council to send to the Thebans, to protest against the coming down of their Army un-sent for; and by restoring to the Eleians the Temple, to make peace with them. All took the oath of the League, and amongst the rest the Governour of Tegea, who lay in Garrison with three hundred Thebans; but the great ones who feared to be called to account for the money, prevailed with him to lay hold upon the Mantineans and other Arcadians, who at Tegea were making merry for the peace. But the Mantineans making demand of their Citizens, promising if they had done amiss they should appear before the Council, the Theban General was at a stand, knowing not what to do, and at length dismissed the prisoners, purging himself by saying, he heard the Lacedæmonians were about to invade Arcadia, and that some of the Arcadians had designed to betray Tegea into their hands.

56. Though they believed him not, as knowing the contrary, yet they dismissed him, but sent to Thebes to accuse him as worthy of death, for attempting a matter so contrary to the good understanding betwixt the States. But Epaminondas excused him, laying the blame upon the Arcadians, who having drawn the Thebans into the War, would offer to make peace without their consent, and thereby were guilty of Treachery: and he plainly declared, that the Thebans would march into Arcadia, and there assist their Friends. The Mantineans and others understanding this, sent to Athens and Sparta to desire aid, laying open the design of the Thebans plainly to be this: To weaken Peloponnesus, and bring it all into subjection to themselves. They jealous of this, entered into a League with them, wherein it was provided, that each State should have the command over the Army in their own dominions. Whilst this was a doing, Epaminondas marched from Thebes, leading with him, besides the Boeotians, some Thessalian Horse, and Soldiers out of Eubœa. When he came to Nemea where he staid a little, having a great desire to meet with the Athenians; but understanding that they passed by Sea into Peloponnesus, he arose and moved towards Tegea. Having notice in his way that Agellæus with the whole power of Lacedæmon was come into Arcadia, and that the City must needs thereupon be desolate, he marched in all haste thither, and had become absolute Master of it, but that by meer divine Providence (as Xenophon himself acknowledgeth) a certain Græcian gave notice of his intention to Agellæus, who sent word in all haste to Sparta, willing them to stand upon their guard, with promise to be with them as speedily as possible.

57. Archidamus his son being there left, set the old men and boys upon the Houses to annoy the Thebans with stones, and disposed of of those that were fit to fight, in the several places of the City, that though Epaminondas had continued his march all night, yet found he that his design was betrayed, and such was the opposition he found, that although he chose the steepest descent into the Town, to have the upper ground, yet was he repelled, the Lacedæmonians losing the most in their too long pursuits. Then understanding the Lacedæmonian and Arcadian Forces to be all coming to relieve Sparta, he thought it not wisdom to hazard a battle with them all; but judging that Mantineans would be left naked, and at this time of the year the Inhabitants would be much abroad in the fields about their Corn and their Cattel at pasture, he thought it fit to try if he could surprise them all, and sent before the Horse for that purpose. At this time it happened well for the Mantineans, that six thousand Athenians under the command of Hagelochus were come through the Isthmus into the City, who upon their desire, notwithstanding they should have to do with such Horse as exceeded theirs theirs in number, and the best esteemed of in all Greece, resolved to do their utmost in their behalf. In the engagement they had the better of it, and thereby preserved all that the Mantineans had without their walls. Epaminondas after this thinking with himself that he must be gone within a few days, the term of his commission being almost expired, was full of various thoughts. If he should leave those, for the aid of whom he was sent, to be besieged by the Enemy, he saw he should lose the honour he formerly had obtained, especially feeling he had been repulsed at Sparta by so small a number, and now also had miscarried at Mantineia: and he considered that by this Expedition of which himself was author, he had given occasion to the Lacedæmonians, Arcadians, Acheans, Eleans, and Athenians, to enter into a straight League of offence and defence. From these reasons he concluded he could not in honour depart without a battle, in which if he overcame, he should make amends for all, and if he should die, such a death could not but be glorious, which should be undergone in an endeavour to make his Country Mistress of Peloponnesus.

58. Ere long the Armies of the Lacedæmonians and Mantineans appeared, confronting, with their allies, of twenty thousand Foot, and about two thousand Horse. To the Boeotians were assistants the Tegeans, and such other Arcadians as were most powerful and wealthy, the Argives, Eubœans, the Thessalians Horse which the Thebans brought, the Messenians, Sicyonians, and other Peloponnesians; the number of all which amounted to thirty thousand Foot, and little fewer than three thousand Horse. This is much admired by Xenophon, that Epaminondas should so discipline his Soldiers, that neither night nor day they should shun any labour, refuse to undergo any danger, to be contented with any kind of provision, and very ready to obey all orders. When he had ranged his men in order of battle, he led them not straight on against the Enemy, but fetching a compass towards the Mountains of Tegea, and made as though he would there pitch his Tents. This rendered the Enemy secure, which he well understanding, formed his Battalia like a wedge, thereby to break them sooner, and led with speed against them, who now were all to seek, and in a confusion, some hasting to bridle their Horses, others to buckle on their harness, and all in a condition rather to suffer than act any thing. And left the Athenians should relieve their Companions from the left wing, he placed a Party of Horse and Foot in the hills to keep them in awe, by being continually ready to fall upon their rear.

Mantineia wherein Epaminondas was wounded.

59. His expectation was not crossed, for on what part he fell he carried all before him, the Enemy not daring to stand; but rushing more violently amongst them, the Lacedæmonians taking notice of him, flocked to him, and laid at him amain with Darts, some of which declining, and fencing himself from others, those that stuck in his body he took thence and retorted. Whilst he heroically thus contended for the Victory, he received a wound from one Anticritas a Spartan, who gave him so mortal a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the iron and a piece of the troncion in his breast. By the vehemency of the wound he sank down, and then ensued a most bitter contest about him: but the Thebans inflamed with wrathful indignation at this sad mischance, with great slaughter compelled their Enemies to give back; but knew not how to improve the Victory. For neither Foot nor Horse pursued them flying, but continued still in the same place; and at length went off carelessly, inasmuch that many of the Foot came into the hands of the Athenians. Which for falling out, another thing hapned than men generally had expected. For almost all Greece being here gathered together, one State against another, in two factions, every one supposed, that when they should once come to fight, they that overcame would obtain the Dominion over the rest who should be forced to submit to their yoke: But God so poysled the affairs, saith Xenophon, that both sides, as if they had overcome, erected a Trophy, not being hindered by each other. Both sides also as Conquerours gave up the slain, and as Conquered received their dead by composition. And whereas both sides said they had the better of it, neither obtained thereby either Country, City, or Dominion, other than they before enjoyed; but a greater disturbance thereupon followed in Greece. So much for these matters saith our Author; as for what is behind, perhaps some other will take care to commit them to writing, and so he endeth his History with this battle; though he lived almost three years after it, as we have it from Laertius. Anaximenes also of Lampascus, who began his History with the beginning of the gods and mankind (and therein in twelve Books almost comprehended all the affairs of the Greeks and Barbarians),

Whereas with

Sect. 4.

Barbarians, ) finisheth it with the Battle at Mantineia, and the death of Epaminondas. So did Philistus his History which he wrote of Dionysius the younger in two Books.

60. Epaminondas being carried alive into his Tent, the Philicians affirmed that as soon as the Dart should be drawn out of his body he would die. He then called for Diaphantus to declare him General of the Army; but it being answered he was slain, he bade them fend for Solaidas, but it being answered that he was dead also, he advised the Thebans to make peace, whilst with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the Office of a General. Understanding of his approaching end, he inquired of his Armour-bearer if his Shield was safe, (which to have lost was a great dishonour) It being answered it was, he asked which side had the Victory; answer being made the Boeotians, then said he, It's time for me to die, and comforting his friends who mourned that he should die childless with this answer, that he left behind him two daughters, the eldest of Leutras and Mantineia, which should propagate his fame to all posterity he thereupon caused the Dart to be drawn out, and so expired. This was the end of the worthiest Soldier that ever Greece brought forth, and hardly to be paralleld in any other Country, all the Virtues which in others were but singular having concentrated and united themselves in him. In strength both of body and mind; in Eloquence, Justice, Temperance, Wisdom, Magnanimity, and Sincerity, he excelled all men, and so far in Military skill, the art of a General, and in valour, that he could not adequately be called a Valiant, Politick, Wary, Bountiful, Industrious, or Prudent Captain; all these Titles and many more being due unto him. His modesty was incredible, shewing it self especially in this, that after the Victory of Leutras, and many other rare achievements, he refused not to go in the Expedition into Thessaly, in quality of a private Soldier. He was grave, yet affable and courteous, as a means to all those virtues, having great insight into all parts of Philosophy and Learning, being therein instructed by Lycis the Tarentine, a Pythagorean. But * enough will be said in his commendation, if this be added, that the City Thebes before the birth and after the death of Epaminondas was ever subject to the command of others; but as long as he had to do in the management of the affairs thereof, was the head of all Greece; from which may be gathered, that this man was of more consequence than the whole City.

61. For with Epaminondas all the strength of the Theban Commonwealth was extinct, as if he had not only died, but all the rest of the Citizens with him, who as before him they did nothing memorable, so now after were famous for nothing but their overthrows and disasters. After this battle of Mantineia, all the Græcians being tired out with War, entered into a League offensive and defensive together, out of which Aegilæus would have excluded the Messenians. But Antaxerxes stood for them, as having Territories as large and fruitful as the Laconians, whereupon the Lacedæmonians burning with an implacable grudge against them, would not subscribe, and alone by themselves refused to be comprehended in the League, hoping still to recover Messenia. This reflected something upon Aegilæus, who out of an insatiable thirst after War; had by his utmost endeavour hundred the union of Greece; and the burying of publick quarrels. And he seemed to increase the infamy, by undertaking an Expedition thortly after to Aegypt, though it was by his service in his decrepit old age, to get some money for the supply of the now very poor and exhausted State. For it appeared a thing unseemly, for the best man in Greece, and one who had filled the world with his fame, to go serve a mean man, and a Traytor, and venture his life, credit and all, for a little gain, when because of his old age, he had refused the Office of General at home, and in his own Country, though for the liberty of Greece. But he thought nothing too much wherein he might serve the Commonwealth, and in this respect undervalued his own honour, and having served in Aegypt in a condition far unworthy of him, after he had received two hundred and thirty talents of Silver as a reward from Nectanebus, died in his return, when he had lived eighty four and reigned forty one years. A most excellent Captain, in whom Nature inwardly made amends for that wherein outwardly he had been deficient, most ambitious of glory, and yet of exceeding great humility, which he shewed in his house, and in his constant conversation. Though his justice was overruled by his passion in the business of the Theban War, yet generally he held it most sacred, and as a punishment for his default therein, that great Glory whereby he even reigned over Greece till then, was afterwards (together with the splendor of the Lacedæmonian greatness) much eclipsed by the rising Fortune of Epaminondas.

62. Antaxerxes King of Persia, and Agellans of Sparta, died both in the same year, and the next after the death of Epaminondas. And the same year the Peace of Greece was again broken by some Arcadians, who having been translated out of the neighbouring places into Megalopolis, took occasion at some words of the League (which gave leave to all to return home) to quit the City and return to their old Habitations. The other Megalopolitans endeavoured to reduce them by force, and thence infused a great controversy, they calling in to their help the Mantineans and the rest all of the Arcadians and Eleans. The Megalopolitans that sent to the Athenians for aid, who sent them three thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse, under the command of Pammenes. He with this Force took some of the Towns, and terrified others into composition, and so reduced them all to Megalopolis. The Year following Alexander the Phærean Tyrant subdued several of the Cyclades and took thence abundance of Captives. The Athenian Garrison commanded by Leosthenes opposed him in Peparethus, whereupon he attacked the Athenian Gallies, and took them, together with one belonging to Peparethus, and six hundred Prisoners. The Athenians enraged hereat, condemned Leosthenes, and sent Chares with a Fleet into those parts, who spending his time in scaring the Enemies, but oppressing the Confederates, thereby contracted an ill name. For going to Coreyra he there caused such a Sedition, as could not be ended but in the ruin of many, and committed other things which much tended to the disgrace of those that sent him. With this Year Diodorus concludeth his fifteenth Book, having, according to his promise, related such things as hapned before the Reign of Philip King of Macedonia, and such, as together with other affairs of the Greeks related by others, shew that peace, security, and order, were things little akin to Antimonarchical Government.

Learned Men during this period.

Hippocrates.

63. Of Learned Men Contemporary with this Period, in the first place is to be remembered Hippocrates native of the Island Cos, Prince of all Physicians. He was the Son of Heraclides and Phanarete, the twentieth in descent from Hercules, and the nineteenth from Æsculapius. Some have written that he was born in the first Year of the eightieth Olympiad. But a certain passage mentioned in his life of his curing Perdicas of an Erotick Fever, argueth him at this time to have been famous. This Perdicas King of Macedonia (who having reigned twenty eight Years according to Eusebius, or according to others fifty three, died about the third of the ninety third Olympiad) fell in love with Phils his Father Alexander's Concubine, but Modesty forced him to conceal his Grief, till he fell into a Consumption and languished. Hippocrates by the motion of his Eyes found out the cause of the Distemper, and told Phils it was in her power to save the King's life, whereupon he was willing though with the impairment of her own credit to redeem it. The like Story is told of Erasistratus the Physician, who discovered that Antiochus the Son of Selenus was in love with his Fathers Concubine, which Galen* mentioneth, adding that he had made the same discovery in a certain Woman.

64. Hippocrates grew so famous in his Art, that Antaxerxes Longimanus hearing of him, sent for him, with large offers to come and cure his Army, then seized on by the Plague. But he said it was not fit for him to touch any Persian Gold, or cure the Barbarians who were Enemies to the Greeks. The Letters of intercourse between the Persians and him, are amongst others yet extant. Having lived as some said eighty five Years, but as others ninety, or one hundred and four, or one hundred and nine, he died amongst the Larissæans, in the first of the ninety fourth Olympiad. He left two Sons, Theſalus and Draco; but the Fruit of his Brain hath been far more effectual for the propagating of his name to all posterity, wherein he hath not only been a benefactor to the mystery of Medicine by his writings, but also by his religious care of the Integrity of those who should profess it. For he framed an Oath to be taken by all that entered into his School, which for his honour, and the shame of those who have more reason to be convinced of their Duty, together with the information of the ignorant, it is convenient to exemplify.

His Oath.

65. I swear by Apollo the Physician, and Æsculapius, and Hygia; and call all the Gods and Goddesses to witness, that to the utmost of my strength and judgement I shall observe what now I swear and covenant by writing. Namely that I will esteem as my Parents my Master who taught me this Art, and thankfully communicate to, and supply him with all things necessary both for sustenance and convenience, as also account of his Issue at mine own brethren, and if they desire to learn the Art, teach them without any Wages or Contract. That I will communicate the Precepts, and what I have heard, and the whole discipline to mine own Children, to his who taught me, and my Scholars who have given their Names and Faith in this Oath, and none else whatsoever. That I shall also to my utmost Power and Judgement prescribe an wholesome course to the Sick, and defend them from all harm and Injury. Neither through the procurement of any will I give, or cause to be given, any deadly Medicament. Neither in like manner will I procure any Woman to miscarry of her burthen; but preserve my Life and Age always chaste and pure from all Wickedness. Neither will I cut any of the Stone, but leave this Work to be done by those Chirurgians who are skilful in it. If I come into any House I will do it for the Health of the Sick, banishing all suspicion of injury, or Corruption, especially as to the sibbings of Venerary both towards Women and Men, free Persons and Slaves. Whatsoever things I shall see or hear, either in administering Physick or otherwise in common intercourse, which I think ought not to be told abroad, I will conceal them. Now if I shall religiously observe this Oath, and in no case break it, let me live in great esteem always an happy Life amongst all Men, and reap ample Fruit from mine Art. But if I break it and forswear myself, may the contrary happen to me. Much skill in Physick therefore corrupteth not the conversation; for though a little Philosophy may occasion Atheism, yet a great deal is an Antidote against it, not suffering a man to rest in second causes; but discovering a necessity of looking higher. But more concerning this, as also to the praise of this excellent person, may be said in a particular account of the original, cause, professors, succession, progress and matter of the art of Medicine.

66. Besides Hippocrates, there lived at this time (a) Democritus of Adera the Philosopher, who died in the same Year, and was well known to him, having always laughed at the folly of men. Four Years after, (b) Socrates the Athenian, the Father of Ethicks, was made drink Poyson for speaking against plurality of Gods and the Superstition of his Country-men; Anaxus having first procured Aristophanes the Poet, and then Melitus to accuse him. But afterwards the Athenians repenting of what they had done, in way of mourning forbade all publick Exercisels, and then animadverting upon his accusers, condemned Melitus to death, and the rest to Exile. (c) Plato at this time being twenty eight years old, and having heard Socrates eight Years, went to Megara to learn the Mathematics of Euclid, who now also flourished. The Year after, (d) Sophocles died six years after, Euripides the Prince of Tragick Poets. At this time also flourished (e) Cæphas the Physician often mentioned before, who concluded his History in the third year of the ninety sixth Olympiad, (f) Aristotle Father of Peripatetick Philosophy was born at Stagira a City of Macedonia, in the first year of the ninety ninth Olympiad. In the third year after, (g) Demosthenes the famous Orator. (h) Eudoxus of Cnidus, a famous Astrologer and Geometrician, flourished about the one hundred and third Olympiad, who (i) found out the supposed motion of the Stars from West to East, unknown to the Greeks in the time of Democritus. Zeno the Citician, Father of the Stoicks, was born in the third year of the one hundred and fourth Olympiad. And we must not forget Thucydides, nor Xenophon the Scholar of Socrates, and equal to Plato, with whom he exercised some emulation. He was a great Philosopher; the greatest master of eloquence in his time, inasmuch that for the sweetness of his stile he got the name of Attick Muse; and so great a Soldier, that his retreat with the Greeks out of Persia after the death of Cyrus, to one who duly weigheth all circumstances, will appear to have surpassed the exploits of Alexander the Great.

courteous deportment, bare up the Spirits of his People. He amended military Discipline, and instituted the Macedonian Phalange. Understanding the Athenians to have a great desire to recover Amphipolis, and to have Argæus established King, he left that City to its own Liberty. The Paonians and the King of Thrace he bought off with money, and overthrew Argæus at Methone assisted by Manti- as the Athenians, by which Victory he mightily encouraged his men.

7. The year after he made Peace with the Athenians, who readily accepted of it, because he was content to quit Amphipolis, giving him great commendations also for his clemency, in that he had suffered the Remainers of their Army at Methone to depart with their Lives and Liberty into Attica when he had them at his mercy. Being thus freed from the Athenian War, hearing that Agis King of the Paonians was dead, he invaded, and brought them into Subjection to himself. Then entered he the Country of the Illyrians with about ten thousand Foot, and six hundred Horse, whose King Bardylis sent to treat with him, offering that each should retain such places as they already held; but he returned answer, that though he was also desirous of Peace, yet would he admit of no terms, except the Illyrians would quit all the Cities which belonged to his Kingdom. Bardylis then met him with a strong Army, and a great and bloody Battle was with great animosity on both sides fought, wherein at length Philip had the Victory, and the Illyrians having lost above seven thousand men, were forced to relinquish all places belonging to Macedonia.

8. After he had brought under all the Illyrians as far as the Lake Lychnitis, and made an honourable Peace with them, he returned into Macedonia with great Fame. The year after, for that the Inhabitants of Amphipolis had several ways provoked him, and ministered occasion of Quarrels, he went against them with a great Force, and having cast down the Wall with his battering Rams, entered the City, whence banishing all his Enemies he granted indemnity to the rest. This place being very conveniently sited for his occasions in Thrace, much conducing to the progress of his affairs. For hereupon he presently took Pydna, and to ingratiate himself with the Olynthians (the friendship of whom was very necessary for such as would grow great) having taken Potidea, he gave up Pydna with the Grounds belonging to it into their hands. Then going to Grenida, he enlarged this Town with an accession of new Inhabitants, and called it after himself Philippi. Here were rich Mines of Gold, which having been formerly neglected he now so far advanced as to bring him in yearly a Revenue of one thousand Talents, which mightily tended to the advancement of his Affairs, and the Majesty of his Kingdom, for now stamped he that piece of Golden Coin, called the Philippick, raised great Forces, and afterwards with Bribes drew many Græcians to betray their Country. But he proceeded in his Affairs with more confidence and freedom, for that now the Athenians were busied in the Social War begun this year, and thereupon could not take such care as was necessary, for the preservation of Amphipolis.

9. The Social War, which continued three years, had its original from the revolt of the Chians, Rhodiens, Coans, and Byzantians, from the State of Athens. The Athenians sent against them two Generals, Chares and Chabrias, who when they came to Chios, found there Succors sent from other Cities; and from Mausolus the Prince of Caria. They fell upon the City; Chares by Land, and Chabrias by Sea, but the later whilst too boldly he ventured by himself into the Haven, was slain, and then the rest retreated without any thing done. One * in his life telleth us, that in this Expedition he was a private man, but excelling the Commanders in Military Skill and Fame, was more regarded by the Soldiers; which thing proved his destruction. For endeavouring first of all to enter the Haven, when he had broken in none followed him, so that being compassed with Enemies his Gally was sunk, out of which casting himself, he might easily, as the rest did, have swum to his Friends and escaped; but preferring an honourable death before an ignominious Life, fighting alone was slain, in all Fights having been daring, though otherwise he was accounted slow and heavy.

10. The year following, for any thing we understand, was spent altogether, or for the most part, in preparations on both sides to decide the controversy in a Sea fight. The Athenians having dispatched before under the Command of Chares a Fleet of sixty Ships, sent other sixty after, which they committed to the trust of Iphicrates and Timotheus, two of the most noble in the City, who were to join with Chares, and in equal Authority to manage the War. On the other part the Confederates with one hundred Gallies waited the Islands Imbros and Lenbos, and coming

coming into Samus, after they had harassed the Country, besieged the City both by Sea and Land, and making depredations upon many other Islands under the jurisdiction of Athens, got much money thereby. But the Athenian Generals uniting their Forces resolved to besiege Byzantium, which the Confederates understanding, raised the Siege at Samus to come and relieve it. They were about to join in Battle, when suddenly arose a mighty Tempest, which made Iphicrates and Timotheus decline the Fight, but Chares would not acquiesce in their opinion, but went to Athens and accused them to the People, as wilfully having neglected a good opportunity of doing their Country Service, which so incensed the heady Multitude, that they condemned them in many Talents. Corn. Nepos relateth, that Menestheus the Son of Iphicrates, and Son-in-Law to Timotheus, was sent as General, and they two as his Advisers. That the action was about Samus wherein Chares miscarried, and whereupon he accused them to the People. That Iphicrates being acquitted, Timotheus was fined ten Talents, which he being unable to pay departed to Chelus, where dying, the Multitude repented of their rash Judgment, and remitting nine parts of the Fine, caused his Son Conon to pay the other, towards repairing of the Wall. So that the Walls which Conon the Grandfather built with Spoils, Conon the Grand-son was forced to repair at his own cost and disgrace of his Family. This was the last Age of the famous Athenian Captains, which concluded with the lives of Iphicrates, Chabrias and Timotheus, those that followed being not at all worthy the reckoning.

11. Chares having got all the Power into his own Hands, assisted Pharnabazus the Persian Satrapa, who had revolted from his Prince, and was so rewarded for his Service after the Victory, that he was enabled to pay his Army. This was very acceptable to the Athenians at first; but when the King had once sent to expostulate the matter with them, and a rumour was abroad that he intended with three hundred Ships to assist the Enemies in the Social War, they were far otherwise affected, inasmuch that they resolved to make Peace with the Revolters, which was easily done, they being no less desirous of it. Philip having the year before married Olympias the daughter of Neoptolemus late King of the Molossians, and Niece (not Sister as Plutarch hath it) to Artybas or Artabazus the present, was much envied for his good success by the three Kings of the Thracians, Illyrians, and Paonians. Since they had been overthrown and subdued by him, they had no strength severally to encourage them to a Revolt; Yet joining their Forces together they were confident of good Success. But before they had completed their Army, and whilst they were as yet uncomposed, he set upon them suddenly, and easily reduced them to obedience.

12. The same year being the first of the one hundred and sixth Olympiad, the sixth of Artaxerxes Ochus, Elphinices being Archon, Alexander the Son of Philip and Olympias was born at Pella in Macedonia, in the Attick month Boedromion, if that be true which Aristobolus relateth in Arianus, that being thirty two years and eight months old at his death, he died on the last day, but one, of the month Thargelion. If this be true, (and Aristobolus, if any, might have occasion to know it) then could it not be on the sixth day of the month Hecatombæon, as Ochus, 6. Plutarch relateth, whose error (into which others also fell) arose from thence, because antiently the Macedonian month Lous fell in with the Attick Hecatombæon. The same Author telleth us in the life of Alexander, that Philip received at the same time three several messages: One, that the Illyrians had received a great overthrow from Permenio his General: Another that he had got the Prize at Olympia with his swift-footed Horse: And the third concerning the Birth of Alexander; and this was a little after he had taken Potidea. But Potidea was taken two years before, as appeareth not only from Diodorus, but also from Demosthenes; and strange it is, that Philip should not know of his Sons Birth a good while before he could have intelligence of the Olympian Solemnities, concerning which Judgment was given on the sixteenth day of the month: So that the relation of Trogus is more true, that he received two messages at the same time: viz. one of his Victory over the Illyrians, and another of his Prize at Olympia. The same day that Alexander was born, was the (a) Temple of Diana at Ephesus set on fire by (b) one who desired by such an act to be rendered famous to all posterity, as he confessed upon the Rack. But the Council of Asia decreed that none should dare to name him; and for any thing we certainly know, his name is buried in Oblivion, or at least, there is uncertainty in it; for though Theopompus in his History recorded it, and some (c) tell us it was Hierostatus, yet by another he is called Lygdamis. means a more excellent Structure was raised, the women contributing their Ornaments, and the men their Goods; to this purpose money being also made of the old Pillars. Timæus as (e) one, or Hegelas the Magnesian as (f) another, said the reason of the burning to have been, because Diana that night being busied in Midwives work at the travel of Olympias, had no leisure to look to her Temple, which left Plutarch counteth so frigid, as to have been able to have quenched the Flame. Perhaps both conceits put together might have done it.

The Phocian or Sacred War.

13. The year after wherein Callistratus was Archon, began the Phocian or Sacred War (as it was called) in Greece, which arose upon this occasion. The Lacedæmonians after their overthrow in the Battel of Leuctra, had been fined much money by the Council of the Amphyctiones, to the use of the Thebans, for seizing upon Cadmea their Citadel, which was exacted of them. The Phocians also having plowed up a great piece of the Ground belonging to the Temple at Delphos and called Cyrreæ, were also fined by the same Common-council of Greece, many Talents. This Decree being confirmed by all the Græcians, and about to be executed by seizing on their Grounds, Philomelus a man of principal note amongst them told them the Decree was unjust, and perwaded them by force to rescind it, for that they had advantage enough so to do, because the Oracle it self was once in their possession, and tuition, citing to that purpose two Verses out of the second Book of the Iliads of Homer. He perwaded them therefore to get it again into their Hands, promising, if they would give him power, to do it, and all other things for their profit and honour. They made him General, with full power according to his desire, who straight went to Sparta, where he pressed also the injustice of the Amphyctiones toward that State about their Fine, and shewing how it also concerned them to have the Sentence of the Council nulled, he perwaded Archidamus the King to joyn with him. He supplied him with money, wherewith raising Soldiers he invaded the Temple, and beating back the Locrians that came to oppose him, with great Slaughter, pulled the Decrees of the Council from the Pillars, and brake in pieces the Tables wherein were registred the Names of the condemned. He caused it to be told abroad, that he neither intended to rob the Temple, nor to have any other dishonest intention; but the Beotians not believing him, in their general Council decreed, that the Temple was to be recovered, and gave order for Levies for the same purpose. Philomelus in the mean time fortified the place, and made all possible provision for defence. He invaded the Locrians, who killing some of his men, refused to restore the Bodies, alleging the Law, that all sacrilegious persons ought to be cast out unburied: but he on purpose engaged with them in another Skirmish, and with some of theirs redeemed them formerly denied. Then forced he the Prophets to ascend the Tripods to give him advice concerning the War. She out of fear, told him he might do whatsoever he pleased.

The original of the Oracle at Delphos.

14. The Temple of Apollo Pythius, and the Oracle at Delphos, one of the two chief Cities of Phocia (Elatea being reckoned with it) till made a Commonwealth of it fell by the Lacedæmonians, was of ancient Original, as appeareth by the (A) Poets making Agamemnon before his Expedition to Troy, to have received answer from it. The place thereof was accounted the middle of all Greece, and also the navel of the whole World, a Fable being invented (related by Pindar) that two Eagles (some say Crows) being sent out, the one from the East, and the other from the West by Jupiter, met here. The (B) Original of the Oracle is to be fetched from Goats, which feeding about that Cave or Hole (where afterwards the Temple was built) were seen to skip and utter Voices unusual to others and themselves at other times, which the Herdsman perceiving, went thither himself, and was affected in like manner, withal foretelling things to come. This being blazed abroad, and many who flocked thither experiencing the same thing themselves, it came to be judged an Oracle. For a time one gave answer to another indifferently; but many were transported with the fury, and leaping down into the Hole were utterly lost, so that it was judged best, to set apart one woman, who should attend constantly, and a certain Engine to be made, wherein standing safely over the place, the might give out the Oracle. This Engine having three feet, came thence to be called Tripod; the woman was named Pythia, from asking, faith Strabo, and the first of all others was called Phemonoe. Virgins at first were only designated to this work, till one of them being ravished by Echecrates the Thessalian, women of about fifty years, but in the habit of Virgins were only allowed of. was very famous for the Oracle; for the firing of the Amphyctiones, the Pythian Games, and the riches thereof; but in the time of Strabo it was decayed in reputation, being nothing so much accounted of, which we may gather from it's poverty, seeing by gifts it was not able to recover the wealth taken out of it in after times, as it did that which it enjoyed in the time of Homer, having been rifled before it was recruited again by the present of Cæsar, his Father Alyattes, the Ionians, Sicilians, and others.

15. Philomelus sent to Athens, Lacedæmon, and the other eminent Cities of Greece, to excuse himself, professing he only intended the recovery of the Temple into the possession of his Country-men, and not with any desire or design to pillage the treasures, adding, that he should be always ready to account for the money or gifts belonging thereto. He desired that if any out of ill will to the Phocians bare Arms against them, that they would enter into a League with them, or at least to forbear all Hostility. The messengers effectually soliciting according to their instructions, brought the Athenians and Lacedæmonians to enter into society, and to promise aid; but the Beotians, with the Locrians and some others, thought the contrary, and resolved that the Temple was to be rescued. Philomelus seeing what kind of a brunt he must undergo, laboured always to strengthen himself, for which purpose abating yet from the Treasures of the Temple, he took a great summe of money from the Citizens of Delphi, wherewith he hired Soldiers. Having got together a considerable force, he took the field, and overthrew the Locrians who made head against him. They then sent to Thebes requiring aid for Apollo and themselves, and the Beotians thinking it to concern them that the Decrees of the Amphyctiones should not be nulled, sent to the Thessalians, and the rest of the Amphyctiones to joyn with them in this War against the Phocians. The Council meeting together, then Decreed, that War was to be made upon them, which caused great motions and factions throughout all Greece.

16. Some thought Religion bound them to relieve the God, and punish the Phocians as sacrilegious persons; but others inclined to defend them, according to their particular interests. The Beotians, Locrians, Perthebeans, Dorians, Dolopians, Athamians, Acheans, they of Phiotis, the Megnetes, Ænians, and some others were for rescuing the Temple. With the Phocians stood the Athensians, Lacedæmonians, and some others of Peloponnesus, wherof the Lacedæmonians were now more than before concerned, for not having paid their Fine imposed on them by the Amphyctiones within the time limited, at the last sitting they were Fined one thousand Talents more. This made them desire that the Decrees of the Council should be invalid, as well as the Phocians, and being unwilling to contract the Odium of making War in their own name upon that account, they were glad to do it as it were in the name of the other, endeavouring withal to get the Temple into their own hands. Philomelus, when there came certain intelligence that the Thebans would invade them with a strong Army, to furnish himself with mercenaries, seized upon the Treasury of the Temple: then offering half as much more wages as formerly, he had multitudes offered themselves to the service. With ten thousand he invaded the Locrians, who being allied with the Beotians opposed him, and having the worst of it, afterwards taking some of his men as they were gathering forage, put them to death as sacrilegious persons condemned by the Amphyctiones. This the Phocians complaining of, procured of their General, that to stop such proceedings for the time to come, he should punish such prisoners as he took in the same kind. After this the Armies removed into other parts of the Countrey, where engaging in Woody and difficult places of passage, the Phocians were overmarched by the number of their Enemies, and being put to flight, Philomelus, after he had omitted nothing worthy of a Captain, for fear he should come into the power of his Enemies, leaped down a Rock, and perished with the fall. With Diodorus consereth (A) Pananius as to the kind of his death, though (B) Justin writeth him to have been slain in the beginning of the fight.

17. Onomarchus his Colleague taking upon him the Office of General after his death, gathering up the reliques of the Army, therewith retreated home, and the Beotians rejoicing they had wrought the destruction of so infamous a man, returned into their own Countrey, hoping his hap would deter others from the like Enterprize. But the Phocians (being perwaded by Onomarchus, who himself had also been Fined by the Amphyctiones, and therefore for his own ends stirred them up to continue the War) resolved to perfect if possible what was begun, and to that purpose created him General. He as his Predecessor had done, with large pay allured many unto him, corrupted the Theſſalians to quit the society of the Beotians, and invading the Territories of the Enemy took Thronium, forced the Amphigians to submit, and waited the grounds of the Dorians; he took Orchomenus in Beotia; but besieging Cheronea was worsted by the Thebans, and forced to retreat. At this time the Thebans, though defeated by the Theſſalians, sent over forces into Asia to Artabazus, who had revolted from the King, and now began to decline after Chares the Athenian had left him. The War was renewed betwixt the Argives and the Lacedæmonians who had the better in a battle fought at Ormea. Chares going into the Hellepont took Sestus, and Kersobleptes the son of Cotys King of the Thracians, bearing ill will to Philip of Macedonia, drew all the Cities of the Cherronensis to the party of the Athenians, except Cardia, into which the people were about to fend Colonies. Philip considering that the Mathymneans suffered his Enemies to use their City seated in Magnaesia for a refuge, and as a place convenient for carrying on the War, besieged it. They held out against him for some time, and in the siege he lost one of his Eyes with a stroke of an Arrow; but at length they desired to be dimitted with one fure of Apparel apiece, and this being granted, he destroyed the City, and divided the grounds amongst the Macedonians.

Is twice defeated by Oenomarchus.

Who gets the Cheronea, but is again overthrown by Philip, and is hanged.

18. After this he was called into Theſſaly by the Inhabitants against Lycophron Tyrant of the Pheræans, who in like manner desired aid of the Phocians, Phaylus the brother of Oenomarchus was sent to assist him with seven thousand men. Him Philip worsted, and expelled out of Theſſaly. Oenomarchus then, who had already attained the Dominion of all that Countrey in his mind, with all his strength marched to the aid of Lycophron, and overmarching Philip, and the Theſſalians, in number of men, overthrew them twice with great slaughter, and sorely distressed Philip, inasmuch that hardly containing his Soldiers in obedience, he presently retreated into Macedonia. Oenomarchus improving the credit this victory had got him, overthrew the Beotians, and got Cheronea. Philip recruited himself, and returned into Theſſaly against the Tyrant, who being straightwinded sent again to Oenomarchus, promising if his affairs succeeded, to do his work in the Cities of Theſſaly. Oenomarchus with twenty thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse was ready at his call, but engaging in battle with Philip, and the Theſſalians, was utterly defeated by the power and courage of the Theſſalian Horse, and fled again with such as could get away towards the Sea. It hapned that Chares the Athenian hovering then about the Coasts with a fleet, saved many that took the Sea, and fswom to his ships. But of the Phocians and their assistants six thousand were slain, and as many taken, amongst whom was Oenomarchus, whom Philip caused to be hanged, and the rest to be drowned in the Sea as sacrilegious persons. This battle hapned in the year wherein Manfalus the famous Prince of Caria died, and Clearchus the Tyrant of Heraclæa a City in Pontus, was slain, to whom succeeded his son Timotheus, and reigned fifteen years. Clearchus having obtained the Tyranny, and his designs prospering imitated in all things Dionysius of Syracuse, and inflamed his fellow Citizens very magnificently twelve years.

And death of a Confumption.

19. The year after, being the first of the one hundred and seventh Olympiad, wherein Smierinus of Tarentum was Victor, and Aristodemus Archon, Phaylus Olymp. 107. was made General in the room of Oenomarchus his brother. He having plenty of money, therewith not only allured obscure men, but the principal Cities of Greece to join with him in the War. The Lacedæmonians sent him one thousand Foot, the Achaæans two thousand, and the Athenians five thousand, besides four hundred Horse. Lycophron and Pitholaus the Pheræan Tyrants, after the death of Oenomarchus being destitute of succour, were forced to quit their power by Philip and gathering together two thousand men, lead them to the service of Phaylus. With such forces and those of his own he invaded Beotia, but was worsted several times, first at Orchomenus where he lost many men, then at the River Cephissus, and again at Cheronea. After this he invaded the Locrians, called Epicnemidii, several of whose Towns he took, and received some loss from the Beotians, who invading Phocis he came suddenly upon them and revenged himself. But having conflicted long with a Confumption, not long after in great pain, as his impyety (saith Diodorus) had deserved, he ended his life. He left for his Successor Phalachus the son of Oenomarchus, who being but young, he joynd as Counsellour to him, one Manfalus his familiar friend. The Beotians falling by night night upon them, slew two hundred of the Phocians with their Captain Mnæſias, and within a while in a fight at Cheronea, Phalachus himself was also worsted, and many of his followers were slain. Philip of Macedonia having restored the Theſſalians to liberty by taking away the yoke of the Pheræan Tyrants (which bound them ever after very fast to him and his son) went towards the Pile, or Streights, to make War upon the Phocians; but the Athenians hindring his passage, thence he returned with great honour into his own Kingdom.

Strife betwixt the Lacedæmonians and Argæans.

20. Whilst these things were adoing, the Lacedæmonians being at Enmity with the Inhabitants of Megalopolis, sent Archidamus their King to invade them, who being too weak for them of themselves, desired aid of their friends. The Argives, Sicyonians, and Messenians helped them with their whole strength, and the Thebans sent them four thousand Foot and five hundred Horse. The Lacedæmonians had three thousand Foot from the Phocians, and one hundred and fifty Horse from Lycophron and Pitholaus, by the assistance of which forces they took Ormea, a City of Argolis, before their Enemies could come to relieve it. The Thebans afterwards coming down, a battle was fought with equal success, after which the Argives departed to their several homes, and the Lacedæmonians invading Arcadia, took and plundered Elifus, and returned unto Sparta. After some time the Thebans had the better of it at Telphusa, and after that in two battles more, wherein they killed many of their Enemies; but then again the Lacedæmonians by a notable victory recovered their credit, and the Armies returning home, a Truce was made betwixt them and the Megalopolitans. This was done whilst Phalachus in Beotia took Cheronea, and presently lost it again to the Thebans, who then with a numerous Army entered, and wasted Phocis, and then having taken some inconsiderable places with much booty they returned into Beotia.

21. The next year the Thebans being spent with the Phocian War, sent to Ochus the Persian King to desire a supply of money from him; who without any difficulty, or delay, bestowed on them three hundred Talents. No memorable thing passed betwixt the Phocians and them this year, which was spent in skirmishes and mutual depredation. Two years after (a) Philip cast out again Pitholaus the Tyrant, who had seized upon Pheræa, and setting upon the Cities of Thrace which belonged to Chalcis, took by storm the Castle Zeira, which he demolished, and forced other Towns to submit to his yoke, (b) though upon the desire of the Chalcidians, Charidemus had been sent from the Athenians to help them, then lying in the Hellepont. The (c) year following wherein was solemnized the one hundred and eighth Olympiad, whereof Polydes the Cyrenæan was Victor, having great designs in his mind, he hasted to get into his hands the Cities of the Hellepont, and without any strokes got Micylerne and Torone by treachery to be delivered up to him. Now he quarrelled with the Olynthians (because his affairs were improved by success) whom before he courted as fearing their power, which had been ever too much for his predecessors. 'Tis said he pretended a quarrel because they received his two half brothers, whom after he had taken in the Town he murdered; all things being lawful to him now that might any way serve his turn, all his affections and passions being swallowed up in his ambition, which made him not stick to break faith himself, and by his Gold to attempt others to do it. He thought it to no purpose to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had first inclosed all their power within the Walls, and therefore he first overthrew them in two battles, and then besieged the City, which attempting with many assaults and great loss of men, at length it was betrayed into his hands by Euthykrates and Lasthenes the chief Magistrates, whom he had corrupted with money. He fact it, and sold the Inhabitants with the rest of the plunder, whereby he much enriched himself, and was enabled to buy in Cities which he daily did, having been advised by the Oracle at the beginning of his undertaking, to make his assaults with silver spears; inasmuch that he boasted that his Kingdom was more increased by Gold than Arms.

(c) Item ad ann. 4.

(b) Acagroph Olympiadan. (c) Diodorus ad Olymp. 108. ann. 1. Tuplin lib. 8.

The Athenians began to look to themselves.

22. The Athenians being sensible of his incroachments, jealous of his growing power, and warily providing for the liberty of Greece, supplied, as they might, such as he fell upon with war, and now sent up and down to the Cities to desire them to value their liberty, and punish capitally such as were treacherous amongst them, promising them their alliance and utmost assistance, in this work. And now at length by the special advice of Demophanes (the greatest Wit and Orator of Greece) they openly declared themselves his Enemies; and undertook the quarrel. But so far were the spirits of the Greeks degenerated, that this endeavour

Sect. 5. endeavour of theirs could not counterwork the efficacy of his Gold, so that having a mind to take a Town that was strongly fortified, and one of the place telling him it could not be done, he asked him if he thought it not possible for his Gold to get over the walls. He had in all the Cities up and down his instruments and secret workers, who fought for a little gain to undermine the fortune of their own Country. After the taking of Olynthus, he celebrated the Olympick Games, and feasted all Comers; and entertaining them with great magnificence, by this cunning engaged many to betray their Faith.

23. The following year the Boeotians and Phocians mutually preyed upon each other, and several skirmishes hapned betwixt them, which produced no great loss on either side. But Phalaecus the Phocian General, being accused to have stolen the sacred money, was put out of his place, and three Generals substituted in his room, Democrates, Callias, and Sophanes, who were to make inquiry about the money which was stolen, and call the Trustees who had the management thereof, to account. The Chief of the Trustees was Philo, who being not able to give an account, was racked, and confessed many of his fellow thieves. They had taken out of the Temple four thousand Talents of gold after the rate of silver, and above six thousand Talents of silver of such presents as Craesus and others had sent: and there wanted not some who affirmed as much to have been rifled out of this Temple, as Alexander afterwards found in the treasures of the Perfians. Phalaecus was about to search in the pavement for treasure, hinted at by Homer; but when the Soldiers came to dig near to the Tripps, such Earthquakes hapned, as deterred them from proceeding any further. The Phocians afflicted with these riches carried on the War, and by this time had got into their hand three strong places in Boeotia; Orchomenus, Cheronea, and Cosfusa. The Boeotians being much pressed herewith, having lost very many men, and wanting money, sent Ambassadors to the King of Macedonia for aid. Philip was very glad to find them in so weak a condition, desiring to abate that Spirit which they had got at the battle at Leuctra, yet he sent them a considerable number of men, because he would not seem to be wanting to so religious a cause, as vindicating the right of the Oracle. At this time the Phocians building a Castle near Abe, were fallen upon by the Boeotians, and shifting for themselves into the neighbouring Towns, five hundred of them stepped by into a Chappel of Apollo near Abe. Fire being left in their Tents, seized upon some Straw there, whence a great flame arising, caught hold at length of the Chappel, and therein burnt alive those that had fled thither, for an example (as Diodorus accounteth it) to all sacrilegious persons.

24. Philip being now employed in the War of Thrace, which was to the great damage of the Athenians, to lull them asleep, promised he would enter into a straight league and alliance with them, and pretending fair things, so corrupted some of the chief Orators, (a) (Æschines accuseth Demosthenes, and (b) Demosthenes layeth the load upon Æschines) that a peace was made up which continued seven years. (c) Demosthenes advised them to send away their Ambassadors to Philip with all speed, to ratify the League, lest he delaying the matter according to his custom, should still proceed to incommode their affairs. Accordingly five Ambassadors were dispatched away, whereof one was Æschines; but coming into Macedonia, they were there forced to stay till Philip had settled all things in Thrace, according to his own pleasure, and passed through the Pyle or Straights into Phocis. The Athenians hearing of his coming, notwithstanding the place, were in great fear, and caused all their goods to be brought into the City. The Thessalians and Boeotians earnestly now desired of him that he would undertake the conduct of all Greece against the Phocians; and on the other side the Ambassadors of the Phocians, Lacedæmonians, and Athenians, earnestly exhorted him from the War. He hearing both sides, being accustomed to double dealing, promised them he would do as all had desired, and so making them secure hereby, seized upon the Straights of Thermopylæ.

25. The Phocians having sent to Lacedæmon for aid, procured one thousand Foot-men of heavy Armour, which were commanded by Archidamus. Philip in conjunction with the Thessalians with a strong Army went down into Loricis, where finding Phalaecus returned to his Generalship, he halted to decide the controversy by action, but the other lying at Nice, and perceiving himself too weak to fight, sent to treat with him, and they agreed that he should have freedom to depart with his men whither he pleased. Faith being given and received, he departed departed with his Mercenaries to the number of eight thousand into Peloponnesus, and the Phocians being thus deserted, were forced to yield. So the War was ended by Philip without a stroke, in the tenth year after the beginning thereof, in the third year of the hundred and eighth Olympiad, according to Diodorus, when Archias was Archon: but as Pausanias writeth, in the first of this Olympiad, and in the government of Theophilus.

26. Philip calling a Council of the Boeotians and Thessalians, it was resolved to remit the matter of the Phocians wholly to the judgment and sentence of the Amphyctiones. They decreed that Philip as a reward for his good service should be involved in the number of themselves, and have the double voice which the Phocians formerly had. That the Phocians should be debarred from the Temple. That they should have neither Horse nor Arms till such time as they had repayed the money which they had stolen from Apollo. All their Exiles and as many as were guilty of Sacrilege in their own persons should be accounted peculiar, and it might be lawful to take them out of any place. All their Cities were to be levelled with the ground, and they reduced into Villages, not exceeding the number of fifty little Families apiece, and distant a furlong one from another. They were to pay to the Temple a yearly tribute of sixty Talents, till the money stolen was made up. But from this punishment, Pausanias telleth us the Aeans were excepted, who alone had not contaminated themselves. The Council then took order for restoring of the Oracle, and for the establishment of peace in Greece; and Philip having confirmed their Decrees, embracing them all with singular kindness, returned into his own Kingdom, flourishing with great glory both upon the account of Piety and Martial matters. This Expedition made not a little for the enlargement of his Empire, and the improvement of his design already laid, to procure himself to be chosen Captain General of Greece, and to make War upon the Perfians.

27. Two years after, and in the seventeenth of his reign, he invaded the Illyrians his old Enemies with a potent Army, took therein many Towns, wasted the Country, and with rich booty returned into Macedonia. Then went he into Thessaly, where casting out the Tyrants out of the Cities, he much won upon the People, having a design hereby to make use of their favour, as a decoy to bring in the affections of the rest. And it failed not, for their neighbours led by their example, very readily entered into League with him. The year after he prosecuted this design to a further advantage, for Kersobleptes the King of the Thracians much distressing the Greek Cities in Thrace, he exhorted them to joyn together, and with a strong force going against him overthrew the Thracians in several battles; and forced them to pay the tenths of their Lands to the Kingdom of Macedonia. He built Forts in such places as were convenient for the bridling of their power, whereby the Cities being delivered now from their fear, most gladly embraced his alliance and society. The year after this, Arymbas King of the Molossians died, who left a Son named Bacides, the Father of Pyrrius, but Philip deprived him of the Kingdom, and gave it to Alexander the brother of his wife Olympias. * Another faith, that he deprived Arymbas yet alive, and expelling him the Kingdom settled Alexander therein.

28. The next Expedition Philip undertook, was against Perinthus a strong City, situate upon the shore of the Propontis, the Inhabitants whereof in favour of the Athenians crossed his designs. With his utmost might, he fell upon it, continuing the storm without intermission, by fresh men sent in the place of the dead or wounded: he built Towers higher than theirs, and with battering rams and mines brake down a part of the wall. But the defendants being relieved from Byzantium, manfully resisted, and built a stronger wall in the room of that which was thrown down. By this means the Siege being drawn out in length, and great talk being in Asia of the power of the Macedonian, Ochus the Persian King being now jealous of his power, thought it wisdom to ballance him, and for that purpose gave order to his Satrapæes upon the Sea Coasts to assist the Perinthians. They uniting their Forces together; gave them their utmost assistance, which with the natural strength of the place enabled them to stand it out. For it was seated upon the cliff of a Peninsula about a furlong in length, the houses were thick and high, rising one rank above another, according to the ascent of the hill, so that the whole Town represented the form of a Theatre. Hereby, though the wall was battered down, yet stopping the ends of the streets, their defence was little diminished, which Philip perceiving, and how all things necessary for the War were abundantly supplied from from Byzantium, he left a strong party under expert Captains to carry on the Siege, and with the rest of the Army halted against that City, the inhabitants whereof having sent their men and arms to the Perinthians, were thereby much straitened.

29. By this time the grudges betwixt Philip and the Athenians were so heightened, that now the Peace was held as broken on both sides. Phocio the Athenian was sent against Clitarchus the Tyrant of Eretria, who was made by Philip, and cast him out, being by (a) Plutarch called Plutarch. (b) They sent Aid also to the Byzantians, at the persuasion of (c) Demosthenes, contained in the fourth Oration of his Philippicks. With them joyntly the Chians, Coans, Rhodians, and other Greeks, who so terrified Philip, as he was glad for the present to yield to necessity, and made a Peace with them. For Demosthenes having persuaded his Citizens forgetting all committed in the Social War, to send relief to the Byzantians and Perinthians, and he himself being sent Ambassador to the Cities, wrought so effectually with them, that besides their ordinary Militia, they raised fifteen thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, and liberally contributed Money for their pay; at which time the Associates desiring that the sum of the Tax might be set, Crotylus the Orator said, that War had no set rate of allowance. At this time (d) Ateas King of Seythia being invaded by the Syrrians, sent to Philip for aid, promising him succcession in his Kingdom; which being sent when as the Syrrians retreated, he also sent back the Macedonians, and recalled his Promise concerning the succcession. Philip hereupon demanded money to pay the men, but he also refusing it upon pretence of Poverty, raised his Siege from Byzantium to go against him, and sent Messengers before to let the Syrrians know he had vowed to set up to Hercules a Statue upon the Bank of Ister, and to desire peaceable access and recess for that purpose. He answered, that if he pleased to send the Statue it should be erected, but refused to give leave for him to enter his Borders with an Army, saying, that if he set it up by force, he would pull it down after his departure, and turn the Brast thereof into Heads of Arrows. Philip entering Seythia, a Battel was fought, wherein he overcame them by Craft, who in courage exceeded, and took twenty thousand women and children, with multitudes of Cattel, but neither Gold nor Silver. Twenty thousand Mares of the choicest were sent into Macedonia to breed. As Philip returned, the Triballs opposed themselves, refusing to give him passage except he would part with some of his Booty. He disclaiming the thing, forced his passage, but received such a wound in his Thigh, that through it his Horse was killed under him, and being taken up for dead, so little care was had for the Prey, that it was left. Isocrates the Orator taking occasion at this disaster, fought by his second Epistle to draw his mind to a peaceable inclination; but to no purpose.

He invadeth

30. Two years after, having drawn most of the Græcians into Society with him, he longed after the Empire of all Greece, in his way to which the Athenians only seemed the main Obstacle. He resolved now to daunt them, and obtain his purpose, and for that end seized first upon Elatea a City of Phocia, and calling his Forces thither relieved speedily to make War upon them, hoping his work would be the less, because he should take them altogether unprepared, and secure upon the account of the Peace. The Athenians exceedingly struck hereat for some time stood mute, after they were met together, being come of their own accord, for that the Magistrates caused an Allarm to be sounded all the night after they received the news. At length all their Eyes were turned upon Demosthenes, who persuaded them to send to the Boeotians to desire their assistance in the vindication of the liberty of Greece, and being sent himself by his Oratory persuaded them to it, though they held themselves upon the account of the Phocian War obliged to Philip. The Athenians were encouraged by this accession of the Boeotians, which doubled their force, and dispatched their Army under the conduct of Chares and Lysicles towards Cheronea in Beotia, all of flourishing age willingly giving their Names to the expedition, and the Boeotians admiring their readines had also themselves, and joining to them expected the coming of the Enemy. He sent his Ambassadors to the Council, one whereof was Pythion an eloquent man, to withdraw them from the Athenians, but prevailing not, he notwithstanding resolved to fight them both, and with an Army of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse invaded Beotia. He overmarched his Enemies as well in skill as numbers, all the Athenian Captains of note being now dead, and Chares Chief, who was nothing better for conduct than an ordinary Soldier. Philippi 23.He obtained a Victory over
the Athenians,

Fight was fought with great animosity on both sides, and with equal success, till Alexander, Philip's Son, first made his Enemies give ground in his wing, and then his Father had the same success in the other, and obtained the Victory. Of the Athenians above one thousand fell, two thousand were taken, and of the Boeotians a great number. Demosthenes being in the Battel made his actions far disagreeable to his words, and cowardly with the first casting away his Arms (though good Fortune was ingraven upon his Shield) ran away.

31. Together with this Battel was lost the liberty of Greece, and in effect the ancient Glory thereof here had its Period, being never able to recover its Power, but first enslaved by one, and then by another for ever after. (a) Isocrates the Athenian Orator was so sensible of the advantage Philip had got, that being ignorant how he would improve the opportunity, and resolved not to see Athen's ruin, besieged the fourth time, he killed himself by abstaining from all sustenance four days, aged ninety eight years. (b) Presently after the Victory, Philip carozed for joy, and walking amongst the Captives upbraided the badness of their condition, when Demades the Athenian Orator took him short, asking him, if he who had obtained the Fortune of Agamemnon shamed not to act the part of Thersites? with the wit of which castigation he was so struck, that he cast off the former countenance, imbraced the Author of it with singular kindness, with him gave liberty to all the Athenian Prisoners, and forgetting his pride, made a League and Alliance with that Commonwealth. (c) He is also reported to have appointed a Boy every morning to beat this into his Ear, that He was a man. He was a great Master of his affections indeed. He was never passionate to his disadvantage, and upon this account, to procure that with more ease which he had long designed, he might thus gratifie the Athenians, whose interest in the other Estates being the same with the common of all Greece, he might be unwilling to force them to the utmost. But he placed a Garrison of his own in Thebes, and Fustin writeth, how he sold for Slaves all the Prisoners of that City, and the Bodies of such as had been slain, to their Friends for burial: that of the chieftest of the Citizens some he put to death, and confiscated the Goods of the rest, being sufficiently sensible of their ingratitude. After the Fight, when the Athenians fortified their City as expecting a Siege, (d) Demosthenes at his own charge re-edified part of the Wall, for which Service Ctesiphon thought he was to be honoured with a Garland at the publick meeting of Greece; but Alcibiades contended it was against the Law: and so his Oration against Ctesiphon concerning the Crown, or Garland, was written this year, Charonides (or Charondas) being Archon, the third of the one hundred and tenth Olympiad, and the first of the reign of Artes the Persian King.

32. (e) Philip by his success having utterly broken the courage of the principal Cities of Greece, now gave out that he would undertake a War against the Persian for the general commodity of all the Estates, and thereby, and with his great courtesie, gained much upon some sorts of People. At length he called them together at Corinth, and largely discoursing of the War, shewed the certain hope of success, and earnestly exhorted them to undertake it; to which all either out of Love or Fear assented. He was chosen Captain General for the expedition, allowance of men and money were appointed to the several Cities, the (f) Macedonians alone scorned both him, and the conditions of his Peace, as accounting that Slavery, and not Peace, which was imposed by the Conquerour. The Auxiliaries of Greece amounted to two hundred thousand Foot, and fifteen thousand Horse, over and above the Forces of Macedonia, and the barbarous Nations thereto adjoining. Whilst he thus prospered in his affairs abroad, (g) great differences arose in his own House by his putting away Olympias upon pretence of incontinency, and marrying Cleopatra the Niece of Attalus. Olympias a Woman of an high Spirit, and melancholick Nature, took it exceedingly to heart, and incited all she could her Son Alexander, who at the Wedding hearing Attalus in his Cups to exhort the Macedonians to pray for a lawful Heir of the Kingdom from Philip and Cleopatra, calling him naughty fellow, asked him if he counted him a Bastard, and therewith threw a Cup at him. Philip thereupon with his drawn Sword made at Alexander, but to the good of both, being light headed with Wine, and mad with Anger, stumbled and fell. After this Alexander carried his Mother into Epirus, and went himself into Illyrium, whence his Father shortly recalled him by the procurement of Demetrius the Corinthian. Not long after Pexodarus the Governour of Garia sent to offer his eldest Daughter in Marriage to Aridaus the base Son of Philip.

whence great talk being raised that Philip did it on purpose to devolve the Crown upon Aridanus, Alexander sent one Theffalus a Player to Pexodarus, to persuade him to neglect a Bastard and a Fool, and transfer his affinity upon himself, which was very well liked by Pexodarus. Philip finessing out the matter, checked Alexander grievously, as degenerate, and unworthy of the hope of a Kingdom, being ambitious to become son-in-law to a Carian, who was no better than a Slave to a barbarian King.

He is flabbed.

33. The next Spring having enquired of the Oracle concerning the success of the Persian War (which gave him answer as ambiguous, and to the same purpose as formerly to Cæsus) he sent three Captains over into Asia under pretence of setting the Greek Cities at liberty; Atalrus, Parmentio, and Amyntas. He himself, whilst his Forces were gathering together, made a magnificent Sacrifice to the Gods, and celebrated the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with her Uncle Alexander of Epirus, to which he invited all that would, and gave large entertainment, being willing to shew to the Græcians how thankfully he took their making him General of all Greece. Feasting and Muckling there was in abundance, and the Feast being done for that day (but all the Solemnity to be renewed on the next) whilst it was yet night all the People ran together into the Theatre. Thither were carried twelve Images of his Gods in solemn procession, and his own next after in a Divine habit, as arrogating to himself a place in the Council of the Gods. Then followed he himself apparelled in a white Robe in the midst of the two Alexanders, his Son, and Son-in-law. As he thus proceeded in the ruff of his Pride, the People sending up loud acclamations to the Skies, and Echoing his Felicity, one Pausanias met him in the straightest place of his passage, and stabbed him into the Side, the wound being so mortal that he fell down dead. This Pausanias having been invited to a Feast by Atalrus, had been carnally abused by him after he was drunk, and then prostituted to the filthy lust of base Fellows, for which having complained to the King, partly because of their affinity, and because Philip intended to use him in the War, he could have no satisfaction, and for this cause took this revenge upon his unjust Judge; yet Alexander objected to Darius that his Father was made away by his procurement.

His great achievements.

34. The murderer having mounted on Horse-back had got away whilst the Tumult was about the Body, but that his Shoe catching hold on a Vine he was thereby pulled down, and then slain by Perdiccas and others. This end had Philip after he had reigned twenty four years, and lived forty six, to which Olympias is reported by some to have contributed, by encouraging Pausanias to commit the fact, and neither know they how to clear Alexander of the matter. She put a Golden Crown upon Pausanias his Head as he hung on the Cross, and a few days after burnt his Body upon the Reliques of her Husband, built him a Monument in the same place, and caused a yearly parentation to be made to him. After this having killed Cleopatra's young Son in her Bosom, he then hanged her, or as one faith, fried them both to death in a brazen Vessel, and consecrated the Sword wherewith Philip was slain, to Apollo, under the name of Myrakis, by which the was called when young. The foundation of a great Empire was laid by Philip, and a great pattern left unto his Son, which to make, was far more hard than what with greater Glory was achieved by Alexander. The recovery of Macedon when there were two Competitors that had such affluents, was a work of much prudence and dexterity. The regaining of such places as were lost to the Illyrians and Olynthians, with the overthrow of the neighbouring Kings, and the State of Olynthus, were such things as would have seemed too difficult for many ages to his predecessors. The matters achieved by him required both Mars and Mercury for affluents, and therein he bred for many choice Commanders, as for their Skill and Valour being worthy to wear Crowns; He seemed most to deserve that Glory which his Son by the influence of his abilities afterwards attained.

Alexander's success.

35. Alexander his Son succeeded him, aged about twenty years, in the first of the one hundred and eleventh Olympiad, wherein Cleomantis was Victor, Pithodorus being Archon, in the first of the Reign of Darius Codomanus, and the year of the World 3669. being by the Father's side defended of Hercules, and the mother's from Achilles, neither of which lines he disgraced by the course of his Fortunes. Of a great and lofty Spirit he was from a Child, easy to be persuaded, but hard to be compelled. His Father apprehending his wit, procured Aristotle to be his School-master, offering him very large rewards, whose Native City

City Stagaira being before by him demolished, he re-edified for his sake. By such a Master he was not only instructed in morality, but had some insight into the more abstruse Sciences, and seemed to have some skill in Physick, being wont to give directions to his Friends about their health. Being sixteen years old, Philip undertaking an expedition against the Byzantians, left him his Deputy in Macedonia, where improving his time, he subdued the Medæans who had revolted, and taking that City, planted it with new Inhabitants, and called it after himself Alexandropolis. At the Battle of Cheronea he behaved himself very stoutly, which with other his good parts drew great love upon him from his Father (inasmuch that he willingly suffered the Macedonians to call him King, and himself General) but Philip's mind towards his latter end being withdrawn from his Mother and fastened upon Cleopatra, thereupon ensued great dissatisfaction on both sides, whilst his mother stirred him to great indignation, inasmuch as he escaped not suspicion of being privy to her designs against his Father's life.

36. Yet began he his Reign with Justice against such as had an hand in the murder, killing them upon his Grave, and blamed his mother that in his absence she had dealt so cruelly with Cleopatra. Then celebrating the Funerals of his Father with royal Rites and Ceremonies, he began to take care of his public affairs, and being condemned for his youth and little experience, above expectation explicated himself out of all difficulties, by imitating his Fathers courtesie, and overcoming many by the invincibleness of his Spirit, which through the course of his life bore down all opposition. He renewed the discipline of War, and gained the affections of the Army; knowing also that Atalrus upon the account of his Niece Cleopatra, lay at all advantages to do him mischief, he sent Hecatanis with a band of men, with order to attack him and send him over alive if possible, or else to kill him one way or other, which was at length effected. In the mean time Demosthenes having had secret intelligence of Philip's death, went to the people, and pretending to have dreamt it, stirred up the Athenians all ways possible to condemn the youth of Alexander, and not to suffer him to obtain the Principality of Greece, and to this purpose they sent unto Atalrus, and entered into conspiracy with him, how they might best effect it. The Atolians intended to restore the Exiles of the Acanianians banished by Philip. The Ambracians expelled the Garrison there, and the Thebans decreed to do the same by that in Cadmea. As the Aracians had refused to consent that the Father should be General of Greece, so were they now nothing better inclined towards the Son, and the rest of the Peioponnesians, as the Argives, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians were ready to do any thing for the asserting of their own Liberty and Power. The Nations about Macedonia began to stir, being altogether inclining to renounce their obedience.

37. Alexander as an earnest of his future success easily removed those obstacles, overpowering some by entreaty and good words, others by awe, and some by force of Arms. He first obtained of the Theffalians by a pious Decree to be owned as his Fathers Successor in the Generalship, and then easily bringing the neighbouring People to do the same, passing the Pyle, he called the Council of the Amphyctiones, and procured by their suffrages to be elected the Captain General of all Greece. Having done this, to bring over the rest by fear, he led down his Army into Boeotia, where pitching his Tents by Cadmea he affrighted the Thebans and the Athenians also so much, that these getting in all their Goodsto the City, and fortifying it as well as they might, sent to beg his Pardon, that they had owned him no sooner. One of the Ambassadors was Demosthenes, who came not with the rest to Alexander, but returned back when he was on his way, either for that he stood in fear of him for the Orations made against his Father, or because he would not crack his Credit with the Persian King, from whom Aschines accused him to have received much money. He answered the Ambassadors to their satisfaction, and then sent for the Deputies of the Estates to meet him at Corinth, where speaking very courteously to them, he was again elected General against the Persian, and aid decreed to him for carrying on the War; after which he returned into Macedonia. Whilst he here was the Isthmus, many Philosophers came to salute him; * only Diogenes the Sinopian made no reckoning of him. The King understanding this, went to visit him then at Athens, and finding him sunning himself in his Tub, saluted him kindly, and desired him, to ask any thing of him whatsoever he pleased. He only desired him to stand out of the Sun, which greatness of mind Alexander so much admired, that when his followers laughed and jeered at the man, he answered, that if he were not Alexander, he would be Diogenes.

38. In the beginning of the Spring he made an Expedition into Thrace, where he subdued several People, and afterwards prospered in the same manner in Paonia Blatiria, and Syria. In the mean time came intelligence, that many of the Greeks had a design to revolt, and not a few Cities, amongst which Thebes was most eminent, and had renounced his authority. Hereupon he returned into Macedonia, the Thebans in the mean while besieging his Garrison in Cadmea, which, being supplied with Arms by Demosthenes, they fell upon and slew many. They implored the assistance of the Argives, Eleans, Arcadians, and Athenians. The Athenians were persuaded by Demosthenes to send them aid, who reigning in the Assemblies by the Power of his Tongue, wrote also to the Kings Captains in Asia, thence to oppose Alexander, whom he called a boy and a fool. But Alexander marching with speed into Bootia, the Valour of the Athenians well abated, and Demosthenes himself grew very cool. The Thebans uncertain what their Allies would do, and surpris'd with the Kings coming, called a Council of Officers to consult what should be done, where it was resolv'd to fight for their liberty, and this was confirm'd by the People, which with great alacrity prepared for resistance, though they might have had good Terms of Alexander. Who delay'd also to do any thing, that they might have time to advise, for his mind being fully intent upon the Persian War, he would gladly have been rid of all trouble on this side of the Seas. But when he saw their wilfulness, he fully resolv'd to make this City a Terror to the rest. Yet he first offer'd indemnity to all such as would come over to him, which they to cross, out of emulation, caus'd to be proclaimed from an high Tower, that if there were any who had a desire to joy'n with the great King and the Thebans in vindicating the liberty of Greece, and suppressing the Tyrant thereof, they should repair unto them.

39. Then fell he with all his might and skill upon the City, which they as stoutly defended, knowing else what would follow, and encouraging themselves with their former success at Leuctra and Mantineia, they made resistance to the wonder and discouragement of their Enemies; till at length Alexander perceiving a little Door to be left unguarded, sent Percidas thither with a party, who breaking into the City made way for the rest of the Macedonians. Now were the Thebans on one side by them, and the other by the Garrison in Cadmea (which like a Tempest fell upon them) cut in pieces, the Law of War not being allowed them, because of that Proclamation they had made from the Tower. The Græcians also that served under Alexander, as the Phocians, Thepians, Platæans, Orchomenians, & others, bearing them malice, spared them no more, so that great slaughter was made, they fighting it out to the last, having no other regard to their lives than this, to sell them at as dear a rate as possible. There were slain six thousand (Ælian * by some mistake hath ninty thousand) and thirty thousand were taken Captives. Alexander having buried all his Slain (to the number of five hundred) assembled a Council of the Græcians, to which he refer'd what should be done with the Thebans. There their Enemies urg'd against them, that they had conspired with the Barbarians against the Græcians, in the time of Xerxes, had fought amongst other Allies of Persia against Greece, and since that being acknowledged and rewarded by his Successors as well deserving of them. By these things they so incensed the Council, as to decree the City to be levelled with the Ground, the Captives to be kill'd, and such as had fled to be sought for and brought to punishment. The King acquiescing in this severe Sentence, executed it accordingly, selling all he had taken, except the Priests and those that had entertain'd his Father when he was young, and their kindred, with the posterity of Pindar the Poet, whose House alone he left standing. This Famous City then was demolish'd the last day of the Eleusian Solemnities then celebrated by the Athenians, the twentieth day of the month Boedromion, after it had continued in a sited condition almost eight hundred years.

40. Alexander publishing an Edict, whereby all Græcians were forbidden to receive the Theban Exiles, the Athenians alone refus'd to obey it, setting open their Gates to them, being then celebrating the mysteries of Ceres. Hereat he was enraged, and when they had sent to deprecate his indignation the second time, forgave them only on this condition: to give up to him the ten (Plutarch nameth but eight) Orators who had stirr'd them up against him, and the principal whereof whereof were Demosthenes and Lycurgus. The People hereupon not knowing how to demean themselves, Phocion the Good, who went ever cross to Demosthenes in managing State Affairs, made a Speech, wherein he would have persuaded the Orators to kill themselves like good Citizens, rather than to bring their Country into danger; but the People ill referring this, expelled him in a tumult. At length Demades the Orator being hired by Demosthenes for five Talents, persuaded the People to mercy, and so fram'd an answer to the King, that it should signify their readiness to punish them if they should find them worthy thereof. They sent him then to Alexander, with order, not only to take up this matter, but also to intercede for the Theban Exiles, and obtain leave for them to receive them. This he did by the power of his persuasions, faith Diodorus, although Plutarch faith it was done by Phocion, who after Alexander had call'd away from him the former Decree, and rejected the Messengers, was kindly received by him, after the King had understood that his Father respected him. He not only admitted of his request but his counsel also: that if he loved an idle life he should lay aside all thoughts of War, but if he thirsted after glory he should transfer his Armies from the Greeks to the Barbarians. Justin writeth, that he gave them leave to keep their Orators, but forced them to banish their Captains, who going over to Darius much incommodated his affairs beyond the Seas. Arrianus only mentioneth Charidemus to have fled to the Persians.

41. Alexander returned into Macedonia with his Army, where consulting about the Persian War, Antipater and Parmenio his choicest Warriours advis'd him first to marry, and beget Children, and then to undertake the Expedition after he was provided of Heirs. But he being of a most quick and active spirit, and impatient of delay, would not hear of any such thing, seeing as he said, he was now created General of Greece, and had such Forces left him by his Father. After then he had by proposing the commodities of such an undertaking, inflam'd the minds of his Soldiers with a desire thereof, he sacrific'd to his gods, and solemniz'd the plays to Jupiter, formerly instituted by Archelaus his Predecessor. The solemnity continued nine days, one being allotted to each of the Muses, during which in his Royal Pavilion which had twenty beds to eat on, he feasted the Officers of his Army, and the Ambassadors of the Cities. In the Spring, all things being now ready, he march'd with his Forces towards the Hellefont. They who account the least, faith Plutarch, reckon thirty thousand Foot, and five thousand Horse, and who the most thirty four thousand of them and four thousand of these. For the maintenance of such an Army Aristobolus wrote that he had no more than seventy Talents. Davis said he had provision but for thirty days, and Onesicritus deliver'd, that he ow'd besides this two hundred Talents. And though he was thus slenderly furnish'd, yet before his journey making inspection into the estates of his friends, to one he assigned a Village, to another a piece of ground, to this a certain rent, and to that the Customs of such a Port. When he had almost distributed all he had, Percidas asked him what he left for himself, and he answer'd Hope; then replied the other, That shall be common to us with thee, and refus'd to receive any thing, which was followed by many; but such as would he willingly gratified, and thereby pass'd away most of the Revenues of Macedonia. He pass'd over his men in sixty ships to Troas, and first of all cast his Spear upon the shore, and skipping out, as it were, took possession of Asia, in the second year of his reign, and the second of Darius Codrmanus; the third of the one hundred and eleventh Olympiad, Evastus being Archon, and in the third month before his leaving of the Office, and the succession of Ctesicles, under whose Government Diodorus placeth this Expedition, A. M. 3670.

42. To Antipater he committed the Government of his affairs in Europe, with whom he left twelve thousand Foot, and eleven thousand and five hundred Horse, as Diodorus hath it, if * fifteen hundred be not rather to be read. The Macedonians after his departure grudg'd his success, and lay watching for an advantage how to begin a War, and if possible divert the course of his good fortune, which after the battel of Arbela they suppos'd to be fitly presented. For the issue of that battel being reported in Greece, many of the Cities who were jealous of his power resolv'd to contend for their ancient liberty, before the strength of the Persians should be utterly spent, which they might have to their assistance. They were encouraged to revolt from tumults now rais'd in Thrace. For Mennon being sent General thither; having Soldiers at his devotion, stirr'd up the Barbarians to rebel rebel, and got together a great Army. Antipater hereupon was forced to march against him and leave Macedonia; the absence of whom the Lacedæmonians thinking a sufficient occasion of working some notable feat, excited the Græcians to agree together with united Force to recover their Liberty. The Athenians conceiving themselves engaged to Alexander, who had respected them above all others, refused to stir, but most of the Peloponnesians, and some others, gave their Names willingly, and raised amongst them twenty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse, which were commanded by Agis the Spartan King. Antipater hearing this composed the matters of Thrace as he might, and with an Army of forty thousand men raised out of the Confederates of Greece marched against them, and joyning Battel, after much opposition slew five thousand and three hundred with the loss of three thousand and five hundred of his own men; Agis himself fighting most valiantly, after he had received many wounds was to be carried out of the Fight and so to be conveyed home. But being incompassed with Enemies, and seeing there was no hope to escape, he bade his men shift for themselves, and reserve their lives for the future service of their Country: he on his knees received his Enemies as well as he could, till having first killed some of them, at length he was slain, after he had been King nine years.

43. Antipater having obtained this Victory, was willing to put an end to the War out of fear of Envy, by seeming to proceed further than the modesty of a Subject should require. For he knew the high Spirit of Alexander, who rejoiced in the Victory, but not in him being Victor, which he not obscurely grudged at, thinking so much to be detracted from his own Glory as was added to that of another. The Lacedæmonians therefore being constrained to fend to him, he remitted them for answer to the Council of Greece, which having heard what could be said on both sides, referred the whole matter to the Cognizance of Alexander. They then gave up to Antipater fifty Hostages, and fend into Asia to Alexander to beg Pardon. Most of such learned men as were eminent during this Period have already, upon occasion, been spoken of.

The Affairs of Sicilie during this Empire.

SECT. I.

The first Names and Inhabitants of this Island, with a relation of such things as preceded the Persian Empire.

The old Inhabitants of Sicilia.

1. SICILIE is an Island of the Mediterranean Sea, lying over against Italy at five miles distance, from which it is thought to have been severed by some Earth-quake, or the violence of the Sea, being joynd formerly by an Isthmus, or neck of Land, to the Continent. It was first, from the Triangular Figure, called Trinacria, then Sicania, and afterwards obtained the name of Sicilie. The most ancient Inhabitants were Cyclopes, or Giants with one only Eye in their foreheads (as the Poets fancied) and the Læstrygones of the same Original. After them succeeded the Sicani, by some said to be indigene, or naturals of the place, but by others a People of Iberia, or Spain, and so named from Sicanni, a River in that Country, whence they were expelled by the Ligyes, and coming into the Island Trinacria changed its name into Sicania. After these, the Siculi a people of Italie (so named faith Thucydides from Balus a King of Arcadia) being expelled by the Opiei, passed into this Island, and overthrowing the Sicani seized upon the best parts of it, and gave it the name of Sicilie, almost three hundred years before the Greeks found it out. When Ilum was taken, some Trojans fled by Ship from the Achæans into this Country, and fixing themselves near to the Sicani, were called Elymii; whose principal Seats were Eryx and Egesta. To these were added some of the Phœnicians, of those who in their return from Troy being driven by Tempest into Libya, or Africa, thence passed into Sicilie. The Phœnicians also inhabited all over the Island in the Maritime parts, and the little Islands near adjoining, for the benefit of Traffick with the Siculi. But after that many Greeks arrived, they removed, and joynd themselves to the Elymii, and inhabited Motya, Solunt, and Panormus; because thence was but a little passage unto Carthage. So many Barbarians, and after this manner, inhabited Sicilie faith Thucydides, with whom in the main of their relations, consent Diodorus, Strabo, Dionysius of Halycarnassus, Pausanias, Constantinus Porphyrogenetus, and others.

Greek Colonies.

3. The first Greeks that came into Sicilie (as Thucydides proceedeth) were some from Chalcis in Eubœa, who under conduct of Theocles planted Naxos. The year following Archias the Corinthian, descended from Heracles, drove the Siculi from that place where stood the City afterward called Syracusa. About the same time Lamis brought a Colony from Megara, which he first placed upon the River Panormus, in a place called Troilus. In the forty fifth year after Syracusa began to be inhabited, Antiphanus from Rhodes, and Eurymus out of Crete, with their several Colonies planted Gela, so named from the River by which it stood, the Inhabitants whereof one hundred and eight years after erected the great and magnificent City Agrigentum, or Agragas, so called also from a River of the same name. Zancle was first inhabited by some Pyrates of Cilicia, a City belonging to Chalcis; but afterwards by a multitude that came promiscuously from Chalcis and other parts of Eubœa, under the Conduct of Perieres of Cumæ, and Caratenes of Chalcis, and were hence cast out again by the Samians and other Ionians, who fled from the Medes into Sicilie. Zancle was so named by the Siculi, from a Sicle, in their language Zancle, which it resembled. Not long after Anaxilas Tyrant of Rhegium banishing the Samians, filled it with a mixt multitude, and called it Messana, after the name of his own Country. Himera was planted by the Zancleans, and many Chalcidians amongst them, with whom also joynd certain Syracusians being expelled by the contrary faction, and called Myletida. Their language was mixed betwixt the Chalcidian and Dorick Tongues. These were the Colonies which from several parts of Greece planted Sicilie. As for other Towns that were Colonies of these Colonies, they shall be told whose they were upon occasion.

Gyants in Sicilia.

4. That Gyants inhabited Sicilie (although to some it hath seemed no other than the invention of Poets, who usually speak monstrously of ancient things) the discovery of the last age hath made most manifest; at what time were in several places of the Island found the Bones of such kind of men, and the perfect proportion of one or more within the Earth, which upon touch mouldred all into dust. Clowrrius in his Description of Sicilie, and Fazellus, herein give abundant satisfaction, which might be further strengthened from what the discoverers of America relate concerning men of such stature; but that the Testimony of Scripture alone sufficeth to make evident the being of Gyants. That they were Indigene, or first Inhabitants of Sicilie, is probable, and the very same with the Læstrygones. As for the Sicani, no credit is to be given to the Testimony of Thucydides in this point that they came out of Spain, for that Diodorus being this Country-man, and certainly rather more concerned in the delivery of the Antiquities of it, than other Nations, averreth the most accurate Historians to have affirmed them Indigene, which Timeus, who lived under Archacles the Tyrant, did fully demonstrate. Thucydides, who first obtruded this Fable upon the Greeks, confesseth that they themselves were of a contrary opinion, and though they in a matter concerning their Honour might not be heard, yet this may satisfy, that in Spain there is no such River to be found as ever had the name of Sicanni, which some of those who follow the opinion of Thucydides change into Sicoris (at this day Segre) and others speak of a City called Stania; and one Sicanni Captain of the Colony,

SECT. 1. all which are as true as any. Neither could these Sicani be driven from their seats by the Ligures, whose habitation was not in Spain beyond the Pyrenean Hills, but in Gaul near the River Rhodanus and the Alps. Lastly, that difficult journey which those obscure people must have taken by Land (for the use of shipping was much later in Spain) through the Countreys of the Tyrrhenians, Umbri, Ligures, Ausone, Opici, Oenotrians, and other fierce and warlike Nations, after the passage of the Pyreneans, Alps, and Gaul, may justly induce us to give credit rather to the opinion of Diodorus, and of Demetrius Calanius a most ancient Writer; who, as the *Scholias*t of Theocritus telleth us, derived the Sicani from the Cyclopes or Giants.

Neither the Siculi out of Italy.

5. That the Siculi came out of Italy several grave Authors relate, as amongst others Diodorus and Dionysius of Halicarnassus from the credit of Hellanicus the Lebanian, Philistus, and Antiochus, both of Syracuse; but they do diversely relate the story, that it appeareth to be no other than dubious, and so intricate as nothing certainly can be pitched on. In Thucydides the Opici, in Antiochus the Oenotrians and Opici drove out the Siculi: But in Hellanicus instead of Siculi the Elymi and Ausone were expelled, with Siculus their King, by the Oenotrians and Asparges. Again, according to the mind of Philistus, neither any Siculi, Ausone, nor Elymi transported themselves out of Italy; but the Ligures under conduct of Siculus. Solinus and Martianus make this Siculus the Son of Neptune, Iphodorus the brother of Italus, Servius Captain of the Sicani, and Antiochus will have him a Roman Exile, whom Morges the Successor of Italus entertained. Further, Dionysius writeth, that the Siculi were Native Inhabitants of Latium, and thence beaten by the Aborigines, which is plainly out of the road of history, the Siculi never having been masters of Rome. It would be too tedious to recite the several opinions concerning the time when the Siculi should make their passage out of Italy into this Island. And what Thucydides bringeth for a confirmation of his opinion, viz. that in his time some of the Siculi remained in Italy, cannot but be false, no foot-steps of them being to be found out in that Countrey by the discovery of any Geography; so that others, on the contrary, grant that the whole Nation passed over. These arguments drawn from the uncertainty of reports constrain us rather to acquiesce in the opinion of Bochartus, who concludeth that no other stranger came from other parts to inhabit Sicily, but all were Indigenae, except the Greeks and Phenicians, the Siculi and Sicani not being distinguished in Nation but only in place. From the Phenicians (who especially lived about the Promontory of Lilybaeum, though they were dispersed throughout the Maritime Coasts) he sheweth the Island it self, and every notable Town and River to have been named, in the first book of that admirable work intituled Canaan.

Cecilius.

Dedalus.

6. Sicily, saith Justin out of Trogus, was from the beginning the Countrey Lis. 4. of the Cyclopes, which being extinct Cocalus made himself King of the Island. To him fled Dadalus for protection, from the presence of Minos King of Creta. A. D. 2775. This Dadalus was an Athenian, of the family of the Erechthidae, and a famous Artist in all manner of Graven and Carved works. It hapned that he had a Scholar, his own Nephew by his Sister, named Talos, who going beyond him in Skill, he privately murd'ed him, and the matter coming out, was forced to fly for his life, and went into Creta. There being courteously entertained by Minos, he wrought many rare pieces of Architecture, but at length so displeased the King in some thing which concerned Pasiphae his wife, that he also fled thence into Sicily, where he was entertained by Cocalus King of the Sicani, then reigning at Trigens, called also Camieus. Some thought that by the means of Pasiphae he escaped by Boat, his Son Icarus accompanying him in another, and that having invented sails, (whereas before Oars only were in use) Icarus not managing his with skill enough, his Vessel sunk, and thereupon arose the fable that they escaped with wings made of feathers waxed together, and of the young man's soaring so high, till the Sun melting the wax, he thereupon fell headlong into that parrot of the Sea which afterwards bore his name. Others thought Icarus was drowned as he took water. But Minos getting notice whither Dadalus was fled, pursued him with an Army, and required Cocalus to deliver him up. Cocalus returned him a satisfactory answer, and invited him unto his house, where he stifled him in a Bath, or else his daughters, for the love they bore to Dadalus, when they came to wash him (which was the custom for women and maids to do unto guests, according to Athenians) instead of warm water, poured on him scalding Pitch. He gave up his body to his men, men, pretending he had slipped by chance into hot water, and perswaded them to stay and plant in the Island, where they built Minos and Engyum, now Gange, the two first Greek Cities founded in Sicily, as some note. The Cretans afterwards in revenge for their King's death, came and besieged Camieus five years to no purpose, and were shipwreckt in their return upon the Coasts of Italy, where then resolving to stay and hide their disgrace, they built Hyria, betwixt Tarentum and Brundisium, and from them descended the Iapyges and Messapii. This passage concerning Minos the younger, happened in the days of Hercules the Græcian, an Age before the Trojan War.

SECT. 1.

7. After Cocalus the several Cities (because they wanted rightful and successful Kings, as it seemeth, and lived under loose Democracy) became the prey of Tyranny, whereof no Country was ever more fertile than this Island, saith Justin. Of these, Anaxilus his Justice vied with the Cruelty of the rest, and was not unrewarded. For at his death leaving his Children young, whom he committed to the trust of Micethus his faithful slave, his Subjects to prized his memory, as they chose rather to obey him, and suffer the Majesty of a Kingdom to be managed by a slave, than desert his Sons. But if by these Tyrants to be meant, such as after the settlement of the Greek Colonies, made themselves Masters of the Cities (as we have no other ground than to believe; the name of Anaxilus sufficiently declaring its original) then Cocalus living an Age before the Trojan War, and the first Greek Colony mentioned by Thucydides being planted in the * eleventh Olympiad, this after Cocalus is with great liberty used by Trogus or Justin; several hundreds of years, (viz. five or six) intervening betwixt Cocalus and those Tyrants. For the Cities were many years after their founding governed by the People, according to the custom of Greece, till Phalaris usurped in the State of Agrigentum, which Suidas writeth to have happened in the fifty second Olympiad, and Eusebius in the fifty fourth. This difference betwixt them may well be reconciled, if with Capellus, we believe that Phalaris coming to Agrigentum, there was kindly entertained for eight years, at the end whereof took occasion from a guest, and perhaps a Judge of Controversies, to make himself Tyrant, and the People slaves.

Tyrant.

8. Phalaris was born at Astypalea a City in Creta; his Fathers name was Ladonius, who died whilst this his Son was an infant. He married Erythia, and on her begat Paurolos a little before whose birth being banished, and deprived of the greatest part of his Estate, he continued long in a desolate condition, not knowing what to do, till at length a Sedition being raised in the State of Agrigentum, he was sent for by the weakest faction, and in conclusion got all the power into his hands. He kept the Tyranny by the same arts he first obtained it, viz. fraud and cruelty, for which cause he was grievously hated by many, and his life laid at by those of whom he had well deserved. Erythia continued all her life with her Son Paurolos at Astypalea, where though she was much importuned by many Suters, yet she remained steadfast in fidelity to her husband. The Citizens of Astypalea when they saw Phalaris had so advanced himself, either for that now their hatred was allayed, or out of fear of revenge, sent to him to intimate that they had revoked what had been formerly done against him, as unjust. He despised not this late repentance, but sent them his hearty thanks, and rewarded them. Having obtained a victory over the Leontines, his Son Paurolos sent him a Crown of Gold, which he returned back unto his wife Erythia. She was at length poysoned by Pythion one of the Suters, enraged at a repulse, which thing Phalaris took most impatiently.

Perillus and his brazen
Bull.

9. It hapned that one Perillus an Athenian, and an excellent Statuary, came to Agrigentum, where shewing his rare skill, he was kindly entertained by Phalaris. He taking notice of Phalaris his cruelty, framed a brazen Bull, which being heated and a man put in his belly, would by the roaring of him that was thus tormented, imitate the voice of a natural one. Presenting him with this exquisite piece, as incomparable for the torturing of men, he admired his skill, but detecting his wickedness, caused him first to make a tryal of it, and excused himself to the Athenians, who took it ill, as having done nothing but what was just and meet. If Perillus had only made experiment, Phalaris had satisfied all reasonable men; but threatening his Enemies with this Engine, and making good his word upon them as often as he could have occasion, lie thereby incurred, and slighted the hatred of mankind. At the same time flourished one Stesichorus a Poet of Himera, who died eight years before Phalaris. He wrote verses against the Tyrant, and raised an Army, animating the Inhabitants of

Himera

SECT. 1. Himeras against him, with whom joyned Conon a most leud and naughty man, and divers others, all which, together with the Poet, at length fell into his hands. Conon was presently condemned to the Bull. He doubted at first what to do with Stesichorus, but at length beholding his worth, he not only dismissed him unpunished, but with large gifts; and ever after mightily revered him both alive and dead; inasmuch as he desired the Himerians to build him a Temple, and Altars (offering for that purpose men, money, and all necessaries) and most lovingly comforted his daughters.

10. He was so great a contemner of Popularity, and so conscious of his wickedness and publick infamy, that he refused the honours offered him by them of Melita, not for any pride, but with a friendly admonition, that it would be to them infamous, and to him not at all advantageous. So when Tresichorus, Cleantes, Theane, and others, thought of writing in his praise, he seriously desired they would forbear, wishing rather that his name might be buried in oblivion, than celebrated in the Writings of Learned men, and, to no purpose, adorned with false commendations. Being grievously provoked by the affronts of the Messenians, Catanians, Leontines, Zancleanes, and Tauromenites, he prosecuted them to the utmost, often saying, that he most certainly knew they would fall into his hands, which accordingly came to pass. He confessed that he had tortured in the brazen Engine thirty seven men, seriously wishing they might be the last, but he forelaw that Lamachus and Epistates, though absent, would increase the number. These things are related in the Epistles that go under his name, which some Learned Men think written by Lucian. But whoever so drew to the life another's disposition as he there doth his own, inasmuch as Suidas accounteth them * very admirable. If one consider their style, accurate, * Sayward, and invention, there are no Epistles of any Tyrant, no not of any Orator or Philosopher to be compared with them. But if one look at the disposition of the man, he was a portentous thing, born for the chastisement of the naughtiness of men, of cruel hatred and unparallel'd cruelty; yet of a most propense and munificent mind towards his Friends, and withal reverencing Virtue so much in his very Enemies, that for its sake he would pardon injuries, and relinquish hatred.

11. That is scarce credible which Clearchus relateth in (A) Atheniens, that he was transported with so great cruelty, as to have served up to his table sucking and new born Infants. (b) Albian hath a more likely story concerning Chariton and Melanippus. Chariton loved Melanippus with an extravagant and immodest Love, as appeareth from the historian. Melanippus having a contest with one of Phalaris's friends, was commanded, and at last forced to desist, which taking very ill, he complained of it to his Lover, and desiring his assistance for killing the Tyrant, thought of taking in other young men into the conspiracy. Chariton desired of him to trust him alone with the matter to take an opportunity to revenge him, unwilling that both of them should miscarry in it if it were discovered; and on a time made at Phalaris with his dagger, but was prevented by his Guard, which he had continually about him. Being examined concerning his Complices, he endured great tortures, so long, that Melanippus more sensible of them than he himself, went to the Tyrant, and revealed the whole matter. He admiring the courage and love of both, dismissed them, with this condition, that they should depart the same day out of Sicily. This love which appeareth to have been no better than an unnatural lust, was afterwards by Apollo called divine, whence, as in other respects, these impure Spirits, the gods of Heathens, betrayed themselves what they were. And hence it is no wonder that the Philosophers of old, such as Socrates, Plato, Xenophon, Alcibiades, Cebes, and the rest, might approve of this affection towards Males, which the (c) Romans yet abhorred in some Ages, the (d) Lacedaemonians held as capital, and the Lake wherein Sodom and Gomorrhah were swallowed up, evinceth to have been contrary to the Law of God and Nature. But as for Phalaris, after he had tyrannized sixteen years, he perished by the fury of all the multitude of Arigentum, which, as (e) Cicero writeth, fell upon him. Some thought that his Subjects conspired against him, being principled thereto by the doctrine of Pythagoras, of which opinion is also (f) Famblicus in the life of this Philosopher. But the whole relation concerning Pythagoras his intercourse with Phalaris is therefore deservedly suspected, because the Philosopher being yet young had scarce passed into Italy. The death of Phalaris hapned about the first year of the fifty eighth Olympiad, and the twelfth year of Cyrus his Reign, reckoned from his first obtaining of e kingdom of Media.

SECT.

SECT. II.

Of such things as were Contemporary with the Persian Empire.

I. AFTER the death of Phalaris, the Citizens of Arigentum recovered their liberty, and enjoyed it till Thero again brought them under. He was the Son of Amelidamus, and boasted that he was descended from Oedipus. He got the prize at the Race with the Chariot in the Olympick Games, and is celebrated by (a) Pindar the Poet, whose Scholias teacheth us, that he was the Father in-Law to Gelon Tyrant of Syracuse, by his daughter Damareta, and married also his brothers daughter: At this time Panetius made himself Lord of Leontium, and Cleander of Gela. Cleander, after seven years, was succeeded by his brother Hippocrates, who sore afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle, or Messana, and Leontium, whom he forced to acknowledge him for their Lord. After seven years, he was also slain in a battle against the Siculi, having before this made War with the Syracusians, and by composition got from them the City of Camerina. After his death Gelon the Son of Dinomenes (descended of the Race of the Rhodiens, who with the Cretans and other Greeks had' feated themselves in Sicily) that had commanded his Forces with great success, and to whom committed the trust of his Children, breaking all obligations made himself Lord of Gela. After he was in possession of this Town, a Sedition happening in Syracuse, betwixt the Magistrates and People, he being called in to the assistance of the Governours that were driven out by the multitude, made himself Prince. Such being the danger and infirmity of all Governments, except rightfully successive Monarchy. This fell out in the second year of the seventy second Olympiad, when Hyrtilides was Archon at Athens; the thirty first of Darius Hystaspis, and the same, as some reckon, wherein the battle at Marathon was fought. Now the comportment of Sicilian affairs constraining us to speak most concerning Syracuse, so considerable a place, both as to its self, as a City, and as the scene of so great transactions, requireth a more accurate description.

2. Syracuse was first inhabited by some Greeks of Atolia, and had the name of Ortygia. These were expelled by the Siculi, who possessed themselves of the place, and at length were outed also by a Colony led thither out of Peloponnesus by Archias the Corinthian, in the eleventh Olympiad, Romulus then reigning at Rome, and the Messenian War being very hot in Peloponnesus. This new Colony, because of Archias, and for that many followed him from Corinth, owned that City for its Metropolis, which at that time was most powerful at Sea. But many afterwards flocked out of other parts of Peloponnesus, and by little and little the City of Syracuse so increased, as it became not only the greatest, and most beautiful of all in Sicily, but of Greek Cities whatsoever, as Cicero affirmeth. It contained, as he writeth, four great Cities; the Island, Acadina, Tycha, and Neapolis. Its compass was one hundred and eighty furlongs, having, besides Suburbs, two Ports very commodious for shipping, being separated by the Island, and grounds about it very fertile, in some places rising into little hills, but compassed about with Fennes. The first Inhabitants dwell in the Island antiently called Ortygia; then as the City increased the other parts were added, whereof the latest was Neapolis. As for the state of the City, after it received a new beginning from Archias, the form of the Commonwealth was without doubt the same that there was in the Metropolis under the Government of the Bacchiadae, viz. Oligarchical bordering upon Aristocracy. Afterwards the common people waxing heady outed the better sort of the possession of the grounds, and seizing of the Government, made bad to worse, as the sad changes and desolations will shew. The Exiles (by Horodorus called Ganori) betook themselves to Gelon the Tyrannus of Gela, who coming to restore them with an Army, the people resisted not, but received him into the City, whereby obtaining the whole power, he restored it not to the Nobility, but made himself master of Syracuse. This hapned at the time aforesaid, and about two hundred and forty years after the Plantation of Archias.

3. Gelon to use his power as he was loved by all, and feared by none. Heery way much enlarged, adorned, and enriched the City: out of all Conquered Towns he took the Noblest, and worst disposed Citizens, and brought them to Syracuse. He procured the affections of almost all that dwell in Sicily, and so greatly strengthn'd himself, that he was able with a Navy of two hundred Triremes, and as great an Army as all Greece could set forth against Xerxes, to help the Greeks in the Median War; and had gone to their assistance, if they would either have granted him the Command of the Land Army or the Fleet. When he could obtain neither of those, he employed his Forces against the Carthaginians, who had been called into Sicily by the Egeians, and on the same day wherein the Greeks obtained their victory at Salamine, got to great an one over them at Himera.
A Maritime Town, that his glory is thought to have equalled, if not exceeded, the other of Theristocles. At this time the Carthaginians were very powerful, and become eminent; whose affairs being by necessity to be joyned with such matters as relate to this Island of Sicily, a more convenient place cannot be had, to speak something (as this work requireth) of the Original, and progress of their Commonwealth.

4. Carthage was a Colony of Tyre, and Tyre of Sidon the most ancient Metropolis of Phœnicia, mentioned by Homer with commendation for ingenious industry (who hath not one word concerning Tyre) and built by Sidon the eldest Son of Canaan. Tyre was built about the two thousand seven hundred and forty seventh year of the World, and two hundred and forty years before Solomons Temple, as (a) Foephilus hath observed. The Greeks thought it received its name from Tyrus the Founder: and (b) some invented a fable of a Nymph, called Tyros, beloved by Hercules. But Tyros in the Phœnician language signifying a Rock, the situation it self sufficiently declareth the Original of the name, which upon this account was communicated to three other places, besides this eminent City, viz. (c) two in the Continent, and another in the same Island. Near the Island of this famous City stood Palestyris, or Old Tyre, mentioned by Tolubus, and called a strong City even at the division of the Land of Canaan, which happened about two hundred years before the building of that whereof we speak. Now (d) Foephilus maketh the Temple of Jerusalem to have been founded in the eleventh year of the reign of Hiram King of Tyre, who was son to Abebaal, by Foephilus called Abibalus, and by Eusebius, Abelbalus. Hiram, or Huram according to the Hebrews, (by the Greeks called Iron and Syron (for Horum) by Eupolemus) was a great friend to David, and supplied Solomon his Son with materials, and work-men for building the Temple. He also propounded hard questions to Solomon to be unfolded, as Menander testified, who translated the Tyrian Annals into the Greek language: He strengthened, and enlarged the City of Tyre, as Dias also wrote, and reigned thirty four years. After him his Son Belesartus reigned seven, and Abdastartus nine, who being slain by the four Sons of his Nurle, the eldest of them reigned twelve years. Then Asartus the son of Belesartus twelve, his brother Asartus nine, who was slain by his brother Pheller. Pheller reigned but eight months, being killed by Ithobalus the Priest of Asarta, who reigned thirty two years; after him Badecorus his son six, then Mettinus his son nine, and lastly, Pygmalion twenty, in the seventh of whose reign his sister Dido built the City of Carthage in Africk.
Therefore from the beginning of Hiram's reign to the building of Carthage intervened one hundred and fifty five years and eight months; and whereas the Temple was founded at Jerusalem in the twelfth of his reign, from the building of the Temple to that of Carthage passed one hundred and forty three years and eight months, as Foephilus collecteth from the Testimony of Menander the Ephesian, in his first book against Apion.

5. But Appian in his History of the Punic Wars, writeth that Carthage was built by the Tyrians, fifty years before the destruction of Troy, which precedeth the former date three hundred and sixty years. He nameth as founders Zorus and Carchedon, according to the opinion of the Greeks, who thought them the Captains of the Colony; whereas Tyros, or Zor, was the name of the Metropolis, and Carchedon of the new City, Carthada signifying a New City, in the Phœnician language, as Solinus witnesseth. Strabo again will have the Phœnicians to have led out Colonies as far as the Pillars of Hercules, and planted some, a little after the Trojan War, upon the Maritime Coasts of Africk, with which Virgil closing, feigneth Dido to have reigned at Carthage at that time; whereas the fact as Servius upon the Poet affirmeth the whole story of Æneas and Dido to be a fiction

fiction, and utterly against the course of History. Further, Eusebius noteth that some accounted Carthage built one hundred and forty three years after the destruction of Troy, about the 2966 year of the World, and the twenty third of the reign of David, one hundred and sixty four years or more before the time assigned to Dido by Menander. For the reconciliation of these several assertions it must be considered that Carthage consisted of three parts, viz. Cohon, Megara, and Byrsa, whereof the first was the Port, and the last the Citadel com-passed about by the second, called Magalia and Magaria, but more truly Megara, signifying properly in the Punic Language, dwellings in a strange Country. 'Tis conceived that these might be built at several times; as that part about the Haven before the War of Troy, the other some time within one hundred and forty four years after the destruction of it, which might rightly in respect of the other, be called Carthada, or New Town; and lastly, the Byrsa by Dido one hundred and sixty six years after. For the Phœnicians being masters at Sea, might according to their pleasure, as they had occasion, send out Colonies, which they began to do from the time that Foebus expelled them out of the Land of Canaan. The Greeks themselves believed that Cadmus made an expedition into Africk, and there built many Cities, as appeareth out of Nomius; and he built the Citadel at Thebes about the time of Foebus. In Procopius his age, who lived under Justinian the Emperour, about the five hundred and fourth year of Christ, the two Pillars were yet standing, which those Canaanites erected that fled from the Face of Foebus, in that part of Africk, called Tingitana, as the inscription testified, which we formerly mentioned, and Eusebius writeth that these same Canaanites led Colonies into Tripolis in Africk. Lastly, amongst feveral other Cities built by the Phœnicians, the most considerable, after Carthage, was Utica, some ten miles distant from it, which Aristotle, from the Phœnician Histories reporteth to be two hundred and eighty seven years antienter than Carthage, and Velcius Paternulus to have been built by the Tyrians a few years after Gades, about the time of Cadmus, who being contemporary with Saul, this City obtained the name of Utica or Ityca, that is (saith Bechartus) in the Phœnician language, Old or Antient.

6. Dido was Sister to Pygmalion King of Tyre, and wife to Sicheus, or Sicharbas their Uncle the Priest of Hercules. Sicheus being murdered by Pygmalion for his Wealth, the out of hatred to, or for fear of her Brother fled into Africk, with all he could take, and thereby disappointed the murderer of his prey. The Story goeth, that coming into Africk, she and her Companions were repelled by Hiarbas the King of that place, till they craftily desired to buy of him so much Ground as an Ox's hide would compass. The Africans laughed at their folly, and out of a desire to see what use they could make of so little Ground, swore to make good the Bargain. The Phœnicians then cut the Hide all into one small thong, with which they encompassed twenty furlong, and thereon built a Castle, thence, (saith the Greeks) called Byrsa. But learned men explode this Story of the Hide as a meer invention, and a fable raised from a false explication of the word, which in the Hebrew Tongue is Besra, and signifying a fortified place, or Castle, is changed into Byrsa for the better sound, because the Genius of the Greek language suffereth not S and R to be joyned together. Fustini out of Trogus relateth that Hiarbas
King of Mauritania sent for ten of the principal Carthaginians, and required Dido in marriage, threatening else to make War upon them. At their return they told her he desired some one who might teach his people breeding and manners, but none could be found that was content to leave his Country, and joyn himself with the Barbarians, whose Lives were like to those of wild Beasts. She blaming them all exceedingly, that they preferred their private commodity before the good of their Country, to which if need required they ought their very lives, they opened to her the whole matter, saying, that what she would impose upon others, she ought not her self to refuse. Being caught with this wile, she long called on the name of Sicheus, her husband, with many tears and great lamentation, then taking three months time for the doing of what there was necessity for, she made a pile of wood, as though to make a Parenation to Sicheus, and appeale his Ghost before her second marriage. Having killed many Beasts, she ascended the Pile with a Sword in her hand, and turning to the people said, that now she was going to her Husband, and therewithal killed her self. Before the name of Dido (which some make to signify Loved or Amiable, and others more probably Wandering or Erratick) she had that of Elissa, betokening a Divine Woman, or Virago, The Latin word Virago, in Greek written Ovirago, is in Eusebius corrupted into Ori-

80; and being applied as a name to the City, and not to the woman, by a misunderstanding hath much perplexed Polypius Scalliger and others.

7. Carthage being then re-edified, or enlarged by Dido, and the Colony she brought thither, about the 1312 year of the World, in the days of Fobah King of Fudab, and Febu of Israel, three hundred and ten years after the destruction of Troy, ninety seven before the first Olympiad, and one hundred and twenty before the building of Rome, was at first under Monarchical Government; but afterwards rejecting it, endured many hazards and hardships, which followed loose liberty, whereof most are briefly recited by Fustini in his eighteenth book; and those that follow. The (a) Philosopher compareth this Commonwealth with those of the Cretans and Lacedæmonians, saying that it was mixed of Aristocracy and Polity, as he calleth it. (b) Polybius saith it was composed of Kingly, Aristocratical, and Democratical Governments, and (c) Socrates maketh it Aristocratical at home, and in War Monarchical. As two Kings at Lacedæmon had the first rank of Magistracy with equal power, so at Carthage two persons, by them called Suffetes, and by Aristotle, and Polybius, and Corn. Nepos, termed Kings, yet only nominal! As the former were for life, so these were but Annual (in which respect) (d) Livie compareth them with the Consuls of Rome; and their dignity being hereditary, those were yearly elected out of any noble Families. Such were especially preferred as were accounted most eminent for Virtue, and able to defray the charges of their place. Aristotle commendeth this above the Lacedæmonian custom; all but that concerning their wealth, imputing it as an error to the Legislator; who ought another way to have provided for Magistrates, that they might attend publick business without any detriment to themselves, and so be preferred merely for their Virtue.

The Suffetes.

8. These Suffetes were more rightly in their own Language called Sophetim, the Hebrew name of those chief Judges amongst the Israelites, who from Fobus to Saul governed their Commonwealth, and the History of whose actions by us called Judges, hath the same title of Sophetim, for that interpretation which renders it Sophim (i. e. Overseers) at the first sight appeareth less probable. Their Office was to assemble the Senate, in which doubtless they presided and proposed. They decided causes Criminal, but their power was confined to home, nothing appearing of their meddling with warlike matters, or having command of the Armies. To these Suffetes was added a Senate, which because Aristotle compareth it with that of Lacedæmon, may be supposed elective out of the best fort and most ancient men, and the Senators it's likely enjoyed the dignity all their lives. How many they were in number doth not appear; but that herein this Senate exceeded the other of Lacedæmon, is to be gathered from Fustini, who speaketh of one hundred persons that out of it were chosen for Judges, to take account of the actions of all Generals at their return from the Wars. This Senate, as that at Rome, was the chief member, and as the Soul of the State, wherein the Suffetes propounding, as the Consuls there, all things of moment were brought to it: especially what concerned those great things of Empire: viz. Peace, War, and Leagues. The Suffetes deliberating with the Senate, if it was unanimous, and they resolved the same thing, their Decree was Law to the whole State; but if the Senate and Suffetes disagreed, then was the matter referred to the People.

Concio or Assembly.

9. In the Concio or Assembly of the People, any one of the rabble might speak his mind freely, and without danger contradict the Magistrates. The People's Decree concerning any thing referred, was taken for the ultimate determination of the whole and State, and being once passed was to binding, that it was not lawful to offer any thing against it, which Aristotle reprehendeth (and well may he) as too Popular, and too much declining from the best form of a Commonwealth, affirming this Constitution to have no place in the best modelled States. But Polybius dissenting from the Philosopher, where he compareth the Carthaginian with the Lacedæmon and Roman Commonwealths, sheweth that it was poised of the three kinds of Government, that the Suffetes were as Kings, the Senate held the place of Optimates or Nobility, and the People a convenient Power. Yet he addeth, that when Hannibal made War upon the Romans, (which happened ten years after the death of Aristotle), the State of Carthage declined from its antient and best condition, the People having assumed more than formerly, when the Roman Senate's authority was yet whole. This he thinketh to have much incommoded their affairs, and brought great advantage to the Romans. But what authority the People had during the best and most antient State

State, he no where in those Books and fragments that are remaining, declareth. Emmius thinketh that it consisted in electing Magistrates, making Laws, Leagues, Peace, and War; in appointing and ordering Negotiations, Customs, Tributes, and such like things, which concerned the generality, and respected the profit of the multitude. But some of these things seem rather to have fallen under the consideration of the Kings and Senate; however the disorders that followed, as in all other such Governments, will satisfy the Reader in his opinion of the excellency of Monarchy.

10. Besides the Senate there was a Council of one hundred and four men, whereof Aristotle only informeth us, and which, according to the round number, from him we may call the Centumvirate. They had power to chuse five men out of their Body, who had very large and great authority; Both these sorts of Magistrates retained their power longer than any other, enjoying it both before and after they came to be of the five, which thing was plainly Oligarchical. But in that they were not chosen by lot, but by the Suffrages of the People, and served without Wages, in that they alone took cognizance of, and judged controversies, and publick actions, none being remitted to others, as the custom was at Lacedæmon, this he taketh notice to be Aristocratical. He compareth the power of the Centumvirate with that of the Ephori at Sparta, whereby he teacheth us, that the power of judging lay in it. And as the Ephori were (according to him) Conservators of Popular Liberty at Sparta, protecting the Plebeians against the power of the great ones, so it is likely, from these words of Aristotle, that those one hundred men at Carthage were the keepers of the Popularity. Herein he preferreth them before the Ephori, that they were not chosen out of the Rabble, but the better sort of Citizens, wherein lay also a piece of Aristocracy; for mean persons being preferred to greatest places, do much hurt a Commonwealth, saith he, and have already enamoured that of the Lacedæmonians. Amongst civil Officers there were some that made inspection into the manners of the Citizens, as Corn. Nepos telleth us in the life of Amilcar, the Father of famous Hannibal, from whom they removed a beautiful young man called Adnabal, because he was reported to be more familiar with him, than modestly required. There was also a Prætorship which had authority to look to the Customs and Tributes, and also to prefer Laws, as appeareth by Hannibal, who being chosen into this Office, not only reformed the Customers, but also taking notice of the corruption of Judges, procured a Law for them to be chosen every year. But whether there were more than one of these Officers, is not to be discovered from antient Writers.

Faults in the Commonwealth.

Good Laws.

The disposition of the people agreeable with their government.

11. Besides the Faults before mentioned, Aristotle reprehendeth the Custom of chusing the Suffetes for their riches, which openeth a door to avarice and indirect practices thence arising. He also noteth it as a fault, that one and the same man had several Offices, which yet they esteemed as a great honour. One detestable practice they used of old, to sacrifice to their Gods humane Sacrifices, when any affliction or disaster fell upon them, and even their own Son, as Plato witnesseth, which custom they seem to have brought with them out of Palestine, every year sending thither such kind of Presents unto Hercules, as we find in Pliny. Another absurd Law they had, which forbade any Citizens to learn the Greek Language, lest they should hold intelligence with the Enemy, because one Sunior had he done with one Diomysius the elder, as Fustini writeth. This indeed was laudable, that this City abominated Drunkennes, and severely prohibited Wine as much as to be tasted in the Camp, as Plato recordeth in his Laws. This also Aristotle commendeth, that, for an encouragement to warfare, they had a Law which gave liberty to a Soldier to wear so many Rings as he had served times in the Field. The People were by their natural constitution, morose and surly, obedient to their Magistrates, tyrannical towards their Subjects, most dejected in time of fear, and cruel in anger, resolute in their designs, notwithstanding all force of flattery, and so infamous for their breach of faith, that the Punic faith or trust became a Proverb. As for their greatness and Dominion, the description thereof is to be left to it's proper place. Now must their affairs abroad in Sicily and other parts, he desired with the matters of that Island.

12. At what time, or upon what occasion the Carthaginians first came into Sicily is uncertain, (a) Livie will have them first called in by the Sedition of (c) Dread, the Islanders, in the year that T. Quintius (Surnamed Cincinnatus, as also Lib. 4. Penno) and Cn. Fulvius Mento were Consuls, which was in the beginning of the Peloponnesian

Sect. 2. Peloponnesian War, the three hundred and twenty third year of the City, fifty years after the passage of Xerxes into Greece, and consequently as many from the Victory which Gelon got over them; a gross mistake. (b) Fufin out of Trogu, ha- (c) Lib. 18. ving first related their impious custom of pleasing their gods by humane Sacrifices, addeth, that the divine powers being therewith displeased or averle to them, when they had long unhappily made War in Sicily, they translated it into Sardinia, and there losing the greatest part of their Army, received a grievous overthrow, whereupon they banished Mazæus their General, (by whom they had conquered a great part of Sicily, and done great matters against the Africans) with that part of the Army which remained. The Army taking this in great disdain, sent to the City to desire a repealing of the Act of banishment, and threatened by force to rescind it, in case they were thereto constrained by a denial of their sure. Their message being despised, they besieged the City, and after a few days took it. Mazæus calling the People together, complained of the injury, excused the necessity of the War, and inveighed against the contempt of his Victories. He said he would pardon all, but such as had been authors of the injurious Exile of their fellow-Citizens; and accordingly putting ten of the Senators to death, he restored the City to its Laws. Not long after being accused of an intention to make himself absolute, he was punished both for his paricide committed against his Country, and his own Son (as Fufin termeth it) whom being a Priest, he had crucified, for refusing to come to him before he had finished his superstitious rites, and when he came appeared in his purple and other ornaments, which Mazæus thought unfit with the condition of him his Father. Him succeeded Mago, by whose industry the wealth, dominion, and reputation of the Carthaginians, for matters of War, increased.

Mago. 13. Mago being the first, who by ordaining military discipline, had laid the foundation of Empire, and added to the strength of the City, as well by introducing Virtue as the Art of War, left two Sons behind him, Amilcar and Amilcar, who by treading in his paths, succeeded as well to the greatness as the Patrimony of their Father. Under their conduct the State made War in Sardinia, and fought against the Africans, who demanded Tribute for the ground on which Carthage stood, which also at length they constrained the Carthaginians to pay. Amilcar died of his wounds in Sardinia, whose death was ennobled by public mourning, eleven Dictatorships, as Fufin calleth them (by which seemeth to be understood no other than to many times sending out, or commissioning as General, with full power in the field, yet so as to be under the commands of the State) and four Triumphs: and the Enemies of Carthage took heart, as if with the Captain its force and power was also dead. The Inhabitants of Sicily then vexed with the continual injuries of the Carthaginians, betook themselves to Leonidas the brother of the King of Sparta, and a great war ensued, wherein both parties long struggled with various Fortune. At this time came Ambassadors from Darius (the Son of Hystaspes) King of Persia, commanding the Carthaginians to forbear offering humane Sacrifices, and eating mans flesh, requiring them to burn their dead rather than to bury them; and demanding assistance against the Greeks, with whom he was about to engage in War. They denied to afford any succours because of their continual Wars with their neighbours; but obeyed him in the rest, lest they should seem too stubborn, saith Fufin, yet that they stood not to their word, the testimonies of Plato, Diodorus, and Pliny, do certify. Whilst these things passed, Amilcar was slain in the War of Sicily, leaving three Sons: Annilco, Hanno, and Gilgo. Amilcar also left to many, viz. Annibal, Amilbal, and Sappho. Of these, Annibal is mistaken for Annibal the great; by one who hath made some short Notes upon * Fufin, and Amilcar his Uncle, for Amilcar Barchas Father to the famous Annibal, and Mago also for another of this name, that lived * many years after in the days of Dionysius the younger, and Timoleon. The Annotator wondreth what came into Fufin's mind to make Annibal (the great) the son of Amilbal, and well he might, if any such thing had been intended; he also referreth the Reader to the life of Timoleon, to find that Mago killed himself, and was after his death nailed to a cross, because he fought unprofitably in Sicily, which Plutarch intendeth of another person. Of this gross mistake of one (whosever he was) that took upon him to inform beginners, Students in History are to take notice and beware.

14. For this Amilcar seemeth no other than the very same that was slain in the the battel with Gelon of Syracuse, in the sixth year of Xerxes; Son to Darius King of Persia, from which was made a digression into the affairs of Carthage. With Amilcar perished one hundred and fifty thousand Carthaginians; the Captives that remained of his Army, filled all the Cities of the Island, and the State of Carthage was constrained to beg peace, having, as some say, made this War at the instance of Xerxes, that thereby the Greeks in Sicily might be diverted from helping their Friends. After this, Gelon was offered the Kingdom of Sicily; but he generously refused it, whereby he obtained the greater glory and love. At length, having fed all things well, he died full of honour at Syracuse, after he had held the principality about thirteen years. In the third year of the seventy fifth Olympiad his elder brother Hiero succeeded him. He rebuilt Catana, and changed its name into Asina, the Mountain of which name about this time brake out into flames, as fifty years after it did also. In the beginning of his reign he was much unlike to his brother Gelon, being suspicious, cruel, covetous, and turbulent: then caught with a lingering disease, he was much amended by the conversation of most Learned men. After this he fought prosperously against the Carthaginians, who now again returned into Sicily, overthrow Thrasybulus of Agirgentum in a great battel, and drove him to desperation: at length he incurred the hatred of the Syracusanians, uncertain for what cause, and shortly after withdrawing himself to Catana, there died in the second year of the seventy eighth Olympiad, when he had held the Principality from the death of Gelon eleven years and eight months.

15. After him his brother Thrasybulus seized upon the power, whose practices stirred up the Citizens to recover their liberty with the hastening of his ruine. For being set upon by them, he was overthrown, and reduced to such a strait, that he fled into Locri on the Coast of Italy, and there killed himself, having held the Sovereignty ten months from the death of Hiero. The Syracusanians now gladly resumed their liberty; yet not therewith content, that they might the more secure it, they freed also many other Cities of Sicily, from Tyranny and foreign Garrisons. But not long after they fell into a most pernicious Sedition. For excluding those from honours whom Gelon had brought into Syracuse for the establishment of his own interest, they themselves bearing all Offices of Magistracy, and governing the Commonwealth, though they took not away from the other the freedom of the City, the lately made Denizens not enduring it, conspired together, being in number seven thousand of ten thousand which Gelon had brought in. Three years after liberty recovered, they suddenly fell upon the two parts of the City: the Island and Acra. The natural Inhabitants overpowering them in numbers, besieged them close, and overthrowing them in a Sea fight, at length constrained them to acquiesce in the present state of things, or else quit the City, after the Sedition and tumult had endured two years. In the meantime by the conduct of Ducetius a Sicilian, those planters that Hiero had placed in Catana, were thence ejected, and the old Inhabitants restored to the place, whom he had cast out: now also the whole Island was restored to its ancient condition, the Exiles being repossessed, and new comers driven out, who settled themselves at Messana, the utmost part of the Island.

16. That form of a Commonwealth was now established at Syracuse, which Aristotle properly calleth Policy, mixed of Oligarchy and Democracy; which, how dangerous it was, appeared shortly. For, after some years, the State continuing in this form, and the number of Citizens increasing, one Tynderides, an eminent man, and very rich, egged on by his ambition, brought it into great danger. For binding to him the indigent rabble by his gifts, and using them as a Guard, he manifestly pressed towards the Sovereignty, but by the Union of those who were in greatest grace with the people, he was repressed, and when the beggerly sort would needs undertake his protection, killed in a tumult. When others not at all deterred by this example aspired after such power as threatened liberty, the people for to humble those that carried their heads highest, in imitation of the Athenians brought in the use of the Petalism. As they by their Ostracism removed such Citizens for ten years, who for their reputation and interest were dangerous to the freedom of the City, so the Syracusanians by the Petalism removed such like for five years. This kind of banishment, without loss of honour, or fortune, was called in Greek Petalismos, because his name whom any one would have banished was written in a leaf of an Olive, according to * Diodorus; both which in the same language were signified by the word Petalos. But this constitution, as the other at Athens, could not long continue. For those eminent persons who were most fit for state Affairs, for fear thereof by little and little withdrew themselves from publick business to a private life. Hereby the Commonwealth fell into the hands of bold, rash, unskilful, and the naughtiest sort of men, whence grievous incommodities and dangers followed. By these things the people were moved to abrogate the Law of Petalos, and the better sort returned to the care of the Commonwealth, after which it remained in quietness for some time, but again relapsed, as necessarily it must, from the infirmity of its Antimonarchical Government.

17. Abroad the Syracusans had War with the Tuscan in Italy; with Ducetius Captain of the Siculi, as also the Agrigentines, Trinacrians, Leontines, and Agelans in Sicily, wherein most commonly they had the better, and either fully brought under, or bound to them by Leagues, most of the Cities in the Island. Leontium a most flourishing Town was utterly destroyed when it now gaped after the Empire of Sicily, the principal Citizens being removed to Syracuse, and the multitude driven into Exile. Out of these motions they fell into the Athenian War in the first year of the ninety first Olympiad, concerning which we have already sufficiently spoken. Syracuse was so exhausted therein with expences and slaughters, that upon the brink of Ruin it was merely preserved by the wisdom and valour of Gylippus, a stranger of Sparta; and not only preserved, but made victorious to admiration, and enabled to return to the Athenians so great overthrows by Land and Sea. This War which begun in the fiftieth year after the recovery of their Liberty (by means of the Agelans, who craved aid of Athens against them and the Selinuntians) lasted not fully three years, leaving a sufficient warning to all, of the vicissitude of human affairs, and shewing, that they who gape after Dominion, and are buſie to enlarge their bounds, being carried out by the force of ambition rather than reason, often fall into a necessity of defending their own Estate, and sometimes lose all.

18. The multitude grown exceeding high upon this success, would not rest satisfied with its former privileges, but fo ordered the matter, that the temper of this Commonwealth more and more degenerated. Diocles a man of principal note, who had persuaded them to put to death Nicias and Demophanes the Athenian Generals, being of a most severe and rigid disposition, eloquent tongue, and great reputation for wisdom, persuaded the people to change the Common State, as Diodorus addeth, form'd this new Commonwealth with convenient Laws, whereby this liberty was bounded, and other things ordered as they thought, but falsely, made for publick good. This Diocles was in punishment of vice rigid, and inexorable, and yet most just in what was deserved by any man. His Laws were so well thought of by the vulgar, that many Cities of Sicily received them on their own accord, the whole praise of the invention being given to him, though he had others joyed with him in the work, that were excellent for Wisdom and Prudence. In after-times one Cephalus under Timoleon, and Polydorus under Hieron, were deputed to the making of Laws, but neither of them were accounted Legislators, but both Commentators upon him, who in the form of his Speech was something short and obscure.

19. Diocles amongst other Laws ordained, that it should be Capital for any man to come into the Forum, or place where the people was wont to meet, with his Arms, and that neither the plea of ignorance nor any other excuse should stand him in stead that fo offended. Afterwards it hapned that he himself having issued out against the Enemy who made incursions, as he returned with his Sword, heard of a tumult in the Forum, and so went directly thither, not thinking what he had about him. Being for this reprehended by a private man as breaking his own Laws, he cried out he would do no such matter, but establish them with his Blood, and therewithal killed himself. In the Commonwealth thus new modelled by him, 'tis uncertain what order there was, or what method was observed in acting. There was a Senate consisting of six hundred men, as we understand from Diodorus; but the same of it was very obscure, and the Power, as may be gathered, exceeding small, which maketh it be so seldom mentioned. The Multitude was sole Lord of all, and daily meeting together created the chief Magistrates, disposed of the Militia, placing, and displacing Officers therein, decreed War, made Peace, contracted Leagues and Alliances, exercised Power as to life or death, granted Indemnity, banished, and recalled at their pleasure. Other things of lesser moment were left to Magistrates, which were various, as in other popular Commonwealths. They were annual; as the Generals abroad, two, three, four, or more, as the people pleased; the General at home who was over the Militia of the City in time of Peace, and had great authority. Others were chosen by lot, as Judges, Treasurers, Censors, and such like, amongst which were also those that overlaid the matters at Sea, the City having an excellent site for trading. But things could not thus long stand, the Government being such, and wherein the wisest sort could do least, and the foolish inexperienced rabble was most powerful, though having no skill in State Affairs they little minded what they did, and only aimed at their private advantage. Hereby they were easily led aside by one, who cunningly, though underhand, wrought his own designs. For scarcely were eight years passed over from the overthrow of the Athenians, when Dionysius the Son of Hermocrates, a man of a subtle Head, and deep diffimulation, so fooled the multitude, as obtaining from it a Guard for his Person, he invaded the Tyranny in the fourth year of the ninety third Olympiad, the very fame that the City of Athens was yielded up to Alexander. How this was effected must more particularly be related, to let the Reader behold the danger of Antimonarchical Government, and the happiness of a People under that of hereditary Kings.

20. The Citizens of Aggesta (who had entered into League with Athens against the Syracusans, and been cause of the Athenian War, by reason of the controversy betwixt the Selinuntians and them about some Grounds) were in great fear after the overthrow of their Friends to be called to account, and quitted those Grounds for which they had contended. But their adversaries not resting satisfied with the restitution of these Territories, but seizing also upon part of the adjoining Region, they sent to Carthage for help, giving up themselves into their protection. The Carthaginians were very desirous to be masters of this City, so fit for their purpose of Conquering Sicily, but on the other hand they stood in fear of the Syracusans, who had so lately grappled with, and worsted the Power of Athens. Yet their Ambition prevailing, they promised them aid, which they committed to the care of Hannibal, then one of their principal Magistrates, giving him Commission to make War if the case should so require. After the death of Amilcar the Affairs of Carthage had been managed by his, and his Brothers Sons, being six in number, under whose conduct War was made upon the Moors and Numidians; and the Africans were also constrained to remit the Tribute which had been formerly paid them for the site of the City. Now it was, that this great and numerous Family being dangerous to the liberty of the City, by doing and judging all things, one hundred Judges were chosen from amongst the Senators, who received an account from the Generals at their return from the War, that by this awe they might fo manage Affairs abroad, as having an Eye upon Justice, and the Laws at home. To Amilcar in Sicily succeeded his Son Amilco, who having good success in the War, both by Land and Sea, on a sudden lost his Army by the force of Pestilence, for which disaster there was a sad mourning at Carthage (as it is largely described by Justin) and he at his return killed himself. Hannibal was his Brothers Son, being the Grandson of Amilcar by his Son Gescio, or Gisco, * as Diodorus informeth us.

21. Hannibal having an inbred Hatred against all Greeks, and an earnest desire by his own acts to redeem the credit of his Family, was glad of an opportunity to gratify his Country, and near upon seventy years after the overthrow, and death of his Grand-Father, undertook the Employment. He sent to the Syracusans, referring the matter betwixt the two Cities unto them, that the Selinuntians refusing to stand to any award, as he knew they would, a more specious pretence might be obtained for the War. They accordingly opposing it, the Syracusans decreed to hold them as Allies and Confederates, and also to be at Peace with the Carthaginians; but the two concerned Cities falling upon each other, both Syracuse and Carthage was thereby drawn into the Quarrel. Hannibal then having both in Spain and Africa made great preparations, the next year landed at Lilybæum the most Southern Cape of Sicily towards Africk, and setting upon the Selinuntians at unawares with a vast Army, took their City in the tenth day of the Siege, wherein he made Captive seven thousand persons, sixteen thousand being slain, and two thousand and six hundred escaped to Agrirentum. He permitted Empedion and his kindred to people it anew, under condition of paying Tribute to Carthage. This was the condition of Selinus, after it had stood two hundred and forty two years from its first founding by the Megarans, who being defended from Megara in Greece first came into Sicily under conduct of Lamis, and built a Town upon the River Pantacius, called Trotilus. Thence Lamis departing with some of his Colony went to the Leontines and Chalcidians, with whom having lived some time he was driven out by them, and planting some Inhabitants in Thapsus, after his death they left the place, and under the conduct of Hyblon the Sicilian King, who betrayed the Country, inhabited Megara, and were called Hybleans. After two hundred and forty five years they were driven hence by Gelon of Syracuse, but one hundred and forty five years before this, they tent out a Colony with Pamphilus, which built Selinus.

And Zeuxippe.

22. Hannibal from Selinus marched to Himera, having a particular grudge against that place for his Grand-father's death. Falling on it with all his might, he was repulsed for a little time by the resolute valour of the Inhabitants, but the Wall being beaten down his Engines, he thortly took it. Many Women and Children had withdrawn themselves out of the City; of those men which he took he carried up three thousand to the Hill where his Grandfather had been slain, and there killed them, being before used with all kinds of indignities; then rased he the City which had been inhabited two hundred and forty years, and dismissing his Mercenaries and Subjects of Sicily departed home, where he was received with greatest expressions of Honour and affection for having done in three months what other Captains would have required far larger time to effect. After his departure, Hermocrates the Syracusan (who having been sent as General to the assistance of the Lacedaemonians, was condemned to banishment in his absence, through the malice of his Enemies) returned with a considerable Force into Sicily, and to ingratiate himself with his Country-men, repopled Selinus, and fell upon the Tributaries of Carthage. The more still to ingratiate himself, he took up the Bones of those Syracusans that fell at Himera, and in a carriage sent them to the City, well knowing, that this would procure as love to him, so envy and hatred to Dioctes his main adversary, who having been the Captain of the Slain, had taken no care for their Burial. Dioctes much opposed their publick Sepulture, but the People resolutely decreed it, then banished him, and yet they recalled not Hermocrates, being jealous lest he should improve his power and abilities to the making of himself absolute. He then being in despair of returning by fair means, attempted to do it by force, and getting in to the City, was amongst his complices killed by the multitude.

23. In the second year of the ninety third Olympiad, the Syracusans sent to Carthage to complain of the late War, and to desire that for the time to come they would forbear all hostility, to which they returned an ambiguous answer, and made all possible provision for an Army, wherewith to subdue the whole Island. Before they transported any Forces they sent a Colony thither, which at the hot Waters built a City, and called it Therma. The year following they ordered Hannibal to go over as General, who excusing himself by reason of his Age, they joynt with him Imilco the Son of Hanno, one of the same Family. These two Generals then made Levies throughout Africk, hired Soldiers out of Spain, the Islands Baleares, and Italy; and got together an Army of twelve hundred thousand men according to Timæus, but after Ephorus his reckoning three hundred thousand. As they were passing over, the Syracusans met them, and sunk fifteen of their Vessels, but with the rest Hannibal passed safe over, and fell upon the rich and stately City of Agrirentum, which contained two hundred thousand Persons. The Agrirentines wanted not assistance from their Friends, all the Greek Cities being deeply concerned in their welfare; and the Syracusans gave the besiegers a considerable defeat, who demolishing the Tombs and Monuments the better to get to the Walls, had thereby pulled down a Pestilence upon themselves, saith Diodorus, wherein Hannibal died. But Imilco (or Imilcar) thereby not discouraged, continued the Siege, expiating the offence, as he thought, by sacrificing a Boy to Saturn, and drowning a company of Priests in the Sea as an offering to Neptune. His Soldiers mutinying for Provisions, he supplied, by taking of the Ships which loaded with necessities were sent from Syracuse to the besieged. Hereby he starved them within, and constrained them to quit the City, being guarded to Gela by armed men. Imilcar found extraordinary sect 2, plunder in it, wherof some rarities he sent to Carthage, amongst which was Phalaris his Bull, though Timæus the Historian carping at all others, by denying that there was ever any such thing, is justly censured by Diodorus. For Scipio Africanus the younger, two hundred and sixty years after, having destroyed Carthage, restored this Engine to the Agrirentines, with whom it was yet remaining when Diodorus wrote his History.

24. Imilcar having, after a Siege of eight months, thus mastered Agrirentum, a little before the Winter solstice, destroyed it not presently, that therein he might quarter his Soldiers that Winter. All the Island was struck with great fear upon report of what had hapned; some of the Sicilians departed to Syracuse, and others transported their wives and children with their wealth into Italy. The Agrirentines being got safe to Syracuse, accused their Captains, as having betrayed their Country, and the Syracusans were also blamed by the rest for having chosen such Generals, as by their dishonesty had brought Sicily into extreme danger. A meeting being had at Syracuse, and great fear of a War possessing all men's minds, none dared to speak one word, or give any advice. All sticking at the matter, at length stood up Dionysius the Son of Hierocrates, and accusing the Captains of having betrayed Agrirentum, earnestly moved the People to punish them forthwith, and not stay the time prefixed by Law. For this unlawful and seditious motion, the Magistrates fined him; but one Philistus a wealthy man, who afterwards wrote his History, bade him proceed, promising to pay his fine, though it were a whole day together. Animated hereby he proceeded, urging that the Captains had been corrupted to betray the interest of Sicily, and accusing others of the better sort of Citizens as affecting Oligarchy. He therefore moved that new Officers might be created, such as were not eminent for power, but good will towards the People, for that the other usurping dominion despised the common fort, and made their own markers out of the publick; whereas those being of lower fortunes, by a consciousness of their own weakness could not attempt such a matter.

tricks for making himself
absolute.

25. Having discoursed these things fitly to the humour of the multitude, and his own design, he made no small impression in the minds of the Vulgar, who having had the fidelity of the Captains in question before, gave credence to these slanders, and deposing them, made new, amongst which was Dionysius, having got much credit for his valour against the Carthaginians. The foundation thus laid, he beat his head all manner of ways how to accomplish his device, and resolved if possible to get his Colleagues removed. For this purpose, he never would meet in council with them, giving out they hatched clandestine designs against the State, and seeing the Citizens much affrighted at an approaching War, procured the Exiles to be called home, hoping that they being obnoxious to him, and desirous of innovation, would be fit for his purpose, taking great delight in seeing their Enemies killed, and their goods sold, their own Estates being restored to them. At this time it hapned that a Sedition falling out in Gela, he had an opportunity to lead thither two thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse, where procuring their principal men to be put to death, and their Estates confiscated, he thereby much ingratiated himself with the multitude and Soldiers. At his return he found the People just departing from the shows of the Theatre, which asking him news, he said he knew none, but that their Governours were greater Enemies to the State than the Carthaginians, by whose Batteries they now kept holy-day, and who fleecing the Commonwealth, cheated the Soldiers of their wages. Now was an innumerable Army hovering upon the borders, and ready to invade, which they not at all regarded. This he understood a little before, but now fully, having received a message from Imilco that desired his conivance. Wherefore for his part he would lay down his Office, not induring that others making merchandize of the Commonwealth, he alone should, together with the Citizens, bear the burthen, and undergo the danger; and yet also be accounted as treacherous as the rest. For this night every man in great fear went home to his house. The next day he called them together, and loading his Colleagues with great invectives, so stirred the multitude, that some beginning to cry out he was to be made Dictator, for that they had formerly had experience how convenient the conduct of a single Person was, by the example of Gelon his Victory over Amilcar, the multitude out of hand created him General with full power. Then to bind fast the Soldiers to him, he procured a Degree for double pay, alleging that it would make them more valiant in that time of danger, and bidding the People take no thought about raising money.

26. The wiser sort had all along sufficiently understood whither these actions tended, but the multitude stopped their ears against all accusations, as proceeding from the malice of the great ones. But now upon further consideration they began to suspect him, and repent they had put the power out of their own hands, which he being aware of, left the discontent should to seize upon the generality as thereby to procure him any let or hindrance in the full completing of his design, he drew out the Army to Leontium, which now was used as a Fortress or Garrison, and there shutting himself close up, pretended a great conspiracy against his life. The day following he called the multitude together, and, alleging many probable reasons to persuade them to believe the danger, obtained to have six hundred men as a guard for his person, which he should chuse out where he pleased. This number he increased to one thousand, picked out, and consisting of such as were desperate in fortune, and thereupon backed with stomach and resolution. He called the Mercenaries, and engaged them to him with good words; then new modelling the Army, gave such commands therein as he knew would best serve his own turn: he gave free admission to all Exiles and malefactors, knowing such would be effectual for all his purposes. Having thus in imitation of Pisistratus got him a guard, and made himself Tyrant, at his return to Syracuse he openly shewed himself such, placing his Tent in the Arceus. The People murmured in vain, being beset with strangers and mercenaries at home, and in continual fear of a War hanging over them from abroad. To establish himself he took to wife the daughter of Hermocrates, who did such service against the Athenians; and was slain in attempting to seize on the City: he also gave his own sister in marriage to his wives Brother, thinking it his interest to be allied to so great a Family. Then assembling the People, by his devices he procured Daphneus and Demarchus the most potent of his Adversaries to be put to death; and so from a Scribe and a man of mean condition, he became Master of the greatest Greek City, continuing such for thirty eight years, unto his end.

27. Imilcar having wintered in Acragentum, at Spring-time razed the City, and then fell upon Gela. The Inhabitants betook themselves to Dionysius for help; but his endeavours not well succeeding, they were forced to quit the Town, and leave it also to the disposal of the Enemy. Dionysius made the Citizens of Camerina to do the same, possessing them with a fear of the Carthaginians, so that departing thence in haste, some with their Gold and Silver, others with their Wives and Children only, and the ways being full of both sexes and ages, who miserably thinned servitude by Exile, the Syracusan Horsemen pitied them exceedingly, and accounting this but a fetch of their Tyrant, to make himself Master of the place, conspired how they might kill him in the way, and the rather, because they had observed how remiss, or rather indolently treacherous, he had been in the relief of Gela. He keeping the Mercenaries close to him, they could not execute this design, but rode fast to Syracuse, where being easily admitted, they rifled his Palace, and used his Wife too harshly that he died. They were secure of him as at a great distance from them; he conjectured the same, and in post-haste coming to Syracuse, set fire on one of the gates, and so got in. Then slaughtered he such of them as he could light of, as also of those Citizens whom he knew to be most averse to him, some he slew, and others he expelled the Town. Scarcely were things settled, when a message came from Imilcar, inviting the Syracusans, though conquered, unto Peace. Dionysius most gladly embraced the offer, so that it was made up on these terms: The Carthaginians were to have subject to them, besides their old Tributaries and Colonies, the Stunts, Schinnians, Acragentines, and Himerians; and also the Gelaens and Camerinians, who might inhabit their Towns unvalled, but be tributary to Carthage. The Leontines, Messenians, and all Sicilians, were to be free and the Syracusans subject to Dionysius. All ships taken on both sides were to be restored. These things confirmed, Imilcar passed over into Africk, having lost half of his Army by the Plague, which he razed also in Africk, that great multitudes both of the Carthaginians and their Associates fell thereby.

28. Dionysius knowing that the Syracusans now called of the War, would bufe their heads how to recover their liberty, to prevent such a design, fortified that part of the City called the Island, which he caused to be inhabited with his own confidants: he also divided the publick grounds to such as he thought fit, and admitted strangers to equal privileges with the Citizens. Having thus as he thought secured his estate, he resolved to march against such Sicilians as he thought most assisted the Carthaginians, and was about to besiege Erbessa, when the Citizens of Syracuse now armed, considering what an opportunity was put into their hands, and repenting they had not assisted the Horsemen in their revolt, resolved to declare for their liberty. The attempt generally took, the Citizens stood upon their defence, and the Tyrant was besieged, for whose head a great sum of money was offered. He was much cast down, and thought to resign his power, according as some advised him; but Philistus turned his mind, and made him resolve to venture all rather than do it. Bethinking himself how he might circumvent the Citizens, he sent to them, pretending a willingness to quit all, if they would but permit him to carry away his goods; and at the same time he dispatched a message to the Campanians (mercenary Soldiers of Campania in Italy) offering them large rewards if they would stand by him. The Syracusans consented he should depart with five ships, and then, as if their liberty was fully recovered, grew secure, remiss, and idle, distancing some of their men, neglecting their guards, and taking their pleasure in the fields: The Campanians allured by his promises broke in to him, some Troops of Mercenaries also came to his assistance, with which he set upon the Towns-men, and easily putting them to flight recovered his power. He hindered his men from killing, and a great number flying to Atina, he sent to them, offering them pardon, which some embraced, and others refused to venture themselves upon it.

29. When he had well re-settled himself, he made War upon several Towns in Sicily, some of which he took, and having an eye upon the Carthaginians, strongly fortified his City of Syracuse. He resolved with himself to make War upon them, hoping that all those Towns which in time of Peace willingly submitted to their yoke, would now revolt to him. Understanding that in the Athenian War a line had been drawn before Syracuse, from Sea to Sea, and thereby access into the Country cut off, with admirable celerity he raised a wall to prevent this for the time to come, labouring himself amongst the workmen, to cause them the more cheerfully to undergo the toil: Then did he make extraordinary provisions of all sorts of Arms, completely furnished himself with shipping, and hired Soldiers from all parts. Thus provided, he caused all the goods of the Carthaginian Merchants, and others dwelling there, to be seized by the multitude of the Syracusans, to whom now he carried himself more mildly, being very ready to begin the War; especially upon so profitable terms. Other Sicilian Towns followed his example, out of hatred to the Carthaginians for their cruelty, of whom such as were amongst them they unmercifully handled in way of requital, which taught that State to deal more favourably afterwards with such as they took, in remembrance of the vicissitude of humane affairs. Then dispatched he a messenger to Carthage, to denounce War from the people of Syracuse, except they would set at liberty all the Greek Cities of Sicily. They were much struck therewith, being exceedingly spent with Pestilence, but refused to do it, and as they might, made provision for resistance. Dionysius besieged Motya one of their Colonies, and chief Fortresses for War. Upon his ships Imilco, as yet not sufficiently provided, made an attempt, and beating up the Camp presently retired again; so that Dionysius became Master of the Town.

30. Ere he had taken Motya he besieged Aggesta, the Inhabitants whereof would not betray their trust, and made excursions into the Territories of their Friends. But the Spring following the Carthaginians having created Imilco King, sent him over with a vast Army, wherewith he first worsted Leptines, whom Dionysius had commanded to attend his motions; then took Eryx, and presently recovered Motya. He had Panormus betrayed to him: he took Lipara, and after that Messana with his ships, the Inhabitants having sent their Forces out of the Town to meet his Land-Army. When he took Motya, Dionysius brake up his Siege and retreated to Syracuse; now hearing that he intended to set upon Catana both by Sea and Land, he sent Leptines with the Fleet after Mago the Carthaginian Admiral, and he himself marched by Land to meet with Imilco. Leptines according to order made after as fast as he could, and attacking the Enemies Fleet, at first took diverse Vessels; but when he was now almost compassed with Mago's ships which were in number five hundred, not able to fight at such disadvantage, he was forced to fly out into the Main, and in his flight lost one hundred Vessels. Dionysius kept on his march, intending to fight Imilco; but was stopped by the intercession of his friends, who feared lest in his absence Mago might with his whole Fleet set upon Syracuse, and take it. he therefore

31. Mago by Sea with two hundred ships, and Imilcar by Land with thirty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse, besieged Syracusa, who for that the Citizens refused to give battle, waited their grounds for thirty days, and after that took the Suburbs of that part of the City called Acradina. His Army was taken with a sudden panic fear, and seized by a fore disease; yet notwithstanding he drew a line for the Fortification of his Camp, and built three Forts upon the Sea, wherein he put his provisions, and sent into Sardinia and Africa for more. Afterwards Polyxenus father-in-law to Dionysius returning out of Peloponnus and Italy with thirty long ships, and Pharacidas the Lacedemonian, to the assistance of the Syracusians, they took a victualling ship from the Carthaginians. They doing their endeavour to rescue it, the Syracusians drew out their whole Fleet, and engaging, took the Admiral Gally, and spoiled twenty four Vessels. After this the Carthaginians durst not stir abroad, and the Syracusians puffed up with this Victory, thought of recovering their former liberty. Dionysius coming in at the Port, called them together, encouraged them in the War, and gave them hopes of finishing it shortly to their satisfaction. Here before his face, one Theodorus in many words exhorted his fellow Citizens to throw off the yoke, and either take the Militia into their own hands according to the Laws, or deliver it up to the Lacedemonian General. But Pharacidas the Lacedemonian, according to his instructions from his superiors (who had now established an Oligarchy wherever they could, agreeable with their own Government and interest, or gave way to the power of a single man rather than that of the People) said openly, that he was sent to help them against the Carthaginians, and not to overthrow the power of Dionysius; so that the people were at so unexpected a thing utterly quelled, murmuring much against the Lacedemonians, who had now twice deceived them in the recovery of their freedom. Dionysius afflicted hereat, made shew afterwards of great humanity, to gain the affections of the people.

A grievous plague seized on the Carthaginians.

32. The Carthaginians were at this time seized with a most grievous Plague, which Diodorus attributeth to their rifling the Temples of Proserpina and Ceres, as the Meritorious cause, and to the unwhollomness of the place beset with Fens, as the effectual means that wrought the distemper. A grievous disease had formerly fall'n upon the Athenians in the same place. For before Sun-rise, because of a cold vapour that rose from the Fens, a cold and shaking seized on the body, then at noon a suffocating heat. So many men being gathered together into one place, the contagion began first with the Africans, who, though they died in great numbers, were at first all buried. Afterwards the number increasing, such as looked to the sick dying also shortly after them, none would venture to come near the infected. But besides want of attendance, no remedy could be had for the evil. For from the stench of the dead, and putrefaction of the Fennish Air, in the beginning of the disease a Catarrh, and then presently an Angina, or swelling of the neck, took the Patient. These were followed by a Fever, pains in the Spina, and numness of the legs, which drew after them a Dysentery, and Spots over all the body. Some were taken with madness, and abolition of memory, who wandering up and down the Camp beat all they met. At length all the endeavours of Physicians were void, through the vehemence of the disease, and suddenness of death, for on the fifth, or at the furthest on the sixth day they died in great torment. Dionysius understanding this sad condition of the besiegers, thought it convenient to fall out upon them, and sent eighty ships to fall on their Navy. The Land Army first arriving took two of their Forts, and slaughtered them from their ships, which as soon as they saw in danger, they again retired to them; but with little advantage. For the Syracusians boarded and slaughtered them in great numbers, and Dionysius, with his Land Army, fired forty of their Gallies that rode at Anchor in the Haven of Dafco. The night approaching broke off the fight, and then the Carthaginians sent to Dionysius three hundred Talents, begging leave to depart; which he granted (with exception to all Sicilians and other Mercenaries) being unwilling they should be quite defeated, that through fear of them his Subjects might be the better contained in obedience. After the flight of the Carthaginians, the Sicilians departed home, and all the rest were slain or taken, except the Spaniards, who gathering themselves into a round body, sent to Dionysius to enter into Alliance with him; which he accepted.

Sect. 2.

33. Dionysius being secure of the Carthaginians for some considerable time, provided against his Mercenaries, which badly affecting him, he prevented by taking of their Leader, and bestowing on them the City and Territories of Leontium. Then did he make new Leavies, and replanted Messana with its ancient Inhabitants the Messenians; but seeing the Lacedemonians his Friends offended with it, he removed them to another place near the Sea, which they called Lynceides, and wherein they did thrive exceedingly, Conquering and laying several places to their demesnes. Having fortified Messana, the Inhabitants of Rhegium (who formerly jealous of his growth, had shown their bad affection to him) conceived it to proceed from some design against their City, which stood over against it in Italy, upon the very Crag of the Promontory, where Sicily was supposed to have been broken off from the Continent, whence it had the name of Rhegium. They sent Heloris to besiege Messana, whereupon he determined to make War against them; but the Sicilians seizing upon Tauromenium, he first resolved to recover it. He continuing his Siege all Winter, in a dark night got a certain Fort into his Hands, and made way for all his Army into the Town; but the Inhabitants gathering together, and resisting, from the higher ground, beat back his men, whereof his hundred were slain, and he himself escaped very narrowly, after which the Agryntines and Messenians forsook him. The year after, he set upon Rhegium on a sudden, burnt the Gates, and set Ladders to the Walls; but was repulsed by the strong opposition of the Citizens. By this the Inhabitants of these Sea-Coasts of Italy, seeing how far his covetousness and ambition extended, made a League amongst themselves, and appointed a common Council, both for the resistance of him and the Lucanians, who made War upon them at the same time.

Dionysius his second expedition against Rhegium.

Rhegium.

34. Mago was yet in Sicily, and was once overthrown in Battle by Dionysius. The Year following his Superiors sent over great Supplies, gathered as well out of Sardinia and Italy, as Africa, to the number of eighty thousand men, where-with he overran the Countrey and withdrew most of the Cities from their Obedience, till he came to the Agryntines, whom he could neither remove by fair nor foul means from their resolution. Dionysius with his Mercenaries and Syracusians marched out against him, sending before to the Agryntines to be in readiness, who thereupon met him, and joined their Forces with his Army. Mago now in an Enemy's Countrey was fore-straitened for Provisions, which made the other resolve to draw out the War in length, and not to try his Fortune quickly by Battle. The Syracusians being earnest for fighting, upon his refusal forsook him and departed home. This put him upon a resolution to make Peace, which he accepted upon this condition, that the Sicilians should be under his authority; and so Mago returned home. After this Dionysius seized on Tauromenium, and then banished the greatest part of the Sicilians from that Town.

35. The next year but one, being the 3615 year of the World, into which fell part of the third year of the ninety seventh Olympiad, wherein Rome was taken by the Gauls, as some compute, Dionysius once more undertook an expedition against Rhegium. He landed his Army, consisting of twenty thousand Foot and one thousand Horse in the Territories of Locris, waiting all with Fire and Sword, his Navy, which consisted of one hundred and twenty Gallies, attending his motions all along, till at length he pitched his Camp near the Streights. The Italians inhabiting that part of Italy called Magna Græcia, hereupon dispatched away fifty Ships to help them of Rhegium, upon which he fell, and had taken or destroyed them, but that the besieged issuing forth, repelled him with Darts and Arrows, and taking the opportunity of a Storm, drew the Ships to Land; so that in this Fight he lost seven Ships with fifteen hundred men, and escaping drowning but narrowly, fled to Messana. Then Winter drawing on, he made a League with the Lucanians, who after his departure, for a private quarrel betwixt them, would not stay for it, which they might justly expect according to Covenant, but issuing out against the Enemy, pursued them into their own Territories, who then taking them at advantage cut off many thousands of them. The rest seeing some Ships sail by, cast themselves into the Sea to swim to them, thinking they belonged to Rhegium. But it proved Dionysius his Fleet sent under conduct of his Brother Lepines to aid the Lucanians; yet Lepines took pity of them, and landed them safe; he also persuaded the Lucanians for a pound of Silver a man

But hereby he lost the favour of his Brother (who hoped to devour both sides, and make himself master of Italy, when they should have sufficiently weakened one another) so that being displaced, Thearides the other Brother was made Admiral in his stead.

His third expedition.

36. Dionysius his mind was still upon Rhegium, to which City he bore mortal hatred, because some years before having sent to them for a Wife, they returned him answer, that their Hangman had a Daughter, which if it pleased him to accept they would give to him. Therefore the Year following he let Sayl come more against them, who then looking for no mercy in case he should take the Town, sent to him, desiring they might be moderately used. He required a Tribute of three hundred Talents, all their Ships, with one hundred Hostages, and then went against Caulonia, the Inhabitants whereof he removed to Syracuse, razed the Town, and bestowed the Ground upon the Locrians. But his design was not thus accomplished against them of Rhegium; his resolution was not to dismiss them upon the former Terms, but by taking away their Ships to prevent the bringing in of Provisions by Sea, that he might the more easily starve them in a Siege. Bethinking himself how with any new of Credit he might break the League, at length hovering yet about the Straights, he desired a supply of Provisions from them, pretending he would shortly return to Syracuse; but he put it off from day to day, excusing himself by his own indisposition, or some other pretext, so that plainly seeing his drift, at length they flatly denied to send him any more Victuals. This he pretending to receive with great indignation as an affront, he laid close Siege to the Town, and battered the Walls. The Inhabitants making one Phyto their General, armed all that could carry Weapons, and making many brave Sallies out upon him, burnt his Engines, and gave him a dangerous Wound with a Lance. But the Siege continuing, after eleven months they were driven to such want, as a Bushel of Wheat was sold for ten Pounds, and at length they were forced to come out of the Walls, and there graze like Cattle, whereas he was so far from being moved with Compassion, that he sent Beasts thither to eat up the Grass from them. Great heaps of Carcasses lying in the Town, and the Villages of the living being by Famine rendered like unto them, they at last delivered up the Town. Such as could redeem themselves with a pound of Silver he released, and sold the rest. Phyto the General, after grievous torments, he drowned in the Sea, with his whole Family.

His studies.

37. After the destruction of Rhegium, Dionysius lying idle at home, applied himself to Poetry, being heretofore much addicted to it. Whilst he lay before Rhegium he sent his Brother Thearides to the celebration of the Olympick Games, there to repeat his Verses, which by their baldness drew the auditors into such a distast, that they railed the Ambassadors Tents. He called together the best Poets from all quarters to judge of his Skill. He also drew over to him Plato the Philosopher, whom at first he used very courteously, but afterwards offended at him for his freedom of Speech, he brought him into the common Cage, and there for five pounds sold him as a Slave. The Philosophers coming over on purpose redeemed him, and then sent him into Greece with this Memento in his Ear, That A Philosopher must either very rarely, or very pleasantly converse with Tyrants. A year or two after this he put out to Sea with sixty Vessels, pretending an intention to clear the Coasts of Pyrates, but wanting Money, according to his custom towards the Temples of Sicily, he seized upon a Chapel near Argylla, on the Coasts of Italy, which being exceeding rich, he plundered of one thousand Talents, and got much spoil from the Inhabitants of the place, who opposed him. Being now furnished with money, he resolved to renew the War against the Carthaginians, and the next year drew divers of their tributary Cities from their Obedience. The Carthaginians made great preparations for defence, raising a numerous Army, which they committed to the conduct of Mago. He poured out a great number of men both into Sicily and Italy. In the Island, Dionysius overthrew him in a Battle near Cabala, wherein were slain more than ten thousand of his men, and five thousand taken: he himself with the rest retired to an Hill, where fighting manfully he was slain, and his men sent to Dionysius to desire Peace.

He overthreweth the Carthaginians.

38. Dionysius answered, that the only way to obtain their desire, was to quit Sicily, and pay the charges of the War. To this he seemed to assent, but allegedly had no power to deliver up the Cities, and therefore desired a Truce for some time to advise about it. his Father's place, trained the Soldiers, and exercised them continually, so as he brought them into a good condition for fighting, and then at the end of the Truce led them down, and gave battle instead of receiving Peace. Now were the Sicilians so puffed up by their late Victory, that the other took advantage of their carelessness, and so played the men, that though Dionysius in his wing, and Leptines his brother in the other, fought most valiantly, and the former prevailed; yet the latter being slain, his party was presently put to flight, in which great execution was done, the Carthaginians giving no quarter; so as fourteen thousand Sicilians are said to have been slain. The Conquerors departed to Panormus, and thence sent to Dionysius, offering to have the quarrel taken up, which he gladly embraced. Both sides were to retain what they already had, only the Carthaginians took to themselves the City and Territories of Selinus, with so much ground belonging to Agrigentum as reached to the River Hydruntis, and required of Dionysius one thousand Talents. Long after this he retired from War, but still grudging the Carthaginians any footing in Sicily. This moved him at length with great preparations both by Sea and Land to invade their Territories, wherein he took some Towns, wasted the Country, and besieged Lilybæum; but perceiving it very strong presently again rose up from before it. Then hearing that the Arcenal at Carthage was fired, he carefully behaved himself, and sent one hundred and thirty Gallies to seize on the Haven of the Erycinians, commanding all the rest to return to Syracuse; but the Enemy unexpectedly with two hundred ships well manned, fell upon them in the Haven, and took most of them; then winter coming on, they made Truce, and each departed to their own places. Not long after, Dionysius died after a Surfeit he got by feasting, for joy he was pronounced Victor in Poetry at Athens, after he had reigned thirty eight years, in the first of the one hundred and third Olympiad, A. M. 3637, three hundred and sixty fix before the ordinary Æra of Christ. It had been told him by an Oracle, that he should die when he overcame his betters, which he had applied to the Carthaginians.

39. Dionysius married two Wives in one day: Doris born at Locri, and Aristomache Daughter to Hipparchus of Syracuse, and Sister to Dion. By the former he had a son called Dionysius; by the later no Children for a long time (for which cause he put to death the mother of Doris, upon suspicion of having practised something upon Aristomache to cause her barrenness) but afterwards begot of her two sons and as many daughters. When he lay sick, Dion inquired of the Physicians concerning his condition, whether he was in any danger, that if so, he might move him about the sharing of his Kingdom; for that he thought his sisters Children might justly expect their part therein. The Physicians told this to young Dionysius, who found himself so concerned in it, that to prevent his Father's discouraging with Dion, he compelled them to give him that which laid him so fast asleep that he never could awake, and so he solely succeeded him.

40. Dionysius the younger at first gave such hopes of a pliable disposition, that Dion prevailed with Plato to return to Syracuse, thinking that by his instruction he might be made a good and temperate Prince. But Dion's emulators fearing he might be changed from his former course, which though bad in it self was more convenient for them, recalled Phylippus (one who was banished by the late Dionysius, and being a learned man, wrote the history of his life) that they might have one to oppose to Plato. He according to what was injoyed, and his private interest, upheld him in his extravagancies, as many other flattering Philosophers did; especially Aristippus of Cyrene the Scholar of Socrates, who had for great a command of his own temper, that he could apply himself suitably to all times and persons. Plato, when he came, found Dion in great troubles, being for his nobility and courage both envied and feared by Dionysius, who, four months after, seeing the People much addicted to him, banished him to Corinth, pretending he sent him thither for the good of them both, that the one might be out of fear of the other. Because he saw that this displeased all men, he sent him all his movables, but kept his wife and his son, marrying her afterwards by constraint to Polyarchus one of his Guards. This much startled Dion's friends, and Plato amongst the rest, by whom Dionysius fearing that something might underhand be wrought against him, he gave them good words, and laboured to keep Plato, who earnestly desired now that War was begun in Sicily to be dismissed; especially seeing his mind far remote from the love of Philosophy. By his importunity he got leave to depart, upon condition that, when Peace was made, Dion should be recalled, and he return with him.

SECT. 2.

41. When the time came, Dionysius earnestly desired the return of Plato, but would have Dion discontinue a year longer, who earnestly besought Plato to return to Syracuse, for that it was reported that the Prince now was wonderfully taken with Philosophy. He itily refused to do it, objecting his age, with the breach of Covenants, but being again urged on all sides, a Ship was lent for him, and large Letters were written, wherein the Tyrant promised to deal with Dion as his Friends should judge reasonable; many of the best fort also in Sicily and his acquaintance were lent to accompany him over. Wherefore Plato once more undertook the Journey, with intention to reconcile Dion to Dionysius, and reduce the Tyrant to a more strict and commendable life. But not long after his arrival Dionysius stopped Dion's Revenues, which Plato taking ill, once prevailed to have the stoppage removed, for otherwise he would be gone; but when the Ships were departed, and Plato's passage thereby prevented, he again sequestered the Estate. After this he fell plainly out with Plato, for holding that Faith was to be kept with Heraclides, who was suspected to have raised a Sedition, and put him out of his Court, so as the Philosopher was glad to take up his quarters with the Mercenary Soldiers, amongst whom all Slanders were spread concerning him, so that he signified his condition to his Friends at Tarentum in Italy, who with much adoe prevailed with the Tyrant to send him home safe. Such was the entertainment of Plato with Dionysius both Father and Son.

Sicily.

42. Though Dionysius had left to him an hereditary War with the Carthaginians, yet giving up himself wholly to Luxury and Slothfulness, he was unfit to manage publick Affairs, and therefore made Peace with them. But Dion being now at Corinth, together with Megacles his Brother, and Charicles the General of Dionysius, raised as many Mercenaries as he could, which not in number passing five hundred, he transported in two Ships of burthen into Sicily, leaving Charicles (or rather Heraclides) behind, to bring after more Ships; such was his courage, that he durst venture with so inconsiderable a Force upon so great a Power. After his landing, multitudes flocked to him as he passed through the Island, and out of Syracuse it self, whom Dionysius in suspicion had disarmed. To them he gave Weapons, having brought many over with him for such a purpose. By the time he got unto the City he was five thousand strong, which he easily entered, notwithstanding the opposition of those Captains that Dionysius had left there, who at this time was upon the Coasts of Italy. Upon his declaring to the People that he came to restore them to their ancient liberty, they made him and Megacles their chief Generals with full power. Dionysius seven days after returned and got into the Castle, which standing in the Island was severed from the rest of the City, whence he sent for some to treat of Peace, that he might gain time. The People overreached, sent their Commissioners, whom he kept with him, till seeing the Citizens negligent and careless by reason of their hopes, he poured out his Mercenaries upon them; but Dion with much labour repelled them, and slew eight hundred men. After this he sent again to desire a Treaty, but Dion answered, that his only way to obtain Peace was to lay down his power, and content himself with certain Honours; whereas he was much vexed, and took Counsel how any way he might revenge himself.

43. Philistus whom he had made Admiral, fought with the Syracusians, soon not inferior to him in number of Ships, and losing the day, lost also his life, having either killed himself, because he would not be taken, or been tormented to death after he fell into his Enemies hands, both which are said. The dead Dionysius offer half of his Kingdom to Dion, and afterward was content to quit it all, but he was answered by him, that he must leave the Castle, and be content with certain Goods and Honours; and it was agreed, that with his Movable and Mercenary Soldiers he should have leave to pass into Italy. The People hardly granted this, as being confident to subdue him by force; but he leaving some stout men to defend the Castle, departed in the twelfth year of his Reign, with his Treasure and rich stuff into Italy, undiscovered by Heraclides, who ere this arrived out of Peloponnesus with a good Force, and was let over the Navy. Heraclides being much blamed for this, that he might respect himself, persuaded one to stir up the multitude to an equal division of the Grounds, which being opposed by Dion, he out of emulation procured him ill will, and caused the People to create twenty-five Prators, whereof he himself was chosen one. Dion's Mercenaries by this new Model deprived of their pay, desired him to use their help in revenging himself upon his ingrateful Countrymen. He then took upon him to be their Leader, and marched away to Leontium and The

The Syracusians purified, and opposed them in their way; but being forced with loss to retire, the Leontines received him with much Honour, gave to the Soldiers their Arrears, and made them free of their City.

44. But ere long there was an occasion for the recalling of Dion. The Soldiers whom Dionysius had left in the Castle of Syracuse, being distressed by want of Provisions, resolved over night, that the next day they would yield it up; but that very morning appeared a Fleet sent to their relief, over which Niphus a Neapolitan had the command. The Syracusians issuing forth against it, had the better; but then growing secure, and giving up themselves to gozzardizing and drunkenness, Niphus thought a good opportunity to be offered for the redeeming of his Credit, and fell upon the City, sending some over the Wall, who killing the Sentinels, opened the Gates for his Soldiers. The new Captains of the Syracusians being drunk, could take no order for resistance, so as great slaughters were made in every place, the Garrison Soldiers issuing out of the Castle, and great plunder with many Prisoners was carried away. Now the Citizens saw that no help remained for them, but only in Dion, to whom they sent, begging of him, that laying aside all thoughts of private Injuries, he would now succour his distressed Country. He being armed by precepts of Philosophy against private grudges, marched for Syracuse, and was met by a number of old men, women, and children, who with lamentable cries implored his help. As the Garrison Soldiers were busy in Plunder, and had let the Houses near the Forum on Fire, he brake in upon them, distributing his men to the several quarters of the City. They fell upon them all in disorder, and burthened with Plunder, killed four thousand; and so forcing up the rest into the Castle, cleared all.

and slain.

45. Dion having achieved much honour by this act, was made General of the Land Forces; but Heraclides his Emulator still retained his Admirallship. This vexed him so, that he gave out some words that a Commonwealth could not be well governed by many, which procured him great envy, as if he thereby signified that he would get the Sovereignty over all. He studied not how to palliate the matter, but sought to carry on all things by an high hand, and in a way of Force; and either procured Heraclides to be made away, or connived at those whom he formerly hindered from doing it; after which he seized on the goods of his Enemies, and distributed them to his Soldiers. But presently again Money failing him, and having none to run upon but his Friends, he was constrained either to lose them or his Soldiers, who being also displeased for want of pay, the common people might safely revile him, affirming that the Tyrant was not to be endured. Whilst he with thoughts of these things tormented himself, there came to him one Callistratus (or Callippus) an Athenian, a most cunning dissembler and irreligious person. He told him, that seeing he was in such danger, both in reference to Soldiers and People, his best way was to have some friend, who counterfeiting himself his Enemy, should hold intelligence with his adversaries, and thereby discover all their Plots and Practices against him. This part, by Dion's consent, he took upon himself, and under this pretence really and indeed practised his destruction, which Dion's Wife and Sister hearing of, therewith acquainted him, but he regarded them not, giving too much credit to what Callistratus had promised. The women nevertheless brought Callistratus into the Temple of Proserpina, and there made him swear, that he had not at all plotted against Dion's life; but he minding no Religion, being egged on more forward to the accomplishment of his design, sent certain young men, natives of Zeugythas, in to him, whilst he was private in his Chamber, who being easily admitted, for the knowledge his Family had of them, fell upon and presently bound him; but being unarmed could not kill him, till one Eteo a Syracusian reached them a Sword in at a Window; his Guard hearing, but stirring not. He died in the fifty fifth year of his age, and the fourth after his return out of Peloponnesus, being much lamented after his death, though before called Tyrant, and what ever else could express him odious.

Callistratus was killed by his barbarous and false.

46. Callistratus after Dion's death seized on the Principality, which he held but thirteen months; for then Hipparrimus Son to Dionysius the elder, by Asinnachis Dion's Sister, expelled him, and placed himself in his Father's Kingdom, who he enjoyed two years. Callippus (or Callistratus) with Leptines went against Rhegium, which was held by a Garrison of Dionysius his Soldiers, which taking, he was there slain by Leptines, and Polyphron, it is said, with the same Sword

SECT. 2. Sword wherewith Dion was killed. After Hipparchus, Naxos obtained the Sovereignty over Syracuse, and then Dionysius recovered it in the tenth * year after his expulsion. In this time of his exile he made himself Lord of Loeri, where his mother was born, and tyrannized over the Inhabitants six years in a most cruel manner; ravishing their Virgins, and playing other pranks suitable to his disposition. There he raised a Company of men, and coming over on a seditious to Syracuse, there finding all men in deep security, he expelled Naxos, and erected his Tyranny afresh. When he was gone, the Loerians expelled his Garrison, and in revenge for his ravishing their Virgins tormented his wife and two daughters to death, by thrusting sharp Needles under their Finger Nails. The Commonwealth of these Loerians being very famous, is commended much by the ancients, not only Diodorus Siculus and Strabo, but more ancient than they, as Plato and Demosthenes; the former in his discourse which he makes to have been betwixt Socrates and Timæus a Loerian Philosopher of the Pythagorean Sect, concerning the nature of things, and Original of the World; and the later in his Oration against Timocrates, an Author of new and pernicious Laws. Something is therefore according to the nature of our design to be said of it.

Zalæus modelled the Loerian Commonwealth.

47. Zalæus (as he was accounted) a wife, just, and honest man, born of an Eminent Family at Loeri, was the modeller of this Commonwealth. Eusebius thinketh he flourished about the twenty ninth Olympiad, but Diodorus and several others making him a Scholar of Pythagoras, who taught in Magna Græcia, reckon him as Contemporary with Charondas the Law-giver of the Thurians, another of Pythagoras his Scholars, and who is famous for the strictness and severity of his Laws, which he is said to have confirmed by his death in the same manner as Dionides did his; the same story being told of him. According to their account he must have flourished about the eightieth Olympiad. In the beginning of his Laws, or his Preface to them, this to some appeareth to have been his design, to affect the minds of his people with piety towards God, as the Original of all Right and Justice, the Lord and Governour of Heaven and Earth, as also an hater and punisher of wickedness. Then prescribed he Laws, not very many in number, but most effectual for the defence of Justice, restraining Vice, preserving concord and tranquility in the State, preventing innovations, and for the establishment of themselves; which as long as observed (and they were observed long) preserved the Commonwealth in safety. He thought a few stable and unalterable Laws well obeyed, to be more profitable for a State than an infinite multitude of weak ones, which are easily changed by those that have a mind to innovate, and he concluded, that the speediest way to the ruin of a Commonwealth was by change and innovation. That his opinion was true, the example of Athena abundantly demonstrated, which erring in this point paid dearly for it, as Demosthenes often complaineth; and of Rome also, which being infected with this itching distemper, at length was constrained to submit to the power of one man. It being almost impossible, but that popular Governments should reel and shake, what ever might happen to this inconsiderable City. He commanded his Laws to be strictly observed, and the Magistrate to proceed according to the Letter of them, without giving his own gloss, or pronouncing sentence according to his private fancy. To this purpose is most memorable of all his Laws, that which Demosthenes and * Polybius relate concerning one who should afterwards prefer a new Law, abrogate any old one, alter any thing in it, or dispute concerning the meaning of it. He was to come into the Council of one thousand men with an halber about his neck, where speaking his mind, if to them he should demonstrate his opinion to be profitable for the State, then was he to be dismissed safe, and the Law admitted; but if it should appear contrary, then was he to be strangled forthwith in the sight of the Council.

The form thereof.

48. Zalæus chose one thousand men out of all the People, in whom he appointed the Supreme Power to reside. It is not to be doubted but he ordained also a Senate of a far less number, by which daily and lesser matters should be dispatched: that there were also certain Magistrates and Courts of Justice, which had orders prescribed to them, we need not question; though we find one only Magistrate in * Polybius, called Cosmopolis, who seemeth either to have presided in the Senate, or the greater Council. Zalæus took care for preventing dissensions amongst Citizens, pride in the greater ones, and either favour or hatred in Courts of Justice. To cut off the pride and vanity of women, he forbade any to go abroad with more than one waiting woman, except the were either drunk, went out of the City by night, or betook her self to an Adulterer; to decree her self either with costly apparel, except he professed the trade of a Strumpet. He forbade men in like manner to wear Gold Rings, or a Milesian Garment, under pain of being accounted Whoremongers and Adulterers. Alien * mentioneth a Law of his, prohibiting any one to drink strong Wine, except by the Physicians order, though for health's sake, upon pain of death, and another, * commanding that an Adulterer convicted should lose both his eyes. Concerning the later a notable thing happened to the Law-giver himself, whose son being found guilty of this Crime, all the people were willing for his sake to remit the punishment, but he would not suffer his Laws to be broken, but to preserve fight to his son, commanded that one of his own, and another of the young man's should be pulled out.

49. (a) Demosthenes maketh mention of another Law, commanding that he who struck out his Neighbours eye should be punished with the loss of one of his own, as a Lex talionis. It hapned that a naughty man bearing a grudge to his Neighbour that had but one eye, threatened him to strike it out, though with the loss of one of his own. The poor man terrified exceedingly herewith, and judging continual blindness worse than death, with a rope about his neck came into the Council, and asked a Law, that whosoever should strike out his eye that had but one, or deprive him of the use of one who was purblind, should lose both of his own, or be punished with the like calamity and loss that he should bring upon his Neighbour. This as just he easily obtained, and this was the only new Law which in two hundred years time was brought in, the Infidelity of innovators being repressed by the severity of the former constitution, as the Orator observeth. Another there was, that a thing controverted should remain in the possession of him whose it was when the suit commenced, till such time as a definitive sentence passed; concerning which (b) Polybius telleth a notable story of two men that contending about a slave, the one having had him long in possession, the other got him into his hand two days before the Trial, and then the former went and taking him away, possessed him the second time. The Judges referred the matter as an hard case to the Cosmopolis, who determined in favour of the first and last possessor, but the other contended with him about the sense of the Law, to whom he offered that both of them should go with ropes about their necks and dispute about it. The young man told him, he was old, and expecting but three or four years longer to live, dying now would be no great loss to him, whereas he expecting a far longer time, according to the course of nature, should have the far worse bargain; with which facetious reply he handsomely ended the dispute, and the Judges confirmed the opinion of the Cosmopolis. (c) Aristotle mentioneth a Law of Zalæus, which forbade inheritances to be sold except in urgent necessity, and this was to be proved, which Law being neglected amongst the Leucadians, made their Government degenerate into too much Popularity. (d) Heraclides mentioneth other two, whereof the one forbade mourning for the dead; it being the custom of the Loerians to feast after Funerals. The other inhibited all retailing shops, commanding Husband-men to sell their own Commodities. This was the form of the Commonwealth of Loeri, called Epizephiri, from the Promontory Zepephyrum near adjoining, being a Colony of Loeri (e) Ozole, one of the two Loerians near adjoining, being a Colony of Loeri (f) Opuntii and Epizephiri of Phocis in Greece: whereof the other was called Loeri Opuntii and Epizephiri. Dionysius the elder having got footing in Italy, made himself master of this place; but yet left them to their own freedom, but Dionysius his son Tyrannized in the manner aforesaid.

The Senate beg aid of the Citizens.

Timon.

Platoch in Timon.

50. When Dionysius recovered his Principality over Syracuse, the Citizens were more inclining to one Hæcetas born amongst them, who at that time was Lord of Leontium; yet notwithstanding all their attempts he kept his possession. But within awhile the Carthaginians from without invaded them, being thus at odds within awhile the Carthaginians from without invaded them, and being within amongst themselves, which constrained the Syracusans to send, and beg aid of Corinth their Metropolis. Hæcetas with the Messengers sent some of his own, as desiring the same thing; but held secret intelligence with the Carthaginians, the Corinthians resolving to send aid to their Colony, pitched upon Timoleon for their Captain. He was the son of Timodemus or Timænetus, of a quiet and loving disposition, but a great Enemy to such as mastered their Neighbours, which he shewed effectually against his own brother, whom, having made himself Lord of Corinth by the help of some Mercenaries, he gave way to have killed, being in the room, and bursting into tears, whilst his two companions did it. Some accounting this act as unnatural and impious, though others commended it, he thereupon abstained from all employment for twenty years, till this charge was laid laid upon him. Whilst he was preparing for the Expedition, Ictas dealt underhand with the Carthaginians, that he might be advanced into the place of Dionysius, wrote to Corinth to stop their proceedings, and procured the Carthaginians to send to forbid Timoleon from setting foot in Sicily. He besieged Dionysius, but rising up upon other thoughts and returning homewards, the besieged followed him, and falling on his rear, forced him to fight. Having the better in this engagement, he killed three thousand of Dionysius his men; then pursuing the rest to Syracuse, got it all into his hands, except the Island. Timoleon being more earnestly pressed forwards by his fellow Citizens, upon discovery of Ictas his treachery, though he fell into the hands of the Carthaginians sent from him to intercept him, yet escaped, and arrived in Sicily with ten ships and twelve hundred men. The several Cities in the Island being accustomed to be deceived and ill used by others, suspected him also; but finding the Inhabitants of Athranum to be part for him and part for the Carthaginians, he using admirable expedition, fell suddenly upon the Enemies Camp, which taking, he was admitted into the Town. After this diverse other places joined with him, and with speed marching to Syracuse, he unexpectedly also broke into the City.

He expelled
Dionysius.

51. Syracuse was now held by three several parties, Timoleon's, and that of Dionysius, and Ictas, in so many several quarters; moreover the Carthaginians were in the Haven with an hundred and fifty Gallies, which carried fifty thousand men. It troubled Timoleon to see himself overmatched, but presently things turned very well for him. Ten ships came laden with men and money from Corinth to his aid, and Mamercus Tyrant of Catana, and diverse forts joyned themselves to him, which so discouraged the Carthaginians, as they weyed anchor and departed into their own dominions: Ictas being destitute of their assistance was quite discouraged, and Messana now also declared for Timoleon. Dionysius too being terrified at this his success, fled to him, and yielded up himself and all he had into his hands, whom he suffered upon his delivery of the Castle, and laying down his Principality, to depart Corinth, some four years after the recovery of his former estate. Thenceforth, having lost all by his sluggishness, he lived in great contempt and penury, so as he would walk up and down in poor ragged cloathes, frequent the Stewes and drinking-houses, gaze upon that meat in the shambles which he had no money in his purse to buy, and at last took upon him the office of a Pedagogue, in which he might best imitate his former carriage towards his Subjects, in tyrannizing over his boys. Ælian reporteth, that Philip of Macedon meeting him on a time, asked him the reason why he kept not that great and strong Principality left him by his father; to which he answered, That his father left him that inheritance, but not his Fortune, whereby he defended both himself and it. This was the end of the Tyranny of Dionysius father and Son, sixty four years after the first beginning of it, in the second year of the one hundred and ninth Olympiad, A. M. 3661.

52. Ictas very unwilling to lose his hopes of preferment, procured the Carthaginians to return to Syracuse. Mago filled the Haven with his Ships, and landing sixty thousand men, pitched his Camp in the City; Ictas then laid siege to the Castle, which the Corinthians now held from the resignation of Dionysius. Timoleon relieved them by Provisions sent from Catana in little Vessels through the Carthaginian Fleet; whereupon Ictas and Mago drew out a strong party and besieged Catana, after whose departure, Leon Captain of the Corinthians sallied out of the Castle, and falling upon the besiegers lying in a secure and careless posture, killed some, and the other flying, took Athradina the strongest quarter of the City. This the two Generals understanding, quickly faced about and returned; but mistaking of both places, out of a desire to possess both. Timoleon having secured Messana, returned with four thousand men towards Syracuse, whereupon Mago for fear hoised up sails and departed for Africk, having by his laziness and cowardize lost a fair opportunity of reducing all Sicily into the power of his Superiors. Afterwards Timoleon dividing his men, set upon such places of the City as Hicetas yet retained, and by force got them all into his power, without any bloodshed of his own party: then threw he down all the Fortifications and Monuments of the Tyrants, except Gelon's Statue, calling the People to the work by a publick Crier. Then he applied himself to making of Laws agreeable to a Popular Government, which yet he endeavoured but to little purpose so to restrain, as to prevent the inconveniences which formerly had their rise from too much popularity. In explaining and illustrating Diocles his Laws, he used the help of Cephalus, and Dionysius, both Corinthians. He ordained a new annual and chief Magistrate, whom he would have called the Servant of Jupiter Olympius, in memory of their recovered liberty, commanding that by his name the year should be signed, as by the Archons at Athens, and the Consuls at Rome. The first that bore this Office was Callimedes, a man of prime note, being chosen by the Suffrages of the People. Now whereas by reason of Wars, Seditions, and Banishments, the City was even exhausted, he recalled the Exiles out of Sicily, Greece, and Asia, which being in number ten thousand, he increased by a far greater, consisting of Sicilians and Italians of Greekish Original, to whom being made free of the City, he distributed Lands and Possessions.

53. Ictas having retired to Leontium, Timoleon laid siege to that City; but finding it strongly manned, rose up from before it, and went about to other places, to which he restored liberty, expelling their Tyranni. In this mean while Ictas went against Syracuse; but was forced to retreat with great loss. Timoleon's renown was by this time so spread abroad, that many Towns of the Sicilians, and others subject to the Carthaginians, sent to him, to desire they might be admitted into the social League. The Carthaginians herein were so concern'd, as to prepare amain for the renewing of the War, procuring Soldiers out of Gall, Liguria, Spain, and Africk. Mago had killed himself after his shameful return, and his dead body was nailed to a Cross for the mal-administration of his Office; therefore in the third year after they sent over Ardabal and Amilcar, with two hundred long-ships, and above one thousand of burthen, wherein were so many men transported as made up those already in Sicily twenty thousand Foot, and ten thousand Horse, which with warlike Chariots marched against Timoleon. He having composed the difference with Hicetas mustered all his forces, and judging it wisdom to transfer the War into the Enemies Country, for this purpose he chose out of all twelve thousand men, with which he marched away in haste; but in his journey a great mutiny happened amongst his Soldiers. For one Thrasias a rash impudent fellow, who with the Phocians had rifled the Temple at Delfhos, cried out, that Timoleon being mad, led them into most certain death, for that the Carthaginians in number so far exceeded them: and he advised the Mercenaries to return to Syracuse, and demand the pay already due to them. Timoleon had much ado to take up the matter, and one thousand utterly refused to follow him. But he rejoiced that the mutineers had already fallen off, before they came to any engagement, and with the rest hastened toward the Enemy.

54. By the convenience of a mist he got near to the Enemy undiscovered, then lying upon the River Crimefus. Ten thousand of the Carthaginians passing the River, he fell down upon them from the hills, and made great slaughter, and their friends coming in to their relief, the fight was sharply renewed, and the Carthaginians by their great numbers began to incompass the other round, when fell such a storm, as, together with the valour of the Greeks, forced them to their heels. Flying into the River by heaps, the Foot amongst the Horse, and Chariots, multitudes perished, being either pressed, wounded to death by the Swords of their Companions, drowned through the swiftness of the stream then increased by rain, or else killed by the Enemy on their backs: the Sacred band so called, consisting of two thousand and five hundred of the choicest Soldiers, fighting most valiantly, all died in the place. Near upon thirteen thousand were slain, and fifteen thousand taken, with two hundred Chariots (the greatest part whereof was broken in pieces) and one thousand brigandines with ten thousand shields; though most of the Arms were swallowed up in the water: Those Carthaginians that remained, in great consternation escaped to Lilibæum. Their friends at Carthage hearing of their defeat, were in no little fear, out of conceit that Timoleon would now come over thither. Wherefore they recalled Gisco the brother of Hanno out of banishment, and made him General of the Army, which they raised with money out of other Nations, not thinking it meet to thrust themselves into such danger for the time to come. But Timoleon returning to Syracuse, found it a convenient time to punish the mutineers, whom he banished Sicily, commanding them to depart the City before Sun-set. Passing over into Sicily they seized on a Town amongst the Bruttii, who rising and besieging them, took the place, and therein put them all to the sword.

55. Hicetas often mentioned before, and Mamercus Tyrant of Catana joyned with the Carthaginians against Timoleon, perswading them, for fear of losing their share in Sicily, to send over some Forces. They sent away Gisco, who hired some Greeks, the first which served that Nation. They cut off some hundreds

Sect. 2. of Timoleon's Mercenaries, and Hicetas invaded the Syracusan Territories, whence getting much booty he marched into Calauria, in contempt of Timoleon, who lay there now with inconsiderable forces in comparison of his. Hicetas being pursued by Timoleon, got over the River Damyrus, and then endeavoured to hinder his passage; but he pressing upon him, slew one thousand of his men, and putting him to flight, pursued him into the Territories of Leontium, where he took him alive, with his son Eupolemus, and put them both to death as Traitors to their Country, together with Euthymus his General of the Horse; for that in a speech to the Leontines he had scoffed at the Corinthians, saying they needed not to be afraid, though the Corinthian women were come from home, terming Timoleon and his men no other than women. After this Timoleon overthrew in battle Mamercus, killing two thousand of his men, whereof the greater number were Carthaginians, who thereupon earnestly begged peace, and had it granted on these conditions: That they still retaining all in their hands within the River Lycus, it should be yet lawful for any one to remove thence to Syracuse with his goods and family, and to renounce alliance with them, and with all the Tyrants in Sicily, which at this time had enslaved many Cities of the Island. Mamercus fled over into Italy, and Catana was delivered up to Timoleon, who betook himself to Messana, where he besieged Hippo both by Land and Sea, and taking him in his flight, delivered him up to the Citizens, who put him to death. Mamercus yielded himself to Timoleon, who having promised him he would not be his accuser, he cast himself upon the People of Syracuse; but perceiving them as he began to speak enraged against him, he attempted to dash out his own brains, and that not dispatching him, he was taken up and executed as a robber.

56. Timoleon, after this, drove away Nicodemus, who ruled over the Centorippini, and forced Apolloniades to lay down his power, which he exercised over the Agyneans, whom having restored thus to liberty he made free of Syracuse. Then did he restore all the other Cities to their desired liberty, one after another, and received them into confederacy with Syracuse: and it was proclaimed by the voice of a publick Crier throughout Greece, that The People of Syracuse offered houses and land, to all that would join themselves as members to their Commonwealth. Hereby it came to pass that multitudes flocked thither as to a new inheritance. Timoleon setting himself to the care of the State, corrected and explained the Laws of Diocles, and acted other things necessary, as he thought, to the well being thereof, till growing old he lost his sight, which calamity as he bore very moderately, so by reason of it he intermitted not publick business. Not long after, he died, and was buried by the confluence of all Sicily, the affairs whereof he had settled; games being celebrated yearly in memory of him, as for an Hero. This hapned in the fifty eighth year of his government, the last of the one hundred and tenth Olympiad, and the last also of the reign of Philip of Macedon father to Alexander the Great; about the year of the World 3668, the second of Arkes King of Perfia, and seven before the beginning of the Macedonian Empire, to the time whereof, what we have further to say concerning the affairs of Sicily, is to be referred; which affairs will shew, that the infirmity of Popular Government is greater than that Timoleon by his constitutions could heal the distempers thereof, and further evince the worth of Monarchy.

SECT. I.

From the Banishment of Tarquinius and first change of the Government, to the alteration made by the Decemviri.

Containing the space of fifty seven Years.

Consuls.

Whence fo called.

Their power.

1. THE Kingly Office being banished with Tarquinius (though both rebelliously and impudently) that of Consuls succeeded. Who were so called a Consulendo. Festus observeth out of Varro, that the word Consules was used by the Antients, not only for Consilium petas, and percontari; but also for judices and statuas: Moreover the word Consules is many times taken for providere, or prospicere. According to this Etymology various is the opinion of Learned Men concerning this Office. Some derive it from the duty or work of consulting the Senate, which was incumbent upon the Consuls. Others interpret it of judging, which, saith (a) Lipfius, I only read in (b) Quintilian, who puts the question, whether Consul was so named from consulting, or judging, Sec. ing that consulere was used also for the later, whence arose that phrase: Rogatus boni Consulatus, that is, judices; but not only Quintilian, but Festus also, in the word Consulas, giveth this Etymology. Lastly, some derive it from the end of the Office, which was consulere, or providere, as (c) Florus and Festinus's Code. But those Magistrates were not first of all named Consules but Prætores, which name, although it was common to others, yet stuck to them by way of excellency. (d) Festus saith it exprelly, and so doth (e) Festinus in his Novella Constitutione. Xonaras saith the name of Prætor continued till the Decemviri, who being banished, then at length crept in the name of Consul. But he should rather have said, that then the name of Fudex crept in; for it appeareth out of Levy, that they were called Fudices next after Prætors, before the name of Consuls came in. The Historian in his third Book speaking of such things as hapned in the first year after the writing of the twelve Tables addeth: In these times it was the custom not to call the Consul by the name of Fudex, but Prætor. (f) Varro out of ancient Commentaries confirmeth this, and (g) Cicero giveth the Etymology of all these Offices thus, a præcundo, judicando, consulendo, Prætores, Fudices, Consules appellatur. Some upon good grounds conjecture, that after the creation of Prætors, who were peculiar Judges, the name of Fudex was left, and that of Consul succeeded, which continued to the last.

2. The power of Consuls was at first the same with that of Kings, allayed only by plurality of persons and shortness of time, so that Cicero calleth it Regium Imperium, and Regia Potestas, and the Greeks chose to call them Hypatois, which significeth those that are most excellent or chief, as Dionysius telleth us. In the beginning they might imprison and sentence at their pleasure, having the power of life and death over the Citizens, though scarce the authority to make Peace and War, as Lipfius affirmeth. By degrees this great power was diminished, and that especially by two things, viz. Appellatio, and Interpositio, called Provocatio and Intercessio. The former was presently brought in after the banishment

Sect. 1. especially such as were defended upon him from Tarquinius Priscus his Grandfather, who had in no wife ill deserved of them. Brutus, according to his furious and malicious temper, very vehemently opposed it, saying, that it would thus little forecast in them to furnish him with money to employ against themselves; but his Collegue was for restoring the goods, and prevailed to have the Decree pass on his side, by one Vote only overpowering the contrary party, according to Dionysius. The Ambassadors having it in charge to labour with the friends of Tarquinius, that they might do something effectually, drew out the time in length, pretending they wanted carriages, and must sell such things as could not be removed. They stayed so long as to draw over to them some of the two notable families of the Aquillii and Vitellii, viz. two persons of this, and three of that. Of all these Collatinus the Consul was Uncle, and Brutus also had married the sister of the Vitellii, by which he had several Children, whereof two youths they drew in, having convinced them of their fathers vehemence, madness, and folly, and given them good hopes of great things to be done for them by Tarquinius.

7. These men met in the house of the Aquillii to ripen their business. There in the dark, a certain slave, Vindicius by name, fearing to be found in that room when they came in, and not with any intent to overhear, had himself behind a Chest, and heard their whole debate concerning their purpose of killing the Consuls; about which they gave Letters then to the Ambassadors (who lodged in the house, and were present at the meeting) to be delivered to Tarquinius. The Slave in this case knew not how to carry himself; for, to go to Brutus, and to accuse his own sons to him seemed an hard and bold attempt, as also no left to do it unto Tarquinius their Uncle; no private person he knew to whom he might communicate so great a matter, and yet a thing of such consequence he thought was not to be buried in silence, nor yet the discovery thereof deferred. At length he betook himself to P. Valerius, who had also a great hand in casting out the King. Valerius exceedingly struck with the thing, that he might proceed warily, first secured the slave to have him forth-coming, then sending his brother Marcus to seize the King's house, and watch the servants there, that they should carry away no Letters, he himself with his Clients and Friends went to the house of the Aquillii, where he got into his hands what was written to Tarquinius. The Aquillii being abroad met him at the Gate, where they endeavoured to recover by force the Letters from him; but he through the help of those about him drew them into the Forum, as his brother also having seized on other Letters at the King's house, forced some of his servants thither. The tumult being appeased by the Consuls, Vindicius related the Story, and the Letters were read. The parties said nothing for themselves; all were astonished and silent; at length some to flatter Brutus mentioned banishment; Collatinus shedding tears gave the prisoners hope, and this was increased because Valerius held his peace.

8. But furious and implacable Brutus calling both his Sons by their names (Titus and Tiberius) asked them why they said nothing to what was laid to their charge, and when they answered not at the third time, he turned to the Lictors or Executioners, and said, Now is it your part to perform the rest. They presently took the youths, and stripping them tied their hands behind them: then did they beat with rods, and after that beheaded them, he, whilst others could not behold so abominable a spectacle, feeding his angry eyes with the object, till all was done. Then left he the rest to the discretion of his Collegue and departed; after which a stupidity, horror, and amazement, as the things required, for a time possessed all. Collatinus his backwardness and delay encouraged the Aquillii to desire time to answer, and that Vindicius their Slave might be given up to them, and not continue in the hands of their accusers. The Consul was about to do both, when Valerius who kept the Slave all this while in the midst of his followers, would neither deliver him, nor suffer the People to depart without censuring the accused, though Collatinus was ready to dismiss the Assembly. He laid hands upon the Aquillii, and sent for Brutus, crying out, that Collatinus did unworthily, to impose upon his Collegue a necessity of killing his sons, and think of granting the lives of the other unto Women. The Consul being vexed, commanded the Lictors to take away Vindicius, so that they laying hands on him, wounded those that kept him, and Valerius his friends fighting in his behalf, the People cried out for Brutus. When he came he said, that by his full authority he had animadverted upon his own Sons, and left the other delinquents to the People, giving leave to every man to speak. There

Cleareth him self.

There was no need of this, saith Plutarch (though Dionysius relateth a great contest between the two Consuls) but the Rabble called to the vote, condemned them by all their Suffrages, according to which Sentence they were beheaded. Collatinus now, who for being akin to the King had been suspected, and whose name was hateful to the People, having by his carriage in this business offended the Generality, voluntarily laid down his Office and departed from the City, seeing now to what a sad pass he had helped to bring things, and too late repenting of his Rebellion. To him succeeded Valerius (the Comitia being held for an Election) whom Brutus much desired to have had his Collegue at first, but that the greatness of Collatinus carried it from him.

9. Valerius being with the good-will of all the Multitude created Consul, thought the first Fruits of his Office due to Vindicius, whom manumitted he made free of the Commonwealth, this privilege being given to him first of all Liberti or Freed-men, according to Plutarch (which Appian long after communicated to them all) and from him a perfect and full manumission had the name of Vindicta. This done, the Consuls gave the Goods of the King to be rifled by the People, demolished his House, and laid the Campus Martius which he had to himself, open as before, wherein lying Corn cut down already, they threw it into the River, and sending Trees that grew there after it, these receiving Gravel and such Rubbish that came down the Channel, at last grew into an Island called Insula Sacra; though some say, this happened in after times, when Tarquinius a Vestal Nun gave the adjoining Field to the Publick, and for that obtained great Honours, as these amongst the rest; of all Women alone to appear as a Witness in any cause, and liberty to marry, which she refused. But Tarquinius seeing that reason failed, betook himself to Force, and brought a great Army of Tuscan against Rome. The Consuls opposed him with another, and when they came to joyn, Aruns the Son of Tarquinius, and Brutus the Consul, with greater wrath and Fury than discretion, singled out each other, and so carelessly demeaned themselves, as both of them lost their Lives. A great and bloody Battle was fought betwixt the Armies, which Night only broke up, and with such equal Fortune, as neither party could boast it self, till at length either by the Voice out of a Grove, as the Story goeth, that the Etruscans had lost one man more, or some other way, the Romans were so revived, and the other discouraged, that the later forsook their Tents for fear, and being fallen upon by the Enemy, were nine fivethousand taken Prisoners, having lost eleven thousand and three hundred in the Fight. Valerius triumphed at his return to the City (leaving an example to posterity which was duly followed) and then buried his Collegue with great Honour, making himself a funeral Oration in his commendation, which custom Dionysius will have more ancient at Rome than in Greece; although Anaximenes wrote that Solon was the Author of it.

10. But when the People considered how Brutus the Father of their Liberty, as they accounted him, would not govern alone without a Collegue, and yet Valerius made no haste to take a Partner, they began to complain, that he had not taken to himself so much the place of Brutus (which yet not at all belonged to him) but that of Tarquinius, and were much offended with him. They confirmed themselves in their hard opinion, from his having all the Rods and Axes carried before him, and with them, in greater state than Tarquinius used, marched from his House, which was much larger than the Palace that he demolished. His House was very fair, situate in such a place as afforded him prospect round about, and had a difficult ascent; so that the convenience of the Site, considered with his Kingly port and attendance, seemed to threaten their infant Commonwealth, now an Orphan by Brutus's Death. His Friends remonstrating to him these particulars, he contended not, but that very night sent for Carpenters, who demolished the House ere morning: the next day the People were presented with a New and unexpected Sight, which fully altered their opinion concerning Valerius, who now wanting an House of his own, was glad to accept of the Courtesie of Friends, till the People gave him a place, wherein he built a Mansion less stately than the former. Further, that he might render not only himself, but also his Office, in stead of Terrible, familiar and acceptable to all, he removed Axes from the bundle of Rods, and the Rods themselves, when he came into the Assembly, he bowed or vailed to the People, thereby intimating, that in them lay the chief Power; which custom his Successors followed. Hereby, as to his own Person, he lessened not himself, but cut off Envy, and got so much Power, as he renounced of liberty, the People willingly submitting to him, because he flattered them, out of which respect they gave him the Surname of Poplicola, not Publicola; as Sigonius hath evinced. He gave free leave to any to sue for the Consulship, but before a Colleague should be joyned with him, being ignorant what might happen, and fearing he might either through emulation or ignorance cross his designs, by his sole authority, he gave birth to several Popular Constitutions, which at length produced such effects as showed the excellency of that Government which he had helped to destroy.

His constitutions.

11. First he filled up the Senate which had been exhausted, by an addition of one hundred and sixty four Persons, as some delivered the number. Then made he several Laws, which gave beginning to that paramount or rampant liberty, whereof the People were afterwards possessed. By one he gave leave to an accused person, to appeal from the Consuls to the People. By another, he made it death for any one to take upon him an Office of Magistracy without the People's order. A third gave relief to poor Citizens, by taking away the payment of Tribute. Another punished disobedience towards the Consuls, and appointed the mulct to be the price of five Oxen, and two Sheep: the price of a Sheep was ten Oboli (each Obolus was worth 1 d. q.) and one hundred the value of an Oxe. For at that time the use of money was but rare amongst the Romans; wealth consisting in plenty of Cattel, whence riches were afterwards called Pecunia from Pecus, and upon the ancient money an Oxe, Sheep, or Hog was stamped, which gave it the name of Pecunia: and hence they imposed upon their sons (as Plutarch observeth) the names of Sullius, Bubulcius, Capitavius, and Porcius. Another Law Valerius made, which gave power to any man to kill him unheard, that affected the Supreme Power, if he could demonstrate the crime. The last was a Law for the creation of two Questors or publick Treasurers, as Plutarch writeth. For it being necessary that the People should contribute money for maintenance of Wars, he would neither undertake the keeping of it himself, nor commit the care of it to his friends, neither thought it convenient that the Publick money should be kept in a private house: therefore he made the Temple of Saturn the Ærarium, or Treasury, and caused the People to choose out two young men to be Questors. The first were P. Veturius, and M. Minucius. A great quantity of money was now brought into the Ærarium. For at the Consul one hundred and thirty thousand were cessed or valued, besides Widows and Orphans. Thus much Plutarch delivereth concerning this Office.

The Questors.

12. But some give a more ancient beginning to the Questors, making their antienter than any Office, except that of Kings. (a) Gracchanus a Lawyer wrote, that both Romulus and Numa had their Questors, created by the consent of the People; however he saith it is certain that Tullius Hostilius had his. (b) Ulpian confirmeth the later, and (c) Tacitus seemeth to agree with either of them, affirming that under the Kings there were Questors, which the Lex curiata theweth, that was renewed by L. Brutus. He addeth, that the Consuls had power to choose them, till the People took that honour to it self, and first of all created Valerius Potitus, and Æmilius Mamercus, that they might follow the Army, in the sixty third year after the banishment of Tarquinius. Lipius thinketh this number should be read twenty three, that it might agree with (d) Dionysius, and also (e) Livy, who first mentioneth the Questors in the two hundred and sixty ninth year of the City, twenty three years after the banishment of the King, and differeth only in one of their names, having for Æmilius, Cæso Fabius. Concerning the antiquity of these Officers (f) Pomponius also the Lawyer agreeth with the rest. They had their name à querendo saith (g) Varro, because they made inquiry after publick money, and also Malefactors, or the actions of such, which later employment was afterwards committed to the Triumviri for capital matters, so that Questor is written as for Questor. Festus Lipius is of opinion, that though the Kings might have these Officers for the punishment of Vice, yet the Treasurers were not created till the change of the Government, when the publick Treasury being increased there was need of such. At the beginning they were but two by consent of all; and those were made for the City, retaining afterwards the name of Urban. But afterward when they were took to the paying of the Armies abroad, and selling plunder and booty, then were there other two made, to accompany the Consuls, as Livy saith, which hapned about the two hundred and thirty second year of the City.

Their number.

23. This number long continued, until all Italy was brought in; then was it again doubled, no fewer than eight being thought to suffice for the Tribunes of the Provinces; and this hapned when Silver money was first coined, about the four hundred and thirty ninth year of the City, as may be gathered from the Epitome of Livius's fifteenth Book. Not long after Sylla procured by a Law, that twenty should be made for the assistance of the Senate, as Tacitus writeth, to which he had delivered the judicial power: and for such an end did Cæsar cause forty to be created. The Questorship was the first step to Offices of Magistracy. Their duty, as is clear from several Authors, was to gather, lay up, and pay out the publick revenues, to keep the military Ensigns of Gold and Silver (for they then used no Banners) in the Treasury, to sell plunder and booty, receive, lodge, and carry out Ambassadors. They had also the government of certain places, as Offia and Cales. They received from Augustus the privilege of keeping the Senatus consulta, which formerly belonged to the Ædiles and Tribes. And the Emperours had a certain Questor of their own called Candidatus Principis, and Questor Principis, or Augusti, whose Office Ulpian describeth. This gave original to the Questor Palatii (saith Lipius) to whom was granted great authority, as to make Laws and Decrees, subscribe Petitions, return answers, and to be as it were the keeper or President of the Laws, which name is now changed into Chancellour. But to speak something of the Treasury, the Temple of Saturn was first made use of to this purpose, as Plutarch telleth us. Here also were the Libri elephantini, Books wherein the thirty five Tributes were written, and the Decrees of the Senate; but the Libri Linte, or the Annals, were kept by the Pontifices, who therein recorded such things as were memorable. In the were reserved for cases of extremity only. The Ærarium was afterwards called Fiscus, from the Fiscella, or bags wherein the money was kept, according to Varro. The first Advocatus Fisci was instituted by Atrius the Emperour, as Spartianus witnesseth. Amongst other tributes, the People of Rome had the twentieth part of all revenues of Corn throughout Italy, besides Salt, which was the device of Livy, thence Surnamed Salinator. Those that farmed the Tributes of Custom were called Publicani, and the principal of them Mancipes, according to Pedanius, whom Volateranus followeth.

The Ærarium or Treasury.

14. Valerius Poplicola having finished his constitutions of Settlement, held the Assembly of the People for the election of another Consul. Lucretius the father of Lucretia was chosen, to whom, as the elder, Poplicola granted the Fasces or bundle of Rods; which respect of age was ever observed by their Successors, till the time of (a) Plutarch, as himself writeth. This granting of the Fasces to the elder Consul; but no longer than till the Lex Julia, in the seventh Chapter, whereof this privilege was given to him who had most children, either ill in his own power (that is to be understood not Emancipated) or already lost in War. But if both Consuls had an equal number of children, he who at present was a married man was preferred. If both were husbands and fathers alike, then the ancient custom returned, and he who was eldest had first the Fasces. Concerning such who were both unmarried, had the same number of children, or were both married and had no children, the Law commanded nothing. But I hear, saith (b) Gellius, that those who were exempted, were wont to yield the Fasces of the first month to their Colleagues that far exceeded them in age, or in birth, or entered upon their second Consulship. In the mean time that Consul who had no Fasces, that he might be known by some note of distinction, had an Accensus (a certain Beadle or Crier, concerning whom (c) Varro is to be consulted) that went before him, and Liſtors followed with Rods and Staves, as (d) Dionysius, (e) Livy, and Suetonius do testifie.

Lucretius Consul.

15. Lucretius died also a few days after his creation to whom succeeded M. Horatius, who continued the Colleague of Poplicola for the remaining part of the year. Now was the Capitol finished which had been vowed by Tarquinius Priscus, and begun by Superbus his grand-son. Poplicola had a great ambition to dedicate it, but the Nobility envied him the honour, and stirred up Horatius to stand for it, whom when the other was constrained to be absent in the War, they joyned by a Decree to do it, and carried him up thither, knowing that in the presence of Poplicola they could not have prevailed. Some write, that by lot the War fell to Poplicola much against his will, and the Dedication to Horatius. On the Ides of September, which fell in with the full Moon of the Greek month Metagirtion (answering to August the twenty eighth of the Julian year, Clasius.

20. For the establishing of this Peace the Romans gave up twenty Hostages, viz. ten young Youths, and as many Girls, amongst which was Valeria the Daughter of Poplicola. All Acts of Hostility ceasing, the young Virgins went down to the River to wash, and taking an opportunity, when none were present to hinder them, got over the Water, and returned home. Some reported, that one amongst them named Clasius went over on horse-back, and perswaded the rest to swim after. When they presented themselves to Poplicola, he neither admired their resolution, nor approved of their return, fearing it would be objected as a breach of Faith to the Romans; so that apprehending them all, he sent them back to Porfena. Quintinus aware hereof placed in ambush a party to entrap them and their Convey; but Arans the Son of Porfena hearing of it, came in, and rescued them out of danger. When Porfena saw them, he demanded which had been the cause of their departure, and Clasius the principal, bestowed on her one of his own Horses sumptuously adorned. Then to give a further Testimony of his respect towards the Romans, besides other things wherein he shewed his Magnificence, he commanded his Soldiers to depart out of the Camp only with their Arms, delivering up to the besieged his Tents furnished with Victuals, and all other good things. Therefore for a long time after, when publick Goods were set to Sale, first of all the stuff of Porfena was cried, to preserve the memory of his kindness; and about the Court-house was erected his Statue in a plain and antient Fashion. For the next year Dionysius nameth as Consuls, Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius, of whom Livie maketh honourable mention, but not as executing his Office. He writeth that at the Bridge Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius both nobly defended, together with Horatius Coclus, sustained the first brunt of the Atruscans, but Learned men tell us that it ought to be written Lartius, not Largius.

War with the Sabines.

21. The Year following being the two hundred and fiftieth of the City, and the fifth after the Banishment of Tarquinius, the first of the ninety ninth Olympiad, saith Dionysius, wherein Isthmachus of Crotone was Victor, Aeschorides being again Archon at Athens, in the eighteenth year of Darius Hystaspis King of Persia, A. M. 3501. M. Valerius the Brother of Poplicola, and P. Posthumius Tiberius were Consuls. Now the Sabines made depredations in the Roman Territories, and proceeded so far in their Injuries that it engaged the Parties in a War: Marcus by the Counsel and Assistance of his Brother obtained great Honour in his undertakings. He overthrew the Sabines twice, in the later of which Battels were slain of them thirteen thousand, and not one of the Romans lost. Wherefore besides Triumphs this was given him as an addition of honour, to have an House built for him in the place on the publick cost. Besides, whereas all the doors of other Houses opened inwards, they would have this of his House to open outwards toward the Street, as a mark of Honour in this respect, that he was ever ready to move for the publick good. Indeed all the Gates of the Greeks are said most antiently to have opened this way, and that by Testimony of the Comedies, wherein they that are going out first knock within, that such as either go by or stand near, may prevent being hurt of the Door, which was cast forward into the Street. The next Year, wherein Poplicola was Consul the fourth time, and his Colleague T. Lucretius Priscipitinus, the whole Nation of the Sabines with the Latines conspired against Rome, which was also much disturbed by Superstition, for that all the Women with Child miscarried of miltious Births, and nothing came into the World perfect. When these things much dejected the minds of the Romans, another erected them, and afforded considerable encouragement to the War. Appius or Clasius Clasius, an eminent man amongst the Sabines for Riches, Valour, Virtue, and Eloquence, being much against the War, was therefore malign'd by his Emulators, as favouring the Romans, and designing to bring his Country under their Yoke. His Enemies gaining credit with the Vulgar, he feared to put himself upon Trial, and therefore raised a Commotion, which rekindled the War. Then did Poplicola invite him to Rome, whither he came with five thousand Families of his Friends and Dependents. The Families were made free of the City, and to every man assigned two Akers of Ground by the River Aniene; but to Clasius himself twenty Akers, and the degree of a Senator. Having got this opportunity, he so improved it, as to become equal to the greatest, and raised his House so much, that the Clasii afterwards called Claudii, became inferior to no one Family.

22. His Revolt much more exasperated the minds of his Country-men to the War, who coming with an Army to Fidene, placed in Ambush two thousand Foot, Poplicola died.

Foot, and then sent some Horse to make incursions, commanding them to retreat, as if they fled, and so draw on the Romans into the snare. Poplicola, having notice hereof by certain fugitives, divided his Army into three parts, and taking the advantage of a mist, fell upon the Sabines on so many sides, and did such execution, as the nearness of Fidene only hindered the destruction of them all. The Romans, besides the advantage of much plunder, obtained that good by this Victory, to be furnished with courage for all assays; yet imputed they the whole merit to the Consul, and stuck not to say, that he delivered into their hands their Enemies, blind and lame, only to be dispatched with the Sword. Having triumphed, and given up the charge of the Commonwealth to the two new Consuls, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, and Publius Posthumius, shortly after he died, finishing his life, as he had lived, in great grace with the multitude whom he had so flattered. The People, as if they had nothing at all required him when living, but owed him yet his whole reward, decreed he should be buried at the publick charge, every one contributing a small piece of money. Some say, that he was so poor, as he left not enough to bury him. The women by universal consent mourned for him, as formerly they had done for Brutus, an whole year. He was by a special Decree buried within the City, (which honour (saith Dionysius) hath only happened unto him to this day) and that privilege was also granted to his family. But now, (Plutarch writeth) none of them are there interred: the Funeral is only drawn out to plain, and the Coffin being set down, one puts under fire, and presently again takerh it away, shewing, that the deceased hath a right there to be buried, but on his own accord quitteth the privilege. This being done, the body was carried away.

23. The same year that Poplicola died, the Sabines provided of numerous Forces, invaded the Roman Territories, as far as the City walls. The Consuls taking the field against them, Posthumius was entrapped in an Ambush, and escaping narrowly himself, lost many of his men, which defeat struck the Citizens with great terror, who now ran to the walls, expecting the Enemy would fall upon the City. But nothing being attempted in this kind, they marched out, resolving to redeem their credit; and Posthumius, much more concerned in honour than the rest, so behaved himself, as he made amends fully, and both the Consuls obtained a notable Victory, which had been completed by the slaughter of all the Sabines, if the darkness of night had not interposed. The Senate ordered the Consuls to return in pomp, Menenius with full honour in triumph, sitting in a Chair, drawn in way of a Chariot, but Posthumius, because of his late defeat, in a more humble manner, which the Romans called Ovation, so named (saith Festus or Paulus from him, as he from Ferrius) from the letter O, which the Soldiers in way of joy were wont to echo at their return from a Victory; or corruptly pronounced for the Greek word Eufest, as Dionysius conjectureth. Ovation differed herein from a Triumph properly so called, that the General entered not the City in a Chariot, but on foot before his Soldiers; for the Robe interwoven with Gold, he only wore the Pretexta toga, the ordinary habit of Consuls and Prætors; neither had he a Scepter, but only Laurel; and on his head a wreath of Myrtle, when the War had not been denounced, or finished without bloodshed. The year following, wherein Sp. Cassius Pifcellinus, and Opiter Virginius Tricostus were Consuls, the Sabines were overthrown in a great battel at Corvi, ten thousand and three hundred being slain, and about four thousand taken, which defeat caused them to beg peace, and purchase it with Corn, Money, and part of their grounds. Whilst Sp. Cassius did this good service against the Sabines, his Colleague subdued the Cambrinians who had revolted; and having put to death the Authors of the injury, sold the rest, and razed their City.

24. The year that followed, being the first of the seventieth Olympiad (wherein Nicias of Opus (a Town of Loeri) was Victor,) Myrras executing the Annual Office of Archon at Athens had for Consuls Posthumius Cominius, and T. Lartius. Now all the Latines (to the number of thirty Cities, saith Livy) conspired against Rome, by the procurement of Mamilius Ostivius, son-in-law to Tarquinius (who at present was with him at Tusculum) though Valerius the Roman Ambassador pretended to answer to such accusations as were made, and laboured to dissuade the several People of Latium. In the mean time also the Slaves at home contrived how to seize upon the Capitol, and burn the City, but were discovered, and nailed to crosses. The following year wherein Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus, and Manius Tullius Lanatus, were Consuls, a Faction in Fidene, having ving received some men from Tarquinus, killed or expelled their adversaries, and caused the Town to revolt from the Romans. The Senate would not make War upon the Latines in general, knowing many amongst them were inclined to Peace, and thought it sufficient to block up Fidene, for which they sent out Manius with a strong Army. The besieged implored assistance of the Latines, who in their general meeting heard also the complaints of Tarquinus, and though they were much importuned by some amongst them, yet they only ordered the Ambassadors to be sent to demand the reception of the King, and the removal of the siege from Fidene, which was done also merely to give time, giving the Romans a years time to consider of the matter, and taking lo large a space for to make preparations, in case the overture were rejected. Tarquinus and Mamilius having little hopes to prevail this way, seeing that the minds of the generality were averse from War, endeavoured to bring his right about in an easier way, by raising in Rome an unexpected and intestine difference betwixt the rich and poorer sort.

25. For at this very time, as Dionysius writeth, a great part of the common People, especially the indigent and such as were burthened by usury, did not like of the present state of affairs, which dissatisfaction was caused by the extravagant course of Creditors, who seizing upon the bodies of their Debtors, used them no better than Slaves purchased with money. Tarquinus not being ignorant hereof, sent certain of his friends with Gold, who gave them some in hand, promising more after the King's restitution, and procured thereby a conspiracy of many poor Citizens, with such Slaves as had been offended with their Masters the year before, for the severity shewn towards their fellows. The matter was discovered to Sulpicius, who after he had returned a denial, though very civilly, to the Latin Ambassadors, for a while drew the Conspirators into the Forum; where encompassing them about, he put them all to the Sword. The first being thus allied for a time, the Consuls of this and the following year looked abroad, and, in the next, Fidene was yielded up to T. Larsius Flavus. Hereat the Latins were exceedingly startled, and now all railed on their principal men, for that no order had been taken for relief of the Town. Tarquinus and Mamilius so improved this opportunity, that all the Cities (twenty four in number, as they are reckoned by Dionysius) decreed War against the Romans, imagining that none should forsake their associates, nor make Peace without common consent, sealing it with an Oath, and direful curses against such as should break the League, who were to be held as Enemies by all the rest. They gave liberty to Tarquinus and his son in-law to levy what Forces they thought convenient, and that they might have some kind of pretence, sent a message to Rome, whence the Senate returned a stout and resolute answer.

26. Great were the preparations of the Latines; the Romans sending round about, could make no friends, and yet were not dejected, but trusting to their domestic strength alone, were thereby rendered much more resolute and courageous, as such upon whom lay a necessity of being valiant. But a great difficulty was found in lifting Soldiers; for the poor and those that were furcharged with debt, of which there was a great number, being cited, would not appear, saying, they had nothing to do with the Patritians, except their debts were remitted by Decree of the Senate, nay some talked of leaving the City, and exhorted one another not to stay in that place, where no good thing was communicated to them. The Patritians by good words laboured to appease them, but all in vain; so that the Senate fell into a serious debate about so weighty a matter. Some were for a free remission of the debts, after the manner of the Athenian Sischyria, as the only way to remove all prejudice, and beget a fair correspondence betwixt Nobility and Commons. Others condemned this as too great a condescension, and which would encourage them to like Seditions for the time to come, thinking it the better way to list such as would give their names, and not at all value the rest, who though gratified at present, would hereafter be unserviceable. Betwixt these extremes several other ways were propounded; but this at length prevailed, that nothing should now be determined, but the War being happily finished, the Consuls should report it again to the Senate, and in the mean time all suits and process concerning debts were to cease, that Magistrates might make effectual provisions for the matter now mainly incumbent. This expedient, though something it wrought, had not sufficient strength to end the difference, and therefore the Senate was put upon another exigent. Whereas by the Law of Valerius, power of life and death was taken away from the Consuls, and all constrained, by an appeal to the People, so that no man could be forced to the War. It seemed necessary to create a Magistrate, who for six Months should rule as absolute above the Laws, and from whom should lyce no appeal. Thus having renounced Monarchy in effect, they had again recourse to it, and shewed as well the necessity as excellency of it.

The Dictator.

27. This Supreme Officer was called Dictator, either for that he was dictus, or named, by the Consul, according to (a) Varro, or rather from dictating, or shewing and commanding what was to be done, which Etymology (b) Dionysius approveth. He was also called (c) Magister Populi, and (d) Prator Maximus. Both name and thing came from the Albans, whose Dictator Metius Sufferius we have formerly mentioned. Spartianus saith, it was an ordinary Magistrate of old Latiom. Dionysius bringeth the Testimony of Licinius Macer for this opinion; yet he thinketh the Office first taken from the Greeks, who had their Alkymetes or extraordinary Kings made upon some urgent occasion, with absolute Power. The Dictator was created upon some urgent occasion of War or Sedition, for fixing a Nale in time of a Plague, to hold the Comitia for electing of Consuls, celebrate Games, make inquisition, choosing Senators, or in sum, when there was need of a sodain and extraordinary command. The manner of his creation was not, as of other Magistrates, by the Suffrages of the People; but, at the command of the Senate, the Consul named some one of Consular Dignity whom he pleased, in the Night, and who was approved by the Auspicium, or divination from Birds, a Ceremony observed ever in the election of some Officers. The occasion being many times sodain, they could not stay for the Suffrages of the People, and the design being to restrain, or constrain, the Multitude, many times, he was not to be chosen out of their Body, although sometimes these Rules were not fully observed, either through the absence of the Consul, or some other respect. L. Cornelius Sylla alone was named by the Interrex, as C. Caesar by the Prator; both which nominations Cicero in his Epistles conceiveth done contrary to right and order. The Authority of the Dictator was exceeding large. He had Power of Peace and War, to levie Forces, lead them forth, and disband them, and act all things according to his pleasure, without referring them to the Senate. So that not only had he the Power of both Consuls (whence the Greeks called him Disypatos, or double Consul) but more also, in that upon his Creation all other Magistrates, except the Tribunes, laid down their Offices, and the whole Government was left in his hands. He could punish as he pleased, without all appeal, and for the ostentation of his Power, had twenty four bundles of Rods carried before him, with as many Axes, or Hatchets, as Plutarch and Polybius do testify; although Livie dissenting from them, will have Sylla first of all others to have had twenty four Bundles. Hence this Office came to be so terrible, as the Edict of the Dictator was ever observed as the command of a Deity.

28. It was necessary, according to the Roman Government, that this extraordinary Power should be bounded by certain Limits, wherein might lie redrefts of Inconveniencies thence arising. Six months were the time assigned for its duration, and never was it lengthned, except for meer necessity, as might be intanced in Camillus, L. Papirius, and Fabius Maximus: for the perpetual Dictatorships of Sylla and Caesar were notorious Violations of the Laws. And not only the time but the place also was limited, it being unlawful for the Dictator to stir out of Italy, lest being out of sight, he should take advantage at the distance of place, to attempt some new matter; and this constitution was never violated but once whilst the old Commonwealth stood, by Atrilius Collatinus. He was not to come on horse-back, but march continually on foot, to shew, saith Plutarch, that the Roman strength lay in the Legions, or rather to teach him Humility. Now because in great Expeditions this could scarce be observed, he formally before his departure asked leave of the People that he might ride, as Livie informeth us. But those restrictions were inconsiderable, in respect of the Appeal which afterwards came to be made from him to the People. Festus in these words Optima Lex, saith, that first the power of the Magister Populi, or Dictator, was full or absolute, as that of Marcus Valerius; but afterwards an Appeal lay from this Magistrate to the People. Livie seemeth also to hold out the same thing, where he bringeth M. Fabius in behalf of his Son thus speaking to L. Papirius the Dictator: Seeing that neither the authority of the Senate, nor mine age, which thou goest about to bereave of my Son, neither the Virtue and Nobility of the Master of the Horse-men named by thy self, prevail with thee; nor yet Prayers and Intreaties, ties, which are wont to appease an enemy, and the anger of the Gods: Tapped to the Tribunes of the People, and the People it self which I make our Judge, (Seeing thou regardst not the Judgment of the Army and Senate) which alone can do more than thy Dictatorship. I shall see whether thou wilt give place to that Appeal to which the Roman King Tullus Hostilius yielded. Hereupon the People assembled, and the Tribunes were present at the meeting. Papirius denieth neither the Power of the one nor the other, but continueth resolute for the punishment of the Master of the Horse-men, who had fought in his absence contrary to his Command, shewing how all discipline else would be destroyed. A way was found out to preserve the Honour of both Offices, the power of People, Tribunes and Dictator, with the strength of Discipline. For the People betook it self to in-treaties, and was seconded by the Tribunes. Whereupon the Dictator pardoned the party, granting his Life to the request of those, who, as he confesseth, might have commanded it.

29. At what time this Appeal was brought in, or how long it continued in Force, seeing that Sylla and other Dictators made use of the old and absolute Power, is uncertain. It is probable, that the People being overwitted in ratifying the Decree of the Senate (as Dionysius telleth us they were) grew sensible, how they had thereby given the Power again out of their Hands; it being lawful for the Senate at any time when they should pretend a necessity, and that for the bridling of the People it self, to give order to the Consul to name a Dictator, and therefore refused its ancient Power of Appeal, without which no lawless Freedom could be enjoyed. But in the declining condition of the Commonwealth, when Dictators grew more imperious, their Soldiers more dissolute, and the Tribunes of the People especially more Factious; and opportunity might be wanting for it to exert that right which as yet it had not given up to any other. If what Dionysius writeth of the Dictators being approved by the People after the Consuls nomination be true, the State stood in less need of the Appeal; but it being not possible for a Multitude never to mistake in its Opinion of a Person, this defect might at length be experimentally discovered, and thence a recourse had to that remedy which was ever certain whilst it could be applied. By these cautions and restrictions, with the modesty of the Romans; this Grand Office was for four hundred years managed for the publick good, as it was accounted, till Sylla, and afterward Cæsar, converted it into a Tyranny, as the multitude counted it, and rendered the very name thereof so odious, that after Cæsar's death, in the seven hundred and tenth year of the City, when M. Antonius, and P. Cornelius Dolabella were Consuls, a Law was made (from the former Consul called Lex Antonia) whereby it was for ever banished. The Dictator when he was created made choice of one who had either been Consul or Prætor, to be Magister Equitum, who, saith Varro, had chief Power over the Horse-men, and Adenses (Criers, Beadles, or publick Messengers) as the Dictator had over the Roman People, whence he also was called Magister Populi. Thereof, because they were of less value than these Magistri, were named Magistritas, as from albus Albutus. If the Dictator was absent, the Master of the Horse-men executed his place in the Army, but if he was present, he commanded the Horse, yet so as to be obedient to the Dictators Orders, and not to Fight, either contrary to, or without his Command. In the second Punic War, M. Fabius Buteo was made Dictator for filling up the Senate, without a Master of Horse-men. But he alleged, that he could not approve of two Dictators to be at the same time, nor a Dictator without a Master of horse-men, and having perfected his work on the same day laid down his Office.

30. Concerning the time of the first Dictatorship, Authors differ in the space of two years, and do not fully agree about the Person. Dionysius, a grave, faithful, and wary Author (by consent of the most learned sort of men) referreth it to the two hundred and fifty fifth year of the City; but Livy, and most Latine Authors assign it to the two hundred and fifty third. Dionysius saith expressly, that T. Lærgius Flavus was the first Dictator, being Consul that year. Livy saith it could not be certainly known from ancient Authors who was the first, yet confesseth that the most ancient mentioned Lærgius, and upon good Grounds approveth of their opinion rather than that which maketh M. Valerius the Son of Mærcus yet living, and Grand-son to Polestus the first of all, which Festus seemeth to follow. Livy mentioneth no other cause of the Original than a falling out with the Sabines, and the conspiracy of the thirty Latine Cities, putting off the Sedition till after the finishing finishing of the Latine War; but as there can little hold be taken of one who necessarily relateth matters; so no need would there have been of an absolute Authority for the Latine War, if no stir had been made in the City, all giving their names with alacrity, and obeying the Consuls, as in former Wars. And if the Consuls had been suspected to favour the cause of Tarquinius (as some wrote they were) then new ones might have been made in their rooms, nothing being prevalent to alter the ordinary form of Government, but a necessity of absolute Power for a time; and no ordinary accident about War could make this necessity; so that compulsion must have been the end, and the taking away that help from the multitude, which was unalterably given to it against the Consuls by the Valerian Law. Thus might the Nobility, if they had had that duty, have seen cause to repent in time of their Kings banishment.

T. Lærgius the first Dictator.

31. T. Lærgius, the first Dictator, having named Sp. Cassius for his Master of horse-men (who had born the Office of Consul in the seventieth Olympiad) caused Axes to be carried before him with the Rods, as had been wont, till the time of Poplicola, before the chief Magistrates, both Kings and Consuls. Having with these and other Ensigns of power terrified the Seditious, he began the Consul after the Pattern of Ser. Tullius, according to the Tribes, taking the names and ages of such as were Ceffed, and of Children. In a short space, fear of losing freedom of the City, and Estates, so prevailed, as one hundred and fifty thousand and seven hundred of such as were ripe of age gave their names, which he distributed into four parts, whereof taking one to himself, he gave the rest to his Master of horse-men, and two others, one being to continue in the City for the defence thereof. This done, he sent some who underhand dealt with the several Latine Cities, and procured them to suspend the War, and make a Truce for a year, notwithstanding all that Mamilius and Sextus Tarquinius could do to the contrary. Then returned he home with the Army, and ere his six months were out, the Consuls being appointed, laid down, no Citizens being killed, banished or otherwise chastized by any grievous punishment; which carriage was imitated by his Successors, until the third age from that wherein we live, saith Dionysius. But in the time of our Fathers four hundred years from the Dictatorship of Lærgius, L. Cornelius Sylla first of all others behaved himself cruelly in this Office, so that the Romans conceived then what before they had cause to be ignorant of, that the Dictatorship was a Tyranny.

32. When the Truce betwixt the Latines and Romans was ended, both parties prepared for the War: The former were against their wills, 'tis said, drawn in by the interest of Mamilius; but the later with all cheerfulness embraced the opportunity. The Romans thought fit a Dictator should be Created, and accordingly Virginius the Senior Consul named A. Posthumius his Colleague, who chose for Master of horse-men T. Ebutius Helva, and having his Levies, divided his Forces into four parts, whereof one he kept to himself, assigned the second to Virginius, the third to Ebutius, and the fourth to Sempronius, who therewith was to defend the City. News being come that the Latines had taken the Field, the Dictator with speed marched to the Lake Regillus (at this day called Il Lago di Santa Severa) in the Country of Tychemus, where he fortified his Camp against the Enemy, whoas yet had not united his Forces, and expected Assistance from the Folci. The Roman Army divided into three parts encompassed the Latines, who endeavoured to beat off Ebutius from an Hill he had seized on betwixt them and home; but he kept his Ground in despite of them; and fortified himself. The Latines hereupon being hindered from all Provisions, resolved to fight; the Dictator at first was minded to end the War without Blood, by satisfying his Enemies, but understanding that the Folci were expected within three days, changed his resolution. The right Wing of the Latines was led by Mamilius, the left by Sextus Tarquinius, and the middle Battel by Titus Tarquinius his other Son. On the other side against Mamilius stood Virginius, Ebutius was opposite in the right Wing to Sextus Tarquinius, and the Dictator led the middle Battel against Titus, and the Roman Exiles. The Romans brought into the Field twenty four thousand foot, and one thousand horse, but the Latines forty thousand foot, and three thousand horse. When they joined, both parties missed of their expectation; for the one trusting to their numbers, and the other to their Valour, thought to bear all down before them. The Dictator gave the first opportunity of Victory by overpowering Titus, after which, though Mamilius and Sextus omitted nothing requisite to valiant and able Captains, yet both losing their Lives, their followers were Sect. 1. discouraged and overthrown; scarce ten thousand escaping home of the whole number. Of the Romans fell M. Valerius, whose dead body his two Nephews by his brother Poplicola, Publius and Marcus, endeavouring to get off, were also slain in the attempt.

33. After the Fight, the Volsci, whom the Latines had expected, arrived at the Camp, which lying full of dead bodies, and learning the issue of the battle, some of them were for falling on the Romans now weary, but another party prevailed to send Messengers to the Dictator, to tell him they came to his assistance, thereby to ingratiate themselves with the Conquerors. But the Dictator convinced them of falshood by their Letters which he had intercepted, and giving leave to the Messengers to return, whom the multitude would have pulled in pieces, resolved on the morrow to fall on them; but in the night they deserted their Camp and fled. From the place of this action the Dictator obtained the surname of Rhegillensis.

34. The Latines sent to deprecate the anger of the Roman State, laying all the blame upon their Nobility. The Ambassadors managed their work with such earnestness and humility (casting themselves at the Feet of the Senate, and making great lamentations) that the motion of Largius prevailed in their behalf for the former League to be renewed. This was the end of the War which in behalf of the Tarquins had been carried on for fourteen years: Tarquinius himself being only left behind of all his stock, now almost ninety years old, for that the Latines, Ætruscans, and Sabines, refused to harbour him, as also all other neighbouring Cities which were free, went into Campania to Arifodemus the Prince of Cuma, with whom he shortly after died. Of the man we may judge charitably, because his story was only related to posterity by his bitter Enemies. However, his banishment our Religion must censure as Rebellion. And such were the fits, seditions and tumults afterwards, and so many changes and rechanges, as if the Reader seriously consider them he will see that the Romans suffered much for want of Monarchy, and the contrary Government did not contribute to their happiness. That this may appear, he hath here a fuller view of their changes than in any other modern Writer.

Great fits in the City.

35. The Romans now freed from this War, fell into a grievous sedition in the City, the Courts of Justice being again opened by the Senate, and the process against debtors revived. The Plebeians alleged they were not able to pay their debts, by reason of their losses sustained in the late Wars through want of tillage, and plundering of their Cattel by the Enemy. Their Creditors replied, that these losses had also befallen them, which made the remission of the debts impossible; and so neither sort would yield at all, but many tumults were raised, wherein the parties did not abstain from blows. Posthumus the Dictator perceiving some expedition to be necessary for the quiet of the City, created Consuls for the following year, and laid down his Office. The Consuls were Appius Claudius the Sabine, and P. Servilius Prifcus, who being of the Dictator's mind as to the War, resolved to go out against the Volsci, who had assisted the Latines against the State, and now were making preparations for War; when they came to make Levies none of the Plebeians would give their names, complaining that they having already undergone the heat, and danger of the War, both for liberty and dominion, they were by their fellow Citizens at home kept in bondage (it being the custom then for Creditors to make use of them as Slaves bound in fetters) and many times cruelly beaten, till they could pay their debts. They cried out, that the security of the common sort was more provided for in War, and amongst their Enemies, than in Peace, and with their friends. The disagreement of the Consuls amongst themselves added to the present discontent; Servilius being willing to comply something with the desire of the poor; but Appius inveighing against them with great bitterness, and earnestly urging force and rigour to be the most suitable means for appeasing these tumults. The Senate was forced to betake it self to the popularity of Servilius, who with fair words drew the people out against the Sabines, and when he had by this good service deserved a Triumph, the honour was denied him through the suggestions of his Colleague to the Fathers, for that by bearing with the multitude he impaired the Dignity of their Order.

Divided by War.
